were taken down and burnt; as the Images of Walsingham, Ipswich, Worcester, the Lady of Wilsdon, with many other; and forthwith by means of the said Cromwell, all the orders of the Friars and Nuns, with their Cloysters and Houses, were suppressed and put down: also the Shrines of counterfeit Saints; amongst others, the Shrine of Tho. Becket in the Priory of Christ-Church was taken to the Kings use, and his Bones, Scull, and all which was there found, with a piece broken out by the wound of his head, were all burnt in the same Church by command of the Lord Cromwell: and the one and twentieth of October, the Church of Tho. Becket in London, called the Hospital of St. Thomas of Acres, was suppressed: the sixteenth of Novem. the Black-fryers in London were suppressed, the next day the White-fryers, the Gray-fryers, and the Monks of the Charterhouse, and so all the other immediately after: only three Abbots resisted, the Abbot of Colchester, the Abbot of Reading, and the Abbot of Glastenbury, who therefore were all taken & executed. The four and twentieth of November the Bishop of Rocheſter preached at Pauls-Cross, and there shewed the blood of Hales, affirming it to be no blood, but honey clarified and coloured with Saffron, as it had been evidently proved before the King and Council. The number of Monasteries suppressed, were six hundred forty five, besides fourscore and ten Colledges, one hundred and ten Hospitals, and of Chanceries and free Chappels two thousand three hundred seventy four. But now to make amends for the suppressing of so many Monasteries, the King instituted certain new Bishopricks, as at Westminster, Oxford, Peterborough, Bristol, Chester, and Gloceſter; and assigned certain Canons and Prebends to each of them.

Divers Lords and Knights executed, and why.

The third of Novem. Henry Courtney Marques of Exeter, and Earl of Devonshire, Henry Pool Lord Montacute, Sir Nicholas Carew of Bedington Knight of the Garter, and Master of the Kings Horse, and Sir Edward Nevill brother to the L. Abergenny, were sent to the Tower, being accused by Sir Geoffry Pool the Lord Montacutes Brother of high Treason: they were indicted for devising to promote and advance one Reinald Pool to the Crown, and put down King Henry. This Pool was a near Kinsman of the Kings (being the Son of the Lady Margaret Countess of Salisbury, Daughter and Heir to George Duke of Clarence) He had been brought up by the King in learning, and made Dean of Exeter; but being sent after to learn experience by travel, he grew so great a friend of the Popes, that he became an enemy to King Henry, and for his enmity to the King, was by Pope Julius the third made Cardinal. For this mans cause the Lords aforesaid being condemned, were all executed; the Lord Marques, the Lord Montacute, and Sir Edward Nevill, beheaded on the Tower-Hill, the ninth of January, Sir Nicholas Carew, the third of March; two Priests condemned with them were hanged at Tiburn; Sir Geoffry Pool, though condemned also, yet had his pardon.

Cardinal Pool his Parentage and Education.

About this time one Nicholson, alias Lambert, being accused for denying the Real Presence in the Sacrament, appealed to the King, and the King was content to hear him: whereupon a Throne was set up in the Hall of the Kings Palace lace at Westminster, for the King to sit: and when the Bishops had urged their Arguments and could not prevail, then the King took him in hand, hoping perhaps to have the honour of converting an Heretick, when the Bishops could not do it, and withall promised him pardon if he would recant; but all would not do: Nicholson remained obstinate, the King mist his Honour, the Delinquent mist his pardon, and shortly after was drawn to Smithfield, and there burnt.

About this time King Henry being informed that the Pope, by instigation of Cardinal Pool, had earnestly moved divers great Princes to invade England; he, as a provident Prince, endeavoured as earnestly to provide for defence; and to that end rode himself to the Sea-coasts to see them fortified, and in needful places Bulwarks to be erected. He caused his Navy to be rigged, and to be in readiness at any short warning: He caused Musters to be taken in all Shires, and lists of all able men in every County, in London specially; where Sir William Forman, the then Mayor, certified the number of fifteen thousand, not that there were no more, but that so many were ready prepared; and these on the eighth of May, the King himself saw Mustered in St. James's Park; where the Citizens strove in such sort to exceed each other in bravery of Arms, and forwardness of Service, as if the City had been a Camp, and they not men of the Gown, but all profest Souldiers; which they performed to their great cost, but greater commendation.

It was now the one and thirtieth year of King Henry's Reign, and the nine and fortieth of his age; when having continued a Widower two years, he began to think of marrying again; and he needed not to be a Suitor for a Wife, for he was sued unto to take one. The Emperour solicited him to marry the Dutches of Milan; but to marry her he must first obtain a Licence from the Pope, and King Henry was resolved rather to have no Wife, than to have any more to do with the Pope. Then the Duke of Cleve made suit unto him to marry the Lady Anne his Sister, and he was a Protestant Prince; and so, though differing in Points of Doctrine, yet in the main point of excluding the Pope, both of one mind. Many about the King were forward for this Match, but the Lord Cromwell specially: and indeed it concerned him more than any other, that the King should take a Protestant Wife, seeing his Actions had been such, as none but a Protestant-Queen would ever like; and if the Queen should not like them, the King, though done by his leave, would not like them long. Hereupon such means were used, that Ambassadors came from the Duke of Cleve to conclude the Match; and then the 11 of December the Lady her self in great state was brought to Callice, and then over to Dover; and being come to Rocheſter, the King secretly came to see her: afterward she was conducted to London, met by the way in several places, by all the great Lords and Ladies of the Kingdom. The third of January she was received into London by Sir William Hollys Knight, then Lord Mayor, with Orations, Pageants, and all Complements of State, the greatest that ever had been seen. On Twelfth-day the Marriage was solemnized: the Archbishop of Canterbury did the Office, the Earl of Overſtein a German Lord gave her. In April following the Lord Cromwell, as though he had won the Kings heart for ever by making this Match, was made Earl of Essex: for in March before, Henry Bouchier Earl of Essex, and the ancientest Earl of England, had broke his neck, by seeking to break a young Horse, leaving only one Daughter; and she dying without Issue, the Earldom came to the Family of Devereux, which yet enjoyed not the honour, till afterward in Queen Elizabeth's time, and then made, but not restored.

The ninth of March, the King created Sir Earls William Paulet, Treasurer of his House, Lord Saint-John; Sir John Ruſſel, Comptroller, Lord Ruſſel; and shortly after Sir William Par was created Lord Par. The eight and twentieth of April began a Parliament at Westminster, in the which Margaret Counteſs of Salisbury, Gertrude Wife to the Marquess of Exeter, Reynold Pool Cardinal, Brother to the Lord Montacute, Sir Adrian Foſkew, Thomas Dingley Knight of Saint Johns, and divers others were attainted of high Treason; of whom Foſkew and Dingley the tenth of July were beheaded, the Counteſs of Salisbury two years after: and in this Parliament the Act of the Six Articles was established, and Sir Nicholas Hare was restored to his place of Speaker in the Parliament.

It was now five months after the Kings Marriage with the Lady Anne of Cleve: and though the King, at the first sight of the Lady, did not like her Person; yet, whether as respecting the honour of Ladies, he would not disgrace her at the first meeting; or whether he meant to try how time might work him to a better liking; or indeed, that he would not give distaste to the German Princes at that time, for some ends he had a working, he dissembled the matter, and all things went on in a shew of contentment on all hands. But for all these shews, the crafty Bishop of London, Steven Gardiner, finding how the world went with the Kings affection towards his Queen, and for her sake with Cromwell, to neither of whom he was greatly affected (not to the Queen, as misliking her Religion; not to Cromwell, as envying his greatness;) he so wrought upon the Kings inclination, what by suggesting, and what by aggravating, that the Lord Cromwell, the ninth of July, sitting in the Council-Chamber, was suddenly apprehended and committed to the Tower; and the nineteenth of the same month was attainted by Parliament, and never came to his Answer; by a Law which (as some reported) he himself had caused to be made; and the eight and twentieth of July was beheaded on the Tower-hill, for Crimes (as appears in Record) of Heresie and Treason. This Lord Cromwell was born at Putney, a Village in Surrey near the Thames-side, Son to a Smith, after whose decease his Mother was married to a Sheer-man. For the pregnancy of his Wit he was first entertained by Cardinal Woolſey, and by him employed in many great Affairs. The Cardinal falling, the King took him into his service; and finding his great Abilities, first advanced him for his worth, and then for his pleasure overthrew him. But the greatest part of Stephen Gardiner's practice had been done before; fore: for at Midsummer before, the King caused the Queen to remove to Richmond, as for her health and pleasure; and in the time of her absence, on the sixth of July, sent certain Lords to the Lower House of Parliament, who there declared certain causes, for which the Kings marriage with the Lady Anne of Cleve was not to be counted lawful; and so carried the matter, that the Convocation clearly determined, the King might marry any other, and so might she. Being thus Divorced, it was further Enacted, she should no more be called Queen, but the Lady Anne of Cleve. The fault for which this Divorce was decreed, is not expressly delivered; some say a precontract of the said Lady with a Lord of Germany was pretended: but it seems to have been from some womanish defect in her body; as she spared not to affirm, that she had never been carnally known by the King in all the time of their lying together: and as it is said, when her Ladies one time said unto her, that they looked now every day to hear of her great belly; she should answer, they might look long enough, unless saying, How dost thou sweet heart? Good morrow sweet heart, and such like words, could make a great belly; for (said she) more than this there never passed between the King and me. However it was, she willingly submitted to the Decree, whether out of fear, or perhaps as little liking the King as the King did her; and afterward led a private life here in England, well respected of the King, and dying sixteen years after, in the fourth year of Queen Mary, was buried at Westminster.

Sir William Hollys Knight, Lord Mayor of London.

Thomas Fines Lord Dacres hanged at Tyburn, and why.

About this time Leonard Gray, Deputy of Ireland, was on the Tower-hill beheaded, for suffering his nephew Gerald Fitz-Garret to escape, who had been declared an enemy unto the State: and then also was Thomas Fines Lord Dacres, a young man of four and twenty years of age, hanged at Tyburn, for killing a mean person upon a sudden affray; also the fourth of August, Thomas Epson a Monk of Westminster, for denying to take his Oath, to be true to the King, had his Monks Garment plucked from his back, the last that was seen in such habit in England till Queen Maries dayes.

King Henry marries the Lady Katharine Howard.

Sir Edmund Knevet is adjudged to lose his right hand, and the solemn manner of doing it.

The sixth of July, in the two and thirtieth year of his Reign, King Henry had been divorced from the Lady Anne of Cleve, and now the eighth of August following, the Lady Katharine Howard, Niece to the Duke of Norfolk, and Daughter to the Lord Edward Howard, was shewed openly as Queen at Hampton-Court.

On the tenth of June the year following, Sir Edmund Knevet of Norfolk, Knight, was arraigned before the Officers of the Green-cloth, for striking one Master Cleer of Norfolk, within the Tennis-Court of the Kings House; being found guilty, he had judgment to lose his right hand, and to forfeit all his Lands and Goods: whereupon there was called to do execution, first the Serjeant Surgeon, with his Instruments pertaining to his Office, then the Serjeant of the Wood-yard, with a mallet, and a block to lay the hand upon, then the Kings Master Cook with a knife to cut off the hand, then the Serjeant of the Larder to set the knife right on the joint, then the Serjeant Ferrier with searing Irons to sear the veins, then the Serjeant of the Poultry with a Cock, which Cock should have his head smitten off upon the same block, and with the same knife; then the Yeoman of the Chandry with Sear-cloaths, then the Yeoman of the Scullery, with a pan of fire to heat the Irons, a chafer of water to cool the ends of the Irons, and two forms for all Officers to set their stuff on; then the Serjeant of the Cellar with Wine, Ale, and Beer; then the Serjeant of the Ewry, with Bason, Ewre and Towels. All things being thus prepared, Sir William Pickering Knight Marshal, was commanded to bring in his prisoner, Sir Edmund Knevet, to whom the Chief Justice declared his offence, which the said Knevet confessed, and humbly submitted himself to the Kings mercy; only he desired, that the King would spare his right hand, and take his left, because (said he) if my right hand be spared, I may live to do the King good service: of whose submission, and reason of his suit, when the King was informed, he granted him to lose neither of his hands, and pardoned him also of his Lands and Goods.

Is pardoned, and why.

The Summer of his three and thirtieth year, King Henry, with his Queen Katharine, made a progress into the North parts, and returning at Alhallontide to Hampton-Court, he was there informed of the Queens dissolute life, first before her marriage, with one Francis Deerham, a Gentleman of Norfolk, whom employed afterward in Ireland, she had lately again at Pomfret received into her Service; and now since her marriage with one Tho. Colepepper, of the Kings Privy-Chamber: whereupon the thirteenth of November, Sir Thomas Wriothesly Knight, Secretary to the King, was sent to the Queen at Hampton-Court, to charge her with these Crimes, and discharging her household, to cause her to be conveyed to Sion, there to remain, till the Kings pleasure should be further known. The Delinquents being examined, Deerham confessed, that before the Kings marriage with the Lady Katharine, there had been a pre-contract between himself and her; but when he once understood of the Kings liking towards her, he then waved and concealed it for her preferment. So the first of December these Gentlemen being arraigned at the Guildhall, they confessed the Indictment, and had Judgment to dye, as in cases of Treason: the tenth of December, they were drawn from the tower to Tyburn, where Colepepper was beheaded, and Deerham was hanged and dismembered: Colepeppers body was buried in Sepulchres Church in London, but both their heads were set on London-bridge. The two and twentieth of December, there were arraigned at the Kings-Bench, the Lord William Howard and the Lady Margaret his Wife, Katharine Tilney and Alice Wrethwold Gentlewomen, Joan Bulmer Wife to Anthony Bulmer Gentleman, Anne Howard Wife to Henry Howard Esquire, and Brother to the Queen, with divers others, who were all condemned for misprision of Treason, for concealing the Queens misdemeanor, and adjudged to forfeit all their lands and goods during life, and to remain in perpetual prison. The sixteenth of January, the Parliament began at Westminster, where the Lords and Commons Petitioned the King, that he would not vex himself with the Queens offence, and that both she and the Lady Rochford might be attainted by Parliament; and and that to avoid protracting of time, he would give his Royal assent unto it, under the great Seal, without staying for the end of the Parliament. Also that Deerham and Colepepper, having been attainted before by the Common Law, might be attainted likewise by Parliament. All which was assented to by the King; and after, on the thirtieth of February, the Queen and the Lady Rochford were beheaded on the Green within the Tower, where they confessed their offences, and died penitently. Yet something to take off the offences of this Queen; it is certainly said, that after her condemnation, she protested to Doctor White, Bishop of Winchester, her last Confessor, that as for the act for which she was condemned, she took God and his Holy Angels to witness, upon her souls salvation, that she died guiltless.

King Henry is proclaimed King of Ireland. Before this, on the three and twentieth of January, King Henry was proclaimed King of Ireland, whereas before this time, the Kings of England were only entituled Lords of Ireland: and this title was given him both by the Parliament here, and by the Parliament holden in Ireland, before Sir Anthony Sentleger Knight, the Kings Deputy there.

Arthur Plantagenet Vicount Lisle dieth of joy. About this time Arthur Plantagenet Vicount Lisle, base Son to King Edward the fourth, having been imprison'd upon suspicion of a practice for betraying of Callice to the French, whilst he was the Kings Lieutenant there, was now found to be innocent of the Fact: and thereupon the King, to make him some reparation for his disgrace, sent him a Ring, and a very gracious message, by Sir Thomas Wriothesley his Secretary; whereat the said Vicount took so great joy, that the night following, of that very joy he died: so deadly a thing is any passion, even joy it self, if it be extreme. After his death Sir John Dudley, his wives son, was created Vicount Lisle. This Sir John Dudley was Son to Edmund Dudley, beheaded in the first year of this Kings Reign, and was made Vicount Lisle in right of his Mother.

Sir John Dudley, Son to Edmund Dudley beheaded, is made Vicount Lisle. During this Parliament, one George Ferrers Gentleman, servant to the King, and Burgefs for the Town of Plymouth in Devonshire, in going to the Parliament-House, was arrested in London by a Process out of the Kings Bench, for a Debt wherein he was late afore condemned, as surety for one Welden, at the suit of one White: which Arrest being signified to Sir Thomas Moyle Knight, Speaker then of the Parliament, and to the Knights and Burgeffes there; order was taken, that the Serjeant of the Parliament, called Saint-John, should be sent to the Counter in Breadstreet, (whither the said Ferrers was carried) and there demand to have him delivered. But the Officers of the Counter not only refused to deliver him, but gave the Serjeant such language, that they fell at last to an affray; at which time the Sheriffs coming, they also took their Officers part; so as the Serjeant was fain to return without the Prisoner: which being signified to the Speaker and the Burgeffes, they took the matter in so ill part, that they would sit no more without their Burgeffs: and thereupon rising up, repaired to the upper House, where the whole Case was declared by the Speaker, before Sir Thomas Audeley Lord Chancellour, and the Lords and

Judges there assembled; who judging the contempt to be very great, referred the punishment thereof to the House of Commons it self: whereupon returning to their places again, upon new debate of the Case, they took order that their Serjeant should once more repair to the Sheriffs of London, and demand the prisoner, without carrying any Writ or Warrant for the matter. It is true, the Lord Chancellour offered to grant a Writ, but the House of Commons refused it; being of a clear opinion, that all commandments from the neather House were to be executed by their Serjeant without Writ, only by shewing his Mace, which is his Warrant. But before the Serjeants return into London, the Sheriffs better advised became more mild, and upon the second demand delivered the Prisoner without any denial: but then the Serjeant had further in charge, to command the Sheriffs and Clerks of the Counter, to appear personally the next morning before the House of Commons: where appearing, they were charged by the Speaker with their contempt, and compelled to make immediate answer, without being admitted to any counsel. Sir Roger Cholmley Recorder of London offered to speak in the cause, but was not suffered, nor any other but the parties themselves. In conclusion, the Sheriffs and White who had caused the Arrest, were committed to the Tower; the Officer that did the Arrest, with four other Officers, to Newgate; but after two or three days, upon the humble suit of the Mayor, were set at liberty: and because the said Ferrers, being in execution upon a condemnation of debt, and set at large by priviledge of Parliament, was not by Law to be brought again into execution, and so the Creditor without remedy for his Debt against him as his principal debtor, therefore after long debate, by the space of nine or ten days together, they at last resolved to make an Act of purpose, to revive the execution of the said debt against Welden who was principal debtor, and to discharge Ferrers that was but surety: wherein notwithstanding the House was divided, and the Act passed but by fourteen voices. The King being advertised of this proceeding, called before him the Lord Chancellour and the Judges, the Speaker and divers of the Lower House, to whom he declared his opinion to this effect: first commending their wisdom, in maintaining the priviledges of their House, (which he would not have to be infringed in any point) he alledged, that he being the head of the Parliament, and attending in his own person upon the business thereof, ought in reason, to have priviledge for himself and all his Servants attending upon him; so as if the said Ferrers had been no Burgeffs, but only his servant, yet in that respect, he was to have the priviledge as well as any other. For I understand (said he) that you, not only for your own persons, but also for your necessary servants, even to your Cooks and Horse-keepers, enjoy the same priviledge; insomuch, as my Lord Chancellour here present hath informed us, that whilst he was Speaker of the Parliament, the Cook of the Temple was arrested in London, and in execution upon a Statute of the Staple; and for so much as the said Cook during all the Parliament served the Speaker in that office, he was taken out of execution by Privilege of Parliament; the Prerogative of which Court (as our learned Council informeth us) is so great, that all Acts and Proceffes coming out of any other Court, must for a time cease and give place to it. And touching the party himself, though for his presumption he was worthy to have lost his debt, yet I commend your equity, that have restored him to his debt against him that was the principal. When the King had said this, Sir Edward Montacute, Lord Chief Justice, rose up and confirmed by many reasons all that the King had said, as likewise did all the other Lords, none speaking any thing to the contrary.

It was now the four and thirtieth year of King Henry's Reign, when in May he took a loan of money of all such as were valued at fifty pounds and upwards in the Subsidy-Book. The Lord Privy-Seal, the Bishop of Winchester, Sir Thomas Baker, and Sir Thomas Wriothesley were Commissioners for the loan in London, who so handled the matter, that of some chief Citizens they obtained a thousand marks imprest to the Kings use: for which Privy-Seals were delivered to repay it again within two years.

The Scots enter the English Borders: against whom the King sends an Army, and repels them.

The Scots frightened with a conceit.

At this time were many complaints made by the English against the Scots, partly for receiving and maintaining divers English Rebels, fled into Scotland, and partly for invading the English Borders: but still when the King of England was preparing to oppose them, the Scottish King would send Ambassadors to treat of reconciliation; till at last, after many delusory pranks of the Scots, the King of England, no longer enduring such abuses, sent the Duke of Norfolk his Lieutenant General, accompanied with the Earls of Shrewsbury, Darby, Cumberland, Surrey, Hartford, Angus, Rutland, the Lords of the North parts, Sir Anthony Brown Master of the Kings Horse, and Sir John Gage Comptroller of the Kings House, with others to the number of twenty thousand men; who on the one and twentieth of October entred Scotland, where staying but eight days only, he burnt above eighteen Towns, Abbeys, and Castles, and then, without having Battel offered, for want of victuals returned to Barwick. As soon as he returned, comes abroad the King of Scots; raiseth a power of fifteen thousand men, and using great threatnings what he would do, invaded the West Borders: but the edge of his threatening was soon taken off; for the Bastard Dacres, with Jack of Musgrave, setting upon them with only an hundred Light Horse, and Sir Thomas Wharton with three hundred, put them to flight; upon a conceit, that the Duke of Norfolk with all his Army had been come into those parts: where were taken prisoners of the Scots, the Earls of Cassil and Glencarn, the Lord Maxwell Admiral of Scotland, the Lord Flemming, the Lord Somerwel, the Lord Oliphant, the Lord Gray, Sir Oliver Sincleer, the Kings Minion, John Ross Lord of Gray, Roger Erskin Son to the Lord Erskin, Car Lord of Gredon, the Lord Maxwells two Brothers, John Lesley Bastard-Son to the Earl of Roths, George Hume Lord of Hemetton, with divers other men of account, to the number of above two hundred, and more than eight hundred of meaner calling: so as some one English man, and some women also, had three or four prisoners in their hands. At which overthrow the King of Scots took such grief, that he fell into a burning Ague, and thereof died, leaving behind him one only Daughter. And here King Henry began to apprehend a greater matter than the Victory; for he and his Council conceived, that his Daughter would be a fit match for his Son Prince Edward, thereby to make a perpetual union of the two Kingdoms: and to this purpose they conferred with the Lords whom they had taken prisoners, who exceeding glad of the proposition, and promising to further it by all the possible means they could, were thereupon set at liberty, and suffered to return home. Coming into Scotland, and acquainting the Earl of Arran with the motion, who was chosen Governour of the young Queen, and of the Realm; the matter with great liking was entertained, and in Parliament of the three Estates in Scotland, the Marriage was confirmed, and a Peace between the two Realms for ten years was Proclaimed, and Ambassadors sent into England, for sealing the conditions. But Beton Archbishop of Saint Andrews, being Cardinal, and at the Popes devotion, and therefore an utter enemy to King Henry, so crossed the business, that it came to nothing, but ended in a War between the two Kingdoms; so as in March the year following, the Lord Seymour Earl of Hartford, with an Army by Land, & Sir John Dudley Lord Lisle, with a Fleet by Sea, met at New-Castle, and there joyned together, for invading of Scotland. With the Earl of Hartford, were the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Lords Cobham, Clinton, Conyers, Stinton, the Lord William Howard, with Knights and others, to the number of ten thousand; with Sir John Dudley the Admiral, were two hundred sail of Ships. On the fourth of May, the whole Army was landed two miles from the Town of Leith, at a place called Granthor Garg, and there the Lord Lieutenant putting his men in order, marched towards the Town of Leith; the Lord Admiral led the Foreward, the Lieutenant the Battel, and the Earl of Shrewsbury the Rereward. Before they came to the Town of Leith, the Cardinal with six hundred Horse, besides Foot, lay in the way to impeach the passage; but they were so assailed by the Harquebusars, that they were glad to flie, and the first man that fled was the Cardinal himself, and then the Earls of Huntley, Murray, and Bothwell: hereupon the English made forward to Leith, and entred it without any great resistance. The sixth of May they marched towards Edinburgh, and as they approached the Town, the Provost with some of the Burgers came and offered the Keys of the Town to the Lord Lieutenant, upon condition they might depart with bag and baggage, and the Town to be preserved from fire: but the Lord Lieutenant told them, their falsehood had been such, as deserved no favour, and therefore unless they would deliver the Town absolutely without any condition, he would proceed in his enterprise and burn the Town. Here we may see what it is to make men desperate; for to this the Provost answered, They were better then to stand upon defence: and so indeed they did, and made the English glad to retire; for the

Castle

Castle shot so fiercely upon them, that having burnt only a part of the Town, they returned to Leith; but whilst they lay there, they so wasted the Country, that within seven miles every way of Edenburgh, there was not a Town, nor Village, nor house that was left unburnt. At Leith the eleventh day of May, the Lord General made Knights, the Lord Clinton, the Lord Conyers, Sir William Wroughton, Sir Thomas Holcroft, Sir Edward Dorrel, Sir Francis Hotham, and others, to the number of at least three-score. In Leith Haven, they seized upon all the Scottish Ships, whereof two were of notable fairness, the one called the Salamander, given by the French King at the marriage of his Daughter into Scotland; the other called the Unicorn, made by the late Scottish King: the ballast of which two Ships was Canon-shot, whereof they found in the Town to the number of four-score thousand. On the fifteenth of May, their Army and their Fleet departed from Leith, both in one hour, having first set the Town on fire, and burned it to the ground: from Leith the English Army marched to Seaton, from thence to Haddington, from thence to Dunbar, from thence to Ranton, all which Towns and Castles, with divers others, they burnt and utterly defaced; and on the eighteenth of May came to Barwick, not having lost in all the journey above fourteen men.

The third of June this year, there came out of Ireland three Lords, of whom Obrine was here created Earl of Thomond, (which honour his posterity enjoyeth to this day) Mack William a Bary was created Earl of Clanrickard, and Mack Gilpatrick was made Baron of Ebrankie.

King Henry marries the Lady Katharine Par, Widow of the Lord Latimer.

King Henry had already had five Wives, all of them Maids, and no good luck with any of them; he will now therefore try his fortune with a Widow, and thereupon the twelfth of June, in the five and thirtieth year of his Reign, he took to Wife the Lady Katharine Par, Widow of the Lord Latimer late deceased, who was then proclaimed Queen: but how lucky this match would have proved, if the King had longer lived, God knows, seeing in a short time of three years they lived together, it was no small danger she escaped: which though it happened not till a year or two after this time, yet will not unfitly be spoken of in this place, that so her story may come together. This Queen, as being an earnest Protestant, had many great adversaries, by whom she was accused to the King, to have Heretical books found in her closet; and this was so much aggravated against her, that they prevailed with the King, to sign a Warrant to commit her to the Tower, with a purpose to have her burnt for Heretic.

She is accused to the King of Heretic.

This Warrant was delivered to Wriothesley Lord Chancellour, and he by chance, or rather indeed by Gods Providence, letting it fall from him, it was taken up and carried to the Queen; who having read it, went soon after to visit the King, at that time keeping his Chamber, by reason of a fore Leg: being come to the King, he presently fell into talk with her, about some points of Religion, demanding her resolution therein; but she knowing that his nature was not to be crost, specially considering the case she was in, made him answer, that she was a woman accompanied with many imperfections, but his Majesty was wise and judicious, of whom she must learn as of her Lord and Head. Not so by Saint Mary, (said the King) for you are a Doctor, Kate, to instruct us, and not to be instructed by us, as often we have seen heretofore. Indeed Sir (said she) if your Majesty have so conceived, I have been mistaken; for if heretofore I have held talk with you touching Religion, it hath been to learn of your Majesty some point, whereof I stood in doubt, and sometimes that with my talk I might make you forget your present infirmity. And is it even so sweet heart? (quoth the King) why then we are friends, and so kissing her, gave her leave to depart. But soon after, was the day appointed by the Kings Warrant for apprehending her; on which day, the King disposed to walk in the Garden, had the Queen with him, when suddenly the Lord Chancellour with forty of the Guard came into the Garden with a purpose to apprehend her: whom as soon as the King saw, he flew to him, and calling him knave and fool, bid him avaunt out of his presence. The Queen seeing him so angry with him, began to intreat for him: to whom the King said, Ah poor soul! thou little knowest what it is he came about; of my word sweet-heart he hath been to thee a very knave. And thus by Gods Providence was this Queen preserved, who else had tasted of as bitter a cup, as any of his former Wives had done.

And by what means she avoids the danger.

About this time King Henry and the Emperour sent Garret and Toyson d'or, Kings at Arms, to demand performance of certain Articles of the French King; which if he denied, they were then commanded to besiege him: but the French King would not suffer them to come within his land, and so they returned: whereupon King Henry caused the said demands to be declared to the French Ambassadour at Westminster; and in July sent over six thousand men, under the leading of Sir John Wallop, accompanied with divers Knights and Gentlemen. Sir Thomas Seymour was Marshall of the Army, Sir Robert Bowes Treasurer, Sir Richard Cornwall Captain of the Horse, and Sir George Carew his Lieutenant. There were likewise Sir Tho. Palmour, Sir John Rainsford, Sir John Saint-John, and Sir John Gascoigne, Knights, that were Captains of the Foot. Their Commission was to joyn with the Emperour, and together to make War upon France. The third of August open War was proclaimed in London, between the Emperour and the King of England on the one part, and the French King on the other, as mortal enemy to them both, and to all other Christian Princes besides, as he that had confederated himself himself with the Turk. Sir John Wallop marching forth of Callice with his Army, joyned with the Emperours Forces, who together went and besieged Landrecies, a Town lately fortified by the French, lying within the Borders of the Emperours Dominions: to raise this siege the French King had raised a mighty Army, with which he came on as if he meant to give the Emperour Battel: and thereupon the Emperour raising his siege, with a purpose to encounter him, the French King took the opportunity to put men and victuals into the Town, which was the thing he intended; and having done this, the night following departed with his Army: and then the Emperour seeing him gone, and finding the Winter coming on, and no hope of sudden getting the Town, being now newly supplied, he also broke up his Army, and returned home.

This year, the Sunday before Christmases, the Lord William Parre, Brother to the Queen, who had married the Daughter and Heir of Henry Bourchier Earl of Essex, was at Hampton-Court created Earl of Essex; and Sir William Parre Knight, Uncle to them both, was made Lord Parre of Horton, and Lord Chamberlain to the Queen; and on New-years day Sir Thomas Wriothesley, the Kings Secretary, was made Lord Wriothesley of Titchfield.

In June this year, Matthew Earl of Lenox fled out of Scotland, and came into England, whom King Henry received kindly, and gave him in marriage the Lady Margaret his Sisters Daughter, by whom he had Henry, Father of our late King James of blessed memory.

Thomas Audeley Lord Chancellor being lately dead, Thomas Lord Wriothesley succeeded him in the place: and now was an Army levied to go for France. The Duke of Norfolk and the Lord Privy Seal, accompanied with the Earl of Surrey the Dukes Son, the Lord Gray of Wilton, the Lord Ferrers of Chartley, and his Son, Sir Robert Devereux, Sir Tho. Cheiney Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, the Lord Montjoy, Sir Francis Bryan, Sir Thomas Poynings Captain of Guysnes, with many other Knights and Gentlemen, about Whitsuntide passed over to Callice, and marching towards Muttrel, joyned with the Emperours Forces, under the leading of the Count de Baron; which two Armies laid siege to Muttrel, whereof Monsieur de Bies, one of the Marshals of France, was Captain: but being then at Bulloigne, and hearing of the siege of Muttrel, he left Bulloigne, and with his Forces came thither, which was the thing that was desired, to draw him from Bulloigne; and thereupon was the Duke of Suffolk appointed to pass over with the Kings Army, accompanied with the Earl of Arundel Marshal of the Field, the Lord Saint John, the Bishop of Winchester, Sir John Gage Comptroller of the Kings House, Sir Anthony Brown Master of the Kings Horse, with divers others, who the nineteenth of July came and encamped before Bulloigne. The four and twentieth of July the King in person, accompanied with divers of the Nobility, came to Callice; and the six and twentieth encamped before Bulloigne on the North-side. Many batteries and assaults were made, so long, till at last the Town upon composition yielded, and the Duke of Suffolk entred and took possession, suffering six thousand French, as was agreed, with bag and baggage to depart. The eighth of September King Henry entred the Town himself, and then leaving the Lord Lisle Lord Admiral his Deputy there, he returned into England, landing at Dover the first of October. Many enterprises after this were made by the Dauphin of France and by Monsieur de Bies for recovery of Bulloigne, but they were still repulsed, and the English kept the Town in spite of all they could do; although at one time there came an Army of eighteen thousand foot, at another time an Army, wherein were reckoned twelve thousand Launce-Knights, twelve thousand French Footmen, six thousand Italians, four thousand of Legionary Souldiers of France, a thousand men of Arms, besides eight thousand light Horse; great Forces certainly to come and do nothing.

Whilest these things were doing about Bul-loigne, the Ships of the West Country and other places wafted abroad on the Seas, and took above three hundred French Ships; so that the Gray-fryers Church in London was laid full of Wine, the Austin-fryers and Black-fryers full of Herrings and other Fish, which should have been conveyed into France.

About this time the King demanded a Benevolence of his Subjects, towards his Wars in France and Scotland; to which purpose, the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Suffolk, and other of the Kings Council sate at Baynards-Castle, where they first called before them the Mayor and Aldermen; and because Richard Read Alderman would not agree to pay as they set him, he was commanded to serve the King in his Wars in Scotland, which the obstinate man rather chose to do, than he would pay the rate he was required. But being there, he was taken prisoner by the Scots, to his far greater damage, than if he had agreed to the Benevolence required: for at this time Sir Ralph Evers Lord Warden of the Marches, after many fortunate Roads into Scotland, assembled four thousand men, and entring Scotland now again, was encountered by the Earl of Arran, by whom he and the Lord Ogle, and many other Gentlemen were slain, and divers were taken prisoners, of whom Alderman Read was one.

It was now the seven and thirtieth year of King Henry's Reign, when on Saint Georges day Sir Thomas Wriothesley Lord Chancellor was made Knight of the Garter: also Trinity Term was adjourned by reason of the Wars, but the Exchequer and the Court of the Tents were open.

At this time the English Fleet went before New-haven, but being there encountered by a far greater Fleet of French, they returned; with whose retreat the French Admiral emboldened, came upon the Coast of Suffex, where he landed Souldiers; but upon firing of the Beacons was driven back: after which he landed two thousand men in the Isle of Wight, but was there repelled, though reported, to have in his Ships three score thousand men.

In August this year died the valiant Captain the Lord Poynings, the Kings Lieutenant of his Town of Bulloigne; and the same month also died died at Guilford the noble Duke of Suffolk, Charles Brandon, Lord Great Master of the Kings House, whose body was honourably buried at Windsor at the Kings cost.

About this time the Scots, having received aid out of France, approached the English Borders, but durst attempt nothing: whereupon the Earl of Hartford, Lieutenant of the North-parts, raising an Army of twelve thousand men, English and Strangers, entred Scotland, and burnt a great part of Mers and Tividale, as Kelsey Abbey, and the Town, the Abbeyes of Medrofs, Driborne and Tedworth, with a hundred Towns and Villages more: when on the sixteenth of September, an Army of Scots and French attempted to enter into England on the East Borders, but in a Streight were set upon by the English, who slew and took of them to the number of seven score, amongst whom was the Lord Humes's Son, and a principal French Captain. In another Road, which they made into the West Borders, the Lord Maxwell's Son, and divers other were taken: but then at another time, (such is the chance of War) five hundred English entring the West Borders of Scotland were discomfited, and the greatest part of them either taken or slain.

And now to revenge the presumptuous attempts of the French upon the Isle of Wight, the Lord Admiral with his Fleet approached the Coasts of Normandy, landed six thousand men at Treport, burnt the Suburbs of that Town with the Abbey, destroyed thirty Ships there in the Haven, and then returned, not having lost above fourteen persons in the whole Voyage.

concluded between the two Kings of England
France.

At this time the Earl of Hartford lying at Bulloigne, had in his Army above four score thousand men, and many skirmishes passed between him and the French; till at last, by mediation of the Emperour and divers other Princes, a meeting was appointed to treat of a Peace between the two Kings of England and France. Hereupon there came to Guysnes for the King of England, the Earl of Hartford, the Bishop of Winchester, Sir John Dudley, Vicount Lisle, Baron of Mampus, and High Admiral of England, Sir William Paget the Kings Secretary, and Doctor Nicholas Wotton Dean of Canterbury: For the French King there came to Ard, Claude Danebolt Admiral of France, the Bishop of Eureux, Monsieur Raymond chief President of Roan, and the Secretary Bouchetel. Divers times they met betwixt Ard and Guysnes, and after long debating of matters, and divers breakings off, at length, the seventh of June, a Peace was concluded, and proclaimed in the City of London, on Whitfunday the thirtieth of June, by sound of Trumpet; and the same day in like manner at Paris and Roan: the chief Article of which Peace was this, that the French King paying to the King of England eight hundred thousand Crowns, within the term of eight years, should have Bulloigne again restored to him, which in the mean time should remain in possession of the King of England, as a pledge for assurance of the said money. And now for a full establishment of this Peace, the Vicount Lisle Lord Admiral, with the Bishop of Duresme, and divers other Lords were sent into France, to take Oath of the French King, and of the Dauphin; as likewise at the same time divers Lords came from the French King, to take Oath of King Henry, who by the way were met by the young Prince and many Lords, and conducted to the King at Hampton-Court.

In his seven and thirtieth year, the three and twentieth of November, a Parliament began at Westminster, wherein was granted to the King a Subsidy both of Spirituality and Temporality, and all Colledges, Chantries and Hospitals were given to him to dispose of. The four and twentieth of December the Parliament was prorogued, on which day the King coming to the Parliament-House, the Speaker made to him an Oration, which the Lord Chancellor was used to answer, but at this time the King would answer himself: the effect whereof was, that where Master Speaker had commended him for many excellent qualities that were in him, he thanked him for it, not that he had them, but for putting him in mind how necessary it was he should have them: then he thanked the whole House for their Subsidy, and for giving him the Colledges and Chantries, which he promised should be bestowed to the Glory of God & good of the Realm: lastly, he acknowledged their love to himself, but found fault with want of love to one another; for what love, where there is not concord? and what concord, when one calleth another Heretick and Anabaptist; and he again calleth him Papist and Hypocrite? and this not only amongst those of the Temporality, but even the Clergy-men themselves preach one against another, inveigh one against another, without Charity or Discretion; some to be stiff in their old Mumpsimus, and others so curious in their new Sumpsimus, that few or none preacheth truly and sincerely the word of God. Now therefore let this be amended, fear and serve God, be in Charity among your selves, to the which I, as your Supreme Head and Sovereign Lord, exhort and require you. And this said, the Acts were openly read; to some he gave his Royal assent, and to divers assented not.

Whilst the Oath for the Peace was thus taken by both Kings, Bulloigne remaining still in King Henry's possession, Monsieur de Chatillon Captain of Mont-pleasier began to make a new Bastillion at the very mouth of the Haven of Bulloigne, naming it Chatillons Garden: hereof the Lord Gray of Wilton, as then Deputy of Bulloigne, advertised the King by Sir Thomas Palmour, requiring to know his pleasure whether he should raze it, as a thing very incommodious to the Town, or let it stand. The King asked advice of his Council, who all agree, that the Conditions of the Peace ought in no wise to be infringed, and therefore to let the Bastillion stand: whereupon the King caused his Secretary the Lord Paget to write a Letter to the Lord Gray to that purpose; but then called Sir Thomas Palmour secretly to him, bidding him tell the Lord Gray, that whatsoever he had written in his Letter, yet with all speed possible he should raze the Fortification to the ground. Sir Thomas Palmour replying, that a message by word of mouth being contrary to his Letter, would never be believed; Well (said the King) do you tell him as I bid you, and leave the doing it to his choice. Upon the coming back of Sir Tho. Palmour, the Lord Gray called a Council, shewing them the Kings Letter, and with- all Sir Thomas Palmour's Message, and then asked their advice, what in this case he should do; who all agreed without any question, that the Letter was to be followed, and not the Mes- sage: to which the Lord Gray himself said no- thing, but caused the Message to be written verbatim from Sir Thomas Palmour's mouth, and those of the Council to set their hands to it: this done, the night following he issued forth with a company of armed men and Pio- neers, and overthrew the Fortifications to the ground, and then sent Sir Thomas Palmour with Letters to the King, who, as soon as he saw him, asked aloud, What, will he do it or no? Sir Thomas Palmour delivering his Letter, said, Your Majesty shall know by these; but then the King half angry, Nay tell me (saith he) will he do it or no? Being then told it was done, and the Fortifications clean razed, he turned to his Lords and said, What say you my Lords to this, Chatillons Garden is razed to the floor? Where- to one presently answered, he that had done it was worthy to lose his head: to which the King straightly replied, That he would rather lose a dozen such heads as his was that so judged, than one such servant as had done it; and therewith commanded the Lord Gray's Pardon should presently be drawn; the which he sent with Letters of great thanks, and promise of re- ward. The cause why the King took this course was this, lest if he had written the razing of the Fortification in this Letter, it might have come to the French-mens knowledge, before it could have been done, and so have been prevented. And this may be taken as a scantling of King Henry's great capacity.

ry dieth.

It is now the eight and thirtieth year of his Reign, when about Michaelmas, Thomas Duke of Norfolk, and Henry Earl of Surrey his Son and Heir, upon certain surmises of Treason, were committed to the Tower of London: and the thirteenth of January, the King then lying at the point of death, the said Earl was arraigned in the Guild-hall, before the Lord Mayor, the Lord Chancellor, and other Lords there in Commission. The special matter wherewith he was charged, was the bearing of certain Arms that were said to belong to the King and to the Prince; though the Earl justified the bearing of them as belonging to divers of his Ancestours; affirming withall, that he had the opinion of Heralds therein. But this notwithstanding, being no Lord of the Parliament, he was tryed by a common Jury, by them was found guilty, and thereupon had judgment of death; and the nineteenth of January was be- headed on the Tower-hill. The Duke was attain- ted by Parliament, and kept in prison, till in the first year of Queen Mary the Attalnder was reversed. The death of this Earl might lay an imputation of cruelty upon King Henry, if a just jealousie growing from the many circumstan- ces of the Earls greatness, in the tender age of his own Son, did not excuse him.

Soon after the death of this Earl, the King himself died; having made his last Will, in which he took order, that his Son Edward should succeed him in the Crown, and hedying without Issue, his Daughter Mary, and she dy- ing without Issue, his Daughter Elizabeth; al- though another order of succession had passed before by Act of Parliament. The Executors of his last Will were these sixteen; Thomas Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Wriothesley Lord Chancellor, Sir William Pawlet Lord Saint-John and great Master of the Houf- hold, Sir Edward Seymour Earl of Hartford and high Chamberlain of England, Sir John Russel Lord Privy-Seal, Sir John Dudley Vicount Lisle Lord Admiral, Cuthbert Tunstall Bishop of Dur- ham, Sir Anthony Brown Master of the Horse, Sir Edmund Montacute Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, Sir Thomas Bromley one of the Justices of the Kings Bench, Sir Edward North Chancellor of the Augmentation, Sir William Paget Knight of the Order, Sir Anthony Denny, Sir William Herbert, Sir Edward Wotton Treasurer of Callice, and Nicholas Wotton Dean of Canterbury and York. To whom were adjoyn- ed as Assistants these twelve; Henry Fitz-Allen Earl of Arundel, William Par Earl of Essex, Sir Thomas Cheyney Treasurer of the Household, Sir John Gage Comptroller, Sir Anthony Wingfield Vice-Chamberlain, Sir William Peter Principal Secretary, Sir Richard Rich, Sir John Baker of Sissingherst in Kent, Chancellor of the Exche- quer, Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Thomas Seymour, Sir Richard Southwell, and Sir Edward Peckham. And it was not without need to leave a full Council- Table, considering in what terms he left the Kingdom when he died. Abroad, in league with the Emperour, at Peace with the King of France; but whether these were not personal only, and no longer binding than King Henry lived, might be doubted: with the Scots at deadly feud; with the Pope at utter defiance; from both which Coasts there could be expected but little fair weather: at home the frame of Religion extremely disjoynted; and the Clergy that should set it in frame, out of frame themselves; the minds of the people extremely distracted; and the Nobility that should cement them, scarce holding themselves together. And in this state was the Kingdom when King Henry the eighth died, in the year 1547. the fifty sixth of his life, and of his Reign the eight and thirtieth.

Of his Taxations.

IN his fourth year, in a Parliament at West- minster, was granted to the King two Fif- teenths of the Temporality, and two Tenths of the Clergy, and Head-money; of every Duke ten Marks, an Earl five pounds, a Baron four pounds, a Knight four Marks, and every man valued at eight hundred pounds in Goods to pay four Marks, and so after that rate till him that was valued at forty shillings, and he paid twelve pence, and every man and woman of fifteen years and upward four pence. In his sixth year, a Parliament was holden, wherein divers Subsidies were granted to the King, to- wards the charges of his Wars in France. In his fourteenth year, order was taken by the Cardinal, that the true value of all mens sub- stance might be known, and he would have had every man sworn, to tell what he was worth, King, and and required a tenth part thereof, towards the Kings charges in the present Wars, as the Spirituality had granted a fourth part. This the Londoners thought very hard, and thereupon were excused for taking Oath, and were allowed to bring in their Bills upon their honesties: but when all was done, after much labouring by the Cardinal, the Clergy granted one half of all their yearly Spiritual Revenues, for five years, and the Temporality two shillings in the pound, from twenty pounds upwards; and from forty shillings to twenty pounds, of every twenty shillings twelve pence; and under forty shillings, of every head of sixteen years and upwards, four pence, to be paid in every two years. In his sixteenth year, the Cardinal of his own head attempted by Commission, to draw the people to pay the sixth part of every mans substance in Plate or Money; but this was generally opposed, and the people in many Countreys rose upon it, so as coming to the Kings knowledge, he utterly disavowed it, and blamed the Cardinal exceedingly for attempting it. In his four and twentieth year, in a Parliament then holden, a fifteenth was granted to the King, towards his Charges of making Fortifications against Scotland. In his one and thirtieth year, a Subsidy of two shillings in the pound of Lands, and twelve of Goods, with four fifteens, were granted to the King, towards his charges of making Bulwarks. In his five and thirtieth year, a Subsidy was granted to be paid in three years, every English-man being worth in Goods twenty shillings and upwards to five pounds, to pay four pence of every pound; and from five pounds to ten pounds, eight pence; and from ten pounds to twenty pounds, 12 pence; from twenty pounds and upwards, of every pound two shillings: Strangers, as well Denizens as others, being Inhabitants, to pay double. And for Lands, every English-man paid eight pence of the pound, from twenty shillings to five pounds, and from five pounds to ten pounds sixteen pence, and from ten pounds to twenty pounds two shillings, and from twenty pounds and upwards, of every pound three shillings: Strangers double. The Clergy six shillings in the pound of Benefices, and every Priest having no Benefice, but an Annual stipend, six shillings eight pence yearly, during three years.

Inclosures commanded to be laid open.

IN a Parliament holden his sixth year, divers Laws were made, but two most spoken of; one for Apparel, another for Labourers. In his twelfth year, he caused the Statutes against Inclosures to be revived, and commanded that decayed Houses should be built up again, and that Inclosed Grounds should be laid open; which though it did some good, yet not so much as it might have done, if the Cardinal for his own benefit had not procured liberty for great men to keep up their Inclosures, to the oppression of poor men. In his seventeenth year, the King lying at Eltham, divers Ordinances were made by the Cardinal touching the Governance of the Kings House, and were long after called the Statutes of Eltham. In his eighteenth year, in the month of May, Proclamation was made against all unlawful Games, so that in all places, Tables, Dice, Cards, and Bowls were taken and burnt; but this Order continued not long, for young men being restrained from these Games, fell some to drinking, some to stealing of Coneyes and Deer, and such other misdemeanours. Also in this year was an inhaunting of Coin, for the preventing the carrying it over to places where it went at a higher rate; so that the Angel that went before but for seven shillings, should now go for seven and six pence, and every Ounce of Gold should be five and forty shillings, which was before but forty, and other Coins accordingly. In his twentieth year, Sir James Spencer being Mayor of London, the Watch used on Midsummer-night was laid down. In his three and thirtieth year, in a Parliament then holden, an Act was made, that whosoever should poyson any person, should be boyled to death; by which Statute, one Richard Roose, who had poysoned divers persons in the Bishop of Rockesters place, was boyled to death in Smithfield, to the terrible example of all other. In his two and twentieth year, three Acts were made, one for probate of Testaments, another for Mortuaries, the third against plurality of Benefices, Non-residence, buying and taking of Farms by Spiritual persons. In his thirtieth year, it was ordained by Cromwell the Kings Vicar-General, that in all Churches a Register should be kept of every Wedding, Christning and Burial within the same Parish for ever. In his one and thirtieth year, the King first instituted and appointed fifty Gentlemen called Pensioners, to wait upon his Person, assigning to each of them fifty pounds a year, for the maintenance of themselves and two Horses. In his six and thirtieth year, Proclamation was made for the inhaunting of Gold to eight and forty shillings, and Silver to four shillings the Ounce; also he caused to be coined base Money, mingling it with Brasse, which was since that time called down the fifth year of Edward the sixth, and called in the second year of Queen Elizabeth. In his seven and thirtieth year, the Brothel-houses called the Stews, on the Bank-side in Southwark, were put down by the Kings Commandment, and it was done by Proclamation and sound of Trumpet. In his three and twentieth year, it was enacted, that Butchers should sell their meat by weight, Beef for a half-peny the pound, and Mutton for three farthings: also at this time foreign Butchers were permitted to sell their flesh in Leaden-hall Market, which before was not allowed. In his time also the Government of the President in the North was first instituted, and the first President there was Tunstall Bishop of Durham.

of Trent was called by Pope Paul the third, in the year 1542. which continued above forty years, but was never received in the Kingdom of France: which Council, by decreeing many things to be Points of Faith, which were not so accounted before, hath made no small distraction amongst Papists themselves. Against this Luther, King Henry wrote a Book with great bitterness, and with as great bitterness was answered. At the same time with Luther, there arose also in the same Countrey other Reformers of Religion, as Zuinglius, Oecolampadius, Melanchthon; who differing from Luther in some few points, made the difference which is at this day of Lutherans and Protestants, so called at first at Augsburg, for making a Protestation in defence of their Doctrine, which soon after spread all Christendom over. King Henry in the six and twentieth year of his Reign, had excluded the Popes Authority out of his Realm: but thinking the work not sufficiently done, as long as Abbeyes and Priories kept their station, which were, as it were, his Fortresses and Pillars; there was not long after means found to have them suppressed: for aspersions being laid upon them (and perhaps no more than truth) of Adulteries and Murthers, they by Act of Parliament, in his eight and twentieth year, at least near four hundred of them were suppressed, and all their Lands and Goods conferred upon the King. In his one and thirtieth year, all the rest: and lastly, in his five and thirtieth year, all Colledges, Chantries, and Hospitals. So as the Hives being now all removed, there have never since any Bees or Drones been seen in the Country. In this Kings time the City of Rome was taken and sacked by the Imperial Army, forcing the Pope to flee to his Castle Saint Angelo, there kept a Prisoner, till he agreed to such conditions as his Adversaries propounded. In the two and twentieth year of this Kings Reign, a Proclamation was set forth, that no person should purchase any thing from the Court of Rome; and this was the first blow given to the Pope in England. In his three and twentieth year, the Clergy submitting themselves to the King, for being found guilty of a Præmunire, were the first that called him Supreme Head of the Church. In his four and twentieth year a Parliament was holden, wherein one Act was made, that Bishops should pay no more Annates or money for their Bulls to the Pope; and another, that no person should appeal for any cause out of this Realm to the Court of Rome, but from the Commissary to the Bishop, and from the Bishop to the Archbishop, and from the Archbishop to the King, and all causes of the King to be tried in the upper House of the Convocation. In his six and twentieth year, in July, John Frith was burnt in Smithfield, and with him at the same stake one Andrew Howet a Taylor, both for denying the Real Presence in the Sacrament. And in a Parliament holden this year, an Act was made which Authorized the Kings Highness to be Supreme Head of the Church of England, and the Authority of the Pope to be abolished and then also was given to the King the First-fruits and Tenths of all Spiritual Livings.

And this year were many put to death, Papists for denying the Kings Supremacy, Protestants for denying the Real Presence in the Sacrament: and it is incredible what number for these two causes were put to death in the last ten years of the Kings Reign, of whom if we should make particular mention, it would reach a great way in the Book of Martyrs. In his eight and twentieth year, the Lord Cromwell was made Vicar-General under the King over the Spirituality, and sate divers times in the Convocation-house amongst the Bishops as Head over them; and in September this year he set forth Injunctions, commanding all Parsons and Curates to teach their Parishioners the Pater-noster, the Ave, and Creed, with the ten Commandments and the Articles of the Christian Faith, in the English tongue. In his one and thirtieth year, was set forth by the Bishops the Book of the Six Articles, condemning all for Hereticks, and to be burnt, that should hold,

1. That the Body of Christ was not Really present in the Sacrament after Consecration.

2. That the Sacrament might not be truly administered under one kind.

3. That Priests entred into Holy Orders might marry.

4. That Vows of Chastity entred into upon mature deliberation, were not to be kept.

5. That private Masses were not to be used.

6. That Auricular Confession was not necessary in the Church.

Articles

This year also the Religion of Saint Johns in England, commonly called the Order of Knights of the Rhodes, was dissolved; and on Ascension-day, Sir William Weston Knight, Prior of Saint Johns, departed this life, for thought, (as was reported) after he heard of the dissolution of his Order; for the King took all the Lands that belonged to that Order into his own hands. In his six and thirtieth year, the Litany or Procession was set forth in English, with commandment by the King, to be generally used in Parish-Churches.

Works of Piety done by him or others in his time.

UPON the suppression of Abbeyes, King Henry instituted six new Bishopricks, and six Cathedral-Churches, endowing them with convenient Maintenance: he also gave competent Pensions during their lives, to such Religious persons as were turned out of their Cloisters: he also instituted in both the Universities Professors of the Hebrew and Greek Tongues, of Divinity, Civil Law, and Physick, allowing to each of them forty pounds a year: he also founded a Colledge at Cambridge. He gave at his death a thousand Marks to the Poor; and to twelve poor Knights of Windsor, each of them twelve pence a day for ever, and every year a long Gown of white Cloth. But his greatest work of Piety was his putting down the Stews in Southmark, Margaret Countess of Richmond, the Kings Grandmother, founded two Colledges at Cambridge, Christs-Colledge and Saint Johns. In the fifth year of this Kings Reign George Monox Mayor of of London, re-edified the decayed Steeple of the Church of Waltham-stow in Essex, adding thereunto a Side-Ile with a Chappel, where he lieth buried: on the North-side of the Church-yard there he founded a fair Alms-house, for a Priest and thirteen poor men and women, giving them a weekly maintenance. He also, for the commodity of Travellers, made a Cawsey of Timber over the Marshes, from Waltham-stow to Lock-bridg towards London. In this Kings eighth year, Richard Fox Bishop of Winchester founded Corpus Christi Colledge in Oxford, minding to have made it an house for Monks; but Hugh Oldham, Bishop of Exeter, perswaded him to make it rather a Colledge for Scholars, and joyning with him in it, contributed great sums of money towards it, contenting himself only with the name of a Benefactor. In his seventh year King Henry builded the Tower of Greenwich. In this Kings time Cardinal Wolsey founded two Colledges, one at Oxford, another at Ipswich. To his Colledge at Oxford he had given four thousand pounds Land a year; but his Lands being all confiscate to the King, the King took the Lands, but yet gave to the Colledge a competent maintenance for a Dean, eight Prebends, and a hundred Fellows: which Colledge is now called Christ-Church, and accounts King Henry for their Founder. His Colledge at Ipswich was demolished. This Cardinal also built Hampton-Court, the chiefest at this day of all the Kings Houses; and built or enlarged White-hall, called then Tork-Place. King Henry in his four and twentieth year built also his Mansion-House of Saint James, where also he made a fair Park. This Place before had been an Hospital of Sisters, with whom the King compounded, giving them Pensions during their lives. In his thirtieth year, Nicholas Gibson Grocer, then Sheriff of London, builded a Free-School at Ratcliff near London, with maintenance for a Master and an Usher; he also builded an Alms-house there for fourteen poor and aged people. In his one and thirtieth year, Thomas Huntlow, the then Sheriff of London, gave certain Tenements to the Haberdashers, for finding of ten Alms-men of the same Company. In his six and thirtieth year, Sir John Allen, who had been twice Mayor of London, and of the Kings Council, gave at his death to the City of London a rich Collar of Gold, to be worn by the Mayor: which Collar was first worn by Sir William Laxton on Saint Edwards day, at the election of the new Mayor, who gave to every Ward in London twenty pounds, to be distributed among poor Householders; besides to fixscore persons, whereof threescore men, to every one a Gown of Broadcloth, and a black Cap; and threescore women, to every one a Gown of the like Cloth, and a white Kerchief. In the eight and thirtieth year, King Henry gave to the City of London, for relief of poor people in S. Bartholomews Spittle, the Church of the Gray-fryers, and two Parish-Churches, the one at S. Nicholas in the Shambles, the other S. Ewins in Newgate-market, all to be made one Parish-Church of the Gray-fryers; and in Lands he gave for the maintenance of the same five hundred Marks a year for ever:

and this Church to be named Christ-Church, founded by King Henry the Eighth. The Lady Elizabeth Hollys (the Widow of Sir William Hollys Knight, late Lord Mayor of the City of London) by her last Will and Testament, dated the 17 of February 1543. and in the thirty fifth year of the Reign of King Henry the Eighth, and proved at London in the Prerogative-Court of Canterbury the 28 of March 1544. did will her Executors, her Cousin Mr. Andrew Jud Alderman, (afterwards Knight and Lord Mayor of London) and her Brother Thomas Scopham, that they should provide a place or plot of ground, whereon should be erected six Alms-houses for six aged folks, men or women, or else both, to inhabit and dwell in; for the maintenance of which, she willed that her said Executors should purchase as much Land or Tenements within the City of London, or Liberties of the same, as would amount de claro above all charges to the yearly value of ten pound sterling, to be distributed in this manner: that is to say, to every of the said six Alms-people seven pence by the Week, to be paid on every Saturday or Sabbath-day weekly; and the remainder of the said yearly ten pound to be distributed in Coals yearly, in the Winter season, to and amongst the said six Alms-people: and this to continue for ever, whiles the World shall endure, as by the said Will may appear, which was afterwards accordingly effected by her said Executors. Which said Lady Elizabeth Hollys and Sir William Hollys, were great Grandfather and great Grandmother unto John Hollys Knight, Earl of Clare, &c. deceased.

Casualties in his time.

IN his ninth year happened a Sweating-sickness, whereof infinite multitudes in many parts of England died, especially in London; which was so violent, that in three, and sometimes two hours, it took away mens lives, and spared neither rich nor poor: for in the Kings Court, the Lord Clinton, the Lord Gray of Wilton, and many Knights, Gentlemen and Officers died of it. It began in July, and continued to the midst of December. In his thirteenth year was a great Mortality in London, and other places of the Realm, and many men of Honour and Worship died; amongst others, Doctor Fitz-James Bishop of London, in whose place Doctor Tunstall succeeded. In his fifteenth year, after great Rains and Winds, there followed so sore a Frost, that many died for cold; and some lost Fingers, some Toes, and many their Nails. In his nineteenth year, by extremity of rain in Seed-time, there followed a great dearth of Corn; which would have caused great calamity, but that it was relieved in London by Merchants of the Steel-yard out of Germany, and a thousand quarters supplied out of the Kings own provision. In his twentieth year, in the end of May, began in London another Sweating-sickness, which afterwards infected all places of the Realm; by reason whereof the Term was adjourned, and the Circuit of the Assises also. Many died in the Court, as Sir Franc. Poynes, Sir William Compton, Knights, and

William Carew Esquire of the Kings Privy-Chamber. The King himself for a space removed almost every day, till he came to Tittinghanger, a place of the Abbot of Saint Albans, where he with the Queen and a small number remained till the Sickness was past. In his thirtieth year, the manner of casting Pipes of Lead for conveyance of Water under ground, without using of Soder, was first invented by Robert Brocke Clerk, one of the Kings Chaplains: a profitable Invention; for by this, two men and a boy will do more in one day, than could have been done before by many men in many days. Robert Cooper Goldsmith was the first that made the Instruments, and put this Invention in practice. In a Rebellion in the North in this Kings time, when the Duke of Norfolk was sent with an Army against the Rebels, and that a day of Battel between them was appointed; it happened, that the night before a small Brook called Dun, running between the two Armies, upon the fall of a small rain swelled to such a height, that it was not passable by either Foot or Horse; a thing which had never happened before upon a great rain, and was then accounted (as indeed it was) no less than a Miracle. In his three and thirtieth year was a great Mortality in the Realm, by reason of hot Agues and Fluxes; and withall so great a drought, that small Rivers were clean dried, much Cattel died for lack of water, and the Thames was grown so shallow, that the Salt-water flowed above London-bridge, till the rain had encreased the fresh-waters. In his five and thirtieth year, the first cast Pieces of Iron that ever were made in England, were made at Buckstead in Suffex by Ralph Hage and Peter Bawde. In his six and thirtieth year, was a great Plague in London, so as Michaelmas Term was adjourned to Saint Albans, and there kept. In his seven and thirtieth year, on Tuesday in Easter-week, William Foxely, Pot-maker for the Mint of the Tower of London, fell asleep, and could not be waked with pinching, or burning, till the first day of the next Term, which was full fourteen days; and when he awaked, was found in all points as if he had slept but one night, and lived forty years after. About his fifteenth year, it happened that divers things were newly brought into England, whereupon this Rhyme was made,

Turkeys, Carps, Hops, Piccarel, and Beer,
Came into ENGLAND all in one year.

Of his Wives and Children.

King Henry had six Wives. His first was Katharine, Daughter of Ferdinand King of Spain, the Relict of his Brother Arthur. She lived his Wife above twenty years, and then was divorced from him; after which she lived three years by the name of Katharine Dowager: she deceased at Kimbolton in the County of Huntington, the eighth of January, in the year 1535. and lieth interred in the Cathedral-Church of Peterborough, under a Herse of black Say, having a white Cross in the midst. His second Wife was Anne, second Daughter of Sir Thomas

Bullen Earl of Wiltshire and Ormond. She was married to him the five and twentieth day of January, in the year 1533. lived his Wife three years, three months, and five and twenty days, and then was beheaded, and her body buried in the Choir of the Chappel in the Tower. His third Wife was Jane, Daughter to Sir John Seymour, and Sister to the Lord Edward Seymour Earl of Hartford, and Duke of Somerset: she was married to him the next day after the beheading of Queen Anne, lived his Wife one year, five months, and four and twenty days, and then died in Child-bed, and was buried in the midst of the Choir of the Church within the Castle of Windsor. His fourth Wife was Anne, Sister to the Duke of Cleve. She lived his Wife six months, and then was divorced: she remained in England long after the Kings death, and accompanied the Lady Elizabeth through London, at the solemnizing of Queen Maries Coronation. His fifth Wife was Katharine, Daughter of Edmund, and Niece of Thomas Howard his Brother, Duke of Norfolk. She was married to him in the two and thirtieth year of his Reign, lived his Wife one year, six months, and four days, and then was beheaded in the Tower of London, and buried in the Chancel of the Chappel by Queen Anne Bullen. His sixth Wife was Katharine, Daughter of Sir Thomas Parre of Kindal, and Sister to the Lord William Parre, Marquess of Northampton. She was first married to John Nevil Lord Latimer, and after his decease to the King at Hampton-Court, in the five and thirtieth year of his Reign. She was his Wife three years, six months, and five days; and then surviving him, was again married to Thomas Seymour Lord Admiral of England, unto whom she bore a Daughter, but died in her Child-bed, in the year 1548. He had Children by his first Wife Queen Katharine, Henry born at Richmond, who lived not full two months, and was buried at Westminster; also another Son, whose name is not mentioned, lived but a short time neither; then a Daughter, named Mary, born at Greenwich, in the eighth year of his Reign, who came afterward to be Queen of England. By his second Wife, Queen Anne Bullen, he had a Daughter named Elizabeth, born at Greenwich, in the five and twentieth year of his Reign; who succeeded her Sister Mary in the Crown: he had also by her a Son, but born dead. By his third Wife, Queen Jane, he had a Son named Edward, born at Hampton-Court in the nine and twentieth year of his Reign, who succeeded him in the Kingdom. Besides these, he had a base Son, named Henry Fitz-Roy, begotten of the Lady Talboise, called Elizabeth Blunt, born at Blackmore in Essex, in the tenth year of his Reign; who was made Duke of Richmond and Somerset, married Mary Daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk; with whom he lived not long, but died at S. James by Westminster, and was buried at Framlingham in Suffolk.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was exceeding tall of stature, and very strong, fair of complexion, in his latter days corpulent and burly. Concerning his conditions, ditions, he was a Prince of so many good parts, that one would wonder he could have any ill: and indeed he had not many ill, till flattery and ill counsel in his latter time got the upper hand of him. His Cruelty to his wives may not only be excused, but defended. For if they were incontinent, he did but Justice; if they were not so, yet it was sufficient to satisfy his conscience, that he thought he had cause to think them so: and if the Marriage-bed be honourable in all, in Princes it is sacred. In suppressing of Abbeyes he shewed not little Piety, but great Providence: for though they were excellent things being rightly used, yet most pestilent being abused; and then may the use be justly suppressed, when the abuse scarce possibly can be restrained. To think he suppressed Abbeyes out of covetousness & desire of gain, is to make him extremely deceived in his reckoning; for if we compare the profit with the charge that followed, we shall find him certainly a great loser by the Bargain. He was so far from pride, that he was rather too humble; at least he conversed with his Subjects in a more familiar manner than was usual with Princes. So valiant, that his whole life almost was nothing but exercises of valour; and though performed amongst his Friends in jest, yet they prepared him against his Enemies in earnest, and they that durst be his Enemies found it. It may be said, the complexion of his Government for the first twenty years was sanguine and jovial; for the rest, cholerick and bloody: and it may be doubted, whether in the former he were more prodigal of his own treasure, or in the latter of his Subjects blood: for as he spent more in Fictions, than any other King did in Realities; so in any distemper of his people, he had no other Physick but to open a vein. But we shall do him extreme wrong, to think that all the blood shed in his time was of his shedding: they were the Bishops that were the Draco, to make the bloody Laws; the Bishops that were the Phalaris, to put them in execution; the King oftentimes scarce knowing what was done. Certain it is, when a great Lord put a Gentlewoman the second time on the Rack, the King hearing of it, exceedingly condemned him for such extreme cruelty. As for Religion, though he brought it not to a full Reformation, yet he gave it so great a beginning, that we may truly say of that he did, Dimidium plus toto. They who charge him with the vice of Lust, let them shew such another example of Continence as was seen in him, to lie six months by a young Lady, and not to touch her; for so did he with the Lady Anne of Cleve. But this is to make Nosegays: I like better to leave every Flower growing upon its stalk, that it be gathered fresh; which will be done by reading the story of his Life.

Of his Death and Burial.

IT is recorded of him, that in his latter time he grew so fat and slothful, that engines were made to lift and remove him up and down. But howsoever, in the six and fiftieth year of his age, whether by a Dropsie, or by reason of an Ulcer in his Leg, he fell into a languishing Fever, which brought him into such extremity, that his Physicians utterly despaired of his life: whereof yet none durst speak a word to him, till Master Denny, one of his Privy-Chamber, took the boldness to go to him, telling him of the danger he was in, and withall putting him in mind to think of his souls health. To which he answered, that he confessed his sins to be exceeding great, yet had such confidence in the mercy of God through Christ, that he doubted not of forgiveness, though they had been much greater. And being then asked by Master Denny, if he would have any Divine brought to him with whom to confer; he answered, he would willingly have the Archbishop Cranmer, but not yet a while, till he had taken a little rest. Whereupon the Archbishop, being then at Croydon, was presently sent for: but before he could come, the King was grown speechless, only seeming to retain a little memory, so as putting out his hand, and the Archbishop desiring him to shew some sign of his faith in Christ, he then wrung the Archbishop hard by the hand, and immediately gave up the ghost, the eight and twentieth of January, in the year 1547. the six and fiftieth of his age, and of his reign the eight and thirtieth. His Body with great solemnity was buried at Windsor, under a most costly and stately Tomb, begun in copper and gilt, but never finished.

Men of note in his time.

MEN famous for the Sword were many in his time, and in a manner all, that it is hard making choice without being partial; unless we shall prefer Dukes of equal valour before others of meaner calling: and then will the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk hold worthily the place first; and next to them the young Earl of Surrey, who had been more fortunate if he had been less valiant. Of men of Letters in his time, there were whole Armies in foreign parts; the most famous were Budæus, Ludovicus Vives, John Reuchlin, Erasmus Roterodamus, Ursinus, Cornarius, Sadolet, Martin Bucer. In England were John Collet Dean of Pauls, and Founder of the School there: William Lilly, born at Odiham in Hampshire, first School-Master of Pauls School; Thomas Linaker, a learned Physician; John Skelton, a pleasant Poet; William Horman, Vice-Provost of Eaton, who wrote divers works; Sir Thomas More; William Tindal; John Rastal a Citizen and Stationer of London; Christopher Saint-Germaine, an excellent Lawyer; Sir Thomas Ellyot; John Leland, a diligent searcher of Antiquities; Sir John Bouchier Knight, Lord Berners, who translated the Chronicles of Froissard out of French into English; Henry Standish, Bishop of Saint Asaph, who wrote a Book against Erasmus translation of the New Testament; Arnold of London, who wrote certain Collections touching Historical matters; Thomas Lupset a Londoner, who wrote sundry vertuous Treatises; Henry Bradshaw, a black Monk, who wrote the life of Saint Werborough, and also a certain Chronicle; John Palsgrave a Londoner, who wrote instructions for the perfect understanding of the French tongue; John Skuifsh a Cornish-man, who wrote certain Abbreviations

Crowned.

It was now in the year 1547. when on the eight and twentieth of January King Henry dying, Prince Edward, his Son by his third Wife, the Lady Jane Seymour, and the onely Son he left behind him, as well by right of Inheritance, as by his last Will, succeeded him in the Kingdom; to whom, as being but nine years old, and therefore unripe for Government, he had assigned eight and twenty Counsellors: a fit number, if agreeing amongst themselves; too many, if at variance: and at variance they would soon fall, if there were not a Moderator to keep them in concord. The first work therefore necessary to be done in this new World, was to make choice of such a man as might be to the Counsellors a Moderator, a Protector to the King, and in his minority to the Kingdom. To this place, by common consent of the King and Council, Edward Seymour Earl of Hartford, the Kings Uncle, was chosen, to hold the place until the King should accomplish the age of eighteen years. In which Office the first thing he did, was to make the young King Knight; who presently thereupon, made Henry Hobbethorn Mayor of London Knight. And then, King Henry's Obsequies being solemnly performed, on the seventeenth of February were raised in honour, the Earl of Hartford Protector, to be Duke of Somerset; William Par Earl of Essex, to be Marquess of Northampton; Dudley Vicount Lisle, to be Earl of Warwick; Wriothesley Lord Chancellor, to be Earl of Southampton; Sir Thomas Seymour, the Protectors Brother, was made Lord Sudeley, and Admiral of England; Sir Richard Rich was made Lord Rich; Sir William Willoughby was made Lord Willoughby; and Sir Edmund Sheffield was made Lord Sheffield of Butterwick. On the nineteenth of Febr. the King in great state rode from the Tower to the Palace of Westminster, where the day following he was Crowned by the Archbishop of Canterbury, with all Rites accustomed, in great solemnity. At which time a general Pardon was proclaimed for all offenders, six only excepted; namely, the Duke of Norfolk, Cardinal Pool, Edward Courtney eldest Son to the Marquess of Exeter, Master Fortescue, Master Throgmorton, and Doctor Pate Bishop of Worcester, who was fled to Rome, to avoid taking the Oath of Supremacy. All which six continued unpardoned till the first year of Queen Mary, and then were restored. A few days after, the Earl of Southampton, Lord Chancellor, for being contumacious to the rest of the Lords in matters of counsel, was removed both from his Office of being Chancellor, and from his place in Council, and the great Seal was delivered to Sir William Pawlet, Lord Saint-John, and Lord great Master of the Kings Household.

Within two months after the death of King Henry, died Francis King of France also, for whom solemn Obsequies were kept in Pauls Church, as he likewise had kept before at Paris for King Henry. These two Kings were of so consenting natures, that they had certainly been great friends while they lived, if they had not been Kings, and that jealousie of state had not made them oftentimes not to be themselves.

King Henry before his death had left in charge with the Lords of his Council, by all means possible to procure a proceeding in the Marriage with the young Queen of Scots; and now in discharge thereof, the Lord Protector himself, with an Army of twelve thousand Foot, and six thousand Horse, besides Labourers and Pioneers thirteen hundred, entred Scotland the third of September: at which time also Edward Lord Clinton, with a Fleet of threescore Sail, assisted by Sea. But before he would do any hostile Act, he caused Proclamation to be made, that his coming was only to have performance of the Articles heretofore agreed on for the Marriage, tending to the good of both Kingdoms; which if they would yield unto, he would then return in peaceable manner. And the more to draw them on, where before it was demanded to have the Queen brought into England, and there to be brought up, the Protector was content she should remain in Scotland till years of consent. This demand the more moderate sort of the Scots accounted very reasonable; but those of the French and Papal Faction, who were the greatest persons, and the greatest number, strongly opposed. Whereupon the Lord Protector presently put his Army into Array. The Lord Gray and Sir Francis Brian, with eight hundred Light horse, were sent before, to provide Lodging for the Army, and to give advertisement of the enemies approaches: then followed the Avant-guard, in number between three and four thousand Foot, one hundred men at Arms, and six hundred Light horse, led by the Earl of Warwick: then followed the main Battel, consisting of above six thousand Foot, six hundred dred men at Arms, and one thousand Light horse, led by the Protector himself: lastly followed the Arrear, wherein were between three and four thousand Foot, one hundred men at Arms, and six hundred Light horse, under the conduct of the Lord Dacres. Upon one Wing the Artillery was drawn, being sixteen Pieces of great Ordnance; the other Wing was made by men at Arms and Demilances: for the Avant-guard and half the Battel riding about two flight-shot from their side, the other half of the Battel and the whole flank of the Arrear was closed by the Carriages, being nine hundred Carts besides Waggon; the rest of the men at Arms and the Demilances marched behind. In this order they marched two days, taking in three Castles as they went, with little resistance. Where it is memorable, what a sudden device the Defendants of one of them used to save themselves by: for finding they were no longer able to defend themselves, and that their obstinacy had excluded all hope of pardon; they made suit, that they might not presently be slain, but have some time to commend their souls to God, and afterwards be hanged: which respite being obtained, their Pardon afterwards did more easily ensue. So much doth the winning of time oftentimes prevail, more than any other policy. The Governour of Scotland, hearing of the Protector's approach, and having no sufficient Army ready to resist him, sent his Heralds abroad into all parts of the Realm, and commanded the Fire-crofs to be carried, (an ancient custom in cases of importance) which was two Firebrands set in fashion of a Cross, and pitched upon the point of a Spear; and therewith Proclamation to be made, that all above sixteen years of age, and under fixty, should resort forthwith to Musselborough, and bring convenient provision of victuals with them. By this means having gotten a sufficient Army, he set forward towards the English, who were now come to the River called Linne: and here the Earl of Warwick, being too venturous, was like to have been entrapped, but by his valour came off bravely. And now the Scottish Horsemen began to hover about the English Army, and to come pricking towards them, sometimes within length of their staves, using provoking words, to draw the English from their strength: but the Protector, not moved with their provocations, maintained a close march, till he came to Salt-Preston by the Frith, where he incamped within two miles of the Scottish Army. And here the Scots, having gotten the advantage of a Hill, came upon the English with the number of twelve hundred Horse, besides five hundred foot that lay in ambush behind the Hill: at which time the Lord Gray and Francis Brian, impatient of such braveries, obtained leave of the General to encounter them; and so as they came scattered upon the spur, within a stones cast of the English, and were beginning to wheel about, the Lord Gray with some Troops of Light-horse-men charged them home, and was forthwith seconded by certain numbers of Demilances, and both of them backed with a thousand men at Arms: yet the Scots resolutely maintained the fight three hours and more; but in the end, overlaid with number, they were put to flight, and chased almost to the edge of their Camp. In this fight the chiefest force of the Scottish Horse-men was defeated; the Lord Hume by a fall from his Horse lost his life, his Son and Heir, with two Priests, and six Gentlemen, were taken Prisoners, and about fifteen hundred slain. The next day the Protector and the Earl of Warwick rode towards the place where the Scottish Army lay, to view their manner of incamping. As they returned, an Herald and a Trumpeter from the Scots overtook them, who having obtained Audience, the Trumpeter said, that the Lord Huntley his Master, to spare effusion of Christian blood, would fight upon the whole quarrel; either with twenty against twenty, or with ten against ten, or else try it between the Lord General and himself. The Protector answered, that for number of Combatants, it was not in his power to conclude any bargain; and as for himself, that being in Publick charge, it was not fit he should hazard himself against a man of Private conditions, which otherwise he would most willingly accept. Here the Earl of Warwick intreated the Lord General that he might accept the Challenge; and, Trumpeter, (saith he) bring me word that thy Master will perform the Combat with me, and thou shalt have an hundred Crowns for thy pains. Nay, rather (saith the Lord General) bring me word, that thy Master will abide and give us battel, and thou shalt have a thousand Crowns for thy pains. And thereupon, when no other agreement could be made, a general Battel was resolved on. In the Army of the Scots were five or six and thirty thousand men: in the Avant-guard, commanded by the Earl of Angus, about fifteen thousand; in the Battel, over whom was the Lord Governour, about ten thousand; and in the Arrear as many, led by the valiant Gourdon, Earl of Huntley. Hackbutters they had none, nor men at Arms, but about two thousand Horsemen, (Prickers as they term them;) the rest were all on foot, well furnished with Jacks and Scull, Pikes, Daggers, Bucklers made of board, and slicing Swords broad and thin. Every man had a long Kerchief folded twice or thrice about his neck, and many of them had Chains of Lattin, drawn three or four times along their hoses or doublet sleeves. They had also, to affright the Enemies Horses, great Rattles covered with Parchment or Paper, and small stones within put upon staves three ells long. And now both Armies joyned in Battel, where after a long fight, and much variety of fortune on both sides, at length the victory fell to the English. In this fight, divers of the Nobility of Scotland were slain; of the inferiour sort about ten, or, as some say, fourteen thousand: of the English were slain one and fifty Horsemen, and one Footman, but many hurt. The Lord Gray was dangerously thrust with a Pike in the mouth, which struck two inches into his neck. The Scottish Prisoners, accounted by the Marshals Book, were about fifteen hundred; the chief whereof were, the Earl of Huntley, the Lords Yester, Hobley, and Hamilton, the Master of Sanc-Poole, and the Lord of Weemes. The Earl of Huntley being asked, whilst he was a Prisoner, how how he stood affected to the Marriage; made this answer, That he liked the Marriage well enough, but he liked not this kind of wooing. This Victory of Musselborough against the Scots was on the tenth of December, the very same day on which thirty years before a Victory had been had against them at Flodden field: so as it seems this day was fatal to the Scots, and confirms the opinion of Astrologers, that there are days to some men fortunate, and unfortunate to others, if they could be known. This Victory struck such a terrour into many of the Scots, that the Earl of Bothwell & divers chief Gentlemen of Tivdale and of Mers submitted themselves to the King of England, and were received by the Protector into his protection. After this, the English Army took many Towns and Castles, and then for want of Provision, returned into England, having not stayed above five and twenty days in Scotland, and not lost above threescore men. After the taking of Musselborough, the Duke of Somerset made many Knights, but three especially; namely, Sir Ralph Sadler Treasurer, Sir Francis Brian Captain of the Light Horse, and Sir Ralph Vane Lieutenant of all the Horsemen, he made Bannerets, which is a dignity above a Knight, and next to a Baron: and these were the last that from that time to this did ever receive this dignity. But notwithstanding this great overthrow at Musselborough, the Governour of Scotland would not yet be quiet; but assembling the people, made unto them an Oration, exhorting them to defend the liberty of their Country, and not to be daunted with any event of war.

In this time many distractions and troubles happened in England; partly in matters of Religion, and partly about Inclosures. And first for Inclosures, the Lord Protector caused Proclamation to be set forth, commanding that they who had inclosed any Lands accustomed to lie open, should, upon a certain pain, before a day assigned, lay them open again. And then in matter of Religion, certain Injunctions were set forth, for removing of Images out of Churches: and divers Preachers were sent with Instructions to dissuade the People from praying to Saints, or for the Dead; from use of Beads, Alhes, and Processions; from Masses, Dirges, praying in any unknown Tongue: and for defect of Preachers, Homilies were appointed publickly to be read in Churches. And many, for offering to maintain these Ceremonies, were either punished, or forced to recant. Edmund Bonner, Bishop of London, was committed to the Fleet, for refusing to receive these Injunctions. Stephen Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, was likewise committed first to the Fleet, and after to the Tower, for that he had preached, It were well these changes in Religion should be stayed untill the King were of years to govern by himself. For the like causes Tunstall Bishop of Durham, Heath Bishop of Rochester, and Day Bishop of Chichester, were in like manner committed to prison, and all of them dispossessed of their Bishopricks; and that which was worse, the Bishopricks themselves were dispossessed of their Revenues, in such sort that a very small part remained to the Bishops that came after.

And now a Parliament was held, in the first year of the King, and by Prorogation in the second; wherein divers Chantries, Colleges, free Chappels, Fraternities and Guilds, with all their lands and goods, were given to the King: which being sold at a low rate, enriched many, and ennobled some, and thereby made them firm in maintaining the Change. Also it was then ordered, that no man should speak against receiving the Eucharist in both kinds; and that Bishops should be placed by Collation of the King under his Letters Patents, without any election preceding, or confirmation ensuing; and that all Processes Ecclesiastical should be made in the Kings name, as in Writs at the Common Law; and that all persons exercising Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction should have the Kings Arms in the Seals of their Office: and further, the Statute of the Six Articles, and other Statutes concerning punishment of Lollards, were repealed, and the Kings Supremacy over the Church of England was confirmed.

All this while the Wars in Scotland continued, and were managed by the Lord Gray of Wilton with variable success: and now about this time was sent to him in aid the Earl of Shrewsbury with fifteen thousand men. Against him, in aid of the Scots, was sent the Rhinegrave with ten thousand French; who entering into consultation how to remove the young Queen out of the reach of the English, provided a Fleet, and sailing round about Scotland, notwithstanding the English Fleet lay in wait to impeach their passage, yet conveyed her safely into France, being then but six years old, accompanied in the journey with James her base Brother, John Erskin, and Will. Leviston: and in April following she was married to Francis the Dauphin of France.

You heard before the Alterations in Religion: now hear the Troubles. For when the Injunctions were sent abroad into the Country, and Commissioners appointed to see them executed; one Master Bodye a Commissioner, as he was pulling down Images in Cornwall, was suddenly by a Priest stabbed into the body with a Knife. Hereupon the people flocked together in divers parts of the Shire, taking Arms, and beginning to commit outrages: and although the chief Offender was hanged and quartered in Smithfield, and many of his Complices executed in divers parts of the Realm, and withall a Pardon proclaimed to all that would lay down Arms; yet neither could that severity, nor this lenity restrain them from their insolencies; but in divers Countries, as Suffex, Hampshire, Kent, Gloucestershire, Warwickshire, Worstershire, but specially in Somersetshire and Devonshire, great Assemblies of people gathered to a head: whose chief Leaders were Humfrey Arundel, and about six others of inferiour note, but many Priests. Some of these (we may say) were Common-wealth Mutineers, and some mutined for Religion. They who were for the Common-wealth could agree upon nothing: some would have no Justices, some no Gentlemen, some no Lawyers, nor ordinary Courts of Justice; but above all, Inclosures must down; but whether all, or which, or how to be employed, none could tell. The Religious Mutineers were not altogether so various in their voices, as having some few amongst them by whom they were guided: these in the name of the people hampered up these Articles following; upon granting of which, they professed that both their bodies and goods should be at the Kings devotion.

1. That Curates should administer Baptism at all times of necessity, as well on week-days as on holy-days.
2. That their Children might be confirmed by the Bishop.
3. That the Mass might be celebrated, no man communicating with the Priest.
4. That they might have reservation of the Lords Body in their Churches.
5. That they might have holy Bread and holy Water, in remembrance of Christs precious Body and Blood.
6. That Priests might live unmarried.
7. That the Six Articles, set forth by King Henry the Eighth, might be continued, at least till the King should come to full age.

1549. Upon these demands, although the King knew that Reasons would little prevail with unreasonable men, yet to discharge the place he held, he sent them in writing Answers to them all, and withal a general Pardon, if they would desist and lay down Arms. But the Seditious growing the more outrageous, the fairer they were intreated, and finding themselves unable to subsist with their own estates, began to think upon the spoil of Cities. And first they came to Exeter, and demanded entrance: which the Citizens refusing, they fell to set fire on the Gates: but the Citizens prevented this, by casting in wood, and maintaining the fire, till they had cast up a half Moon within; upon which when the Seditious attempted to enter, they were presently hewn and cut in pieces. And after this they mined the walls, laid Powder, and rammed the mouth: but the Citizens prevented this also, by making a Countermine, whereinto they poured such plenty of water, that the wet powder could not be fired. All this while the Lord Russel, Lord Privy-Seal, who had been sent down to suppress the Commotion, lay at Honyton, expecting more Forces; whilst the Citizens of Exeter for twelve days together endured so great famine, that they were fain to eat Horses, and make bread of course Bran moulded in cloaths, for that otherwise it would not cleave together. At last the Lord Gray came to the Lord Russel with supply of Forces; who after many conflicts with the Rebels, forced them to raise their siege at Exeter, and thereby freed the City from many miseries: to whom the King afterward gave the Mannor of Ewyland, in reward for their loyalty. After this, the Rebels rallying their Forces, were again set upon by the Kings Army, and the greatest part of them slain, the rest fled; many were taken and executed by Martial Law: the chief Leaders were sent to London, and there executed. The Sedition being thus suppressed, it is memorable what sport Sir William Kingston the Provost-Marshal made, by virtue of his Office, upon men in misery. One Boyer, Mayor of Bodmin in Cornwall, had been amongst the Rebels, not willingly, but enforced: to him the Provost sent word he would come & dine with him, for whom the Mayor made great provision. A little before Dinner, the Provost took the Mayor aside, and whispered him in the ear, that an execution must that day be done in the Town, and therefore required to have a pair of Gallows set up against dinner should be done. The Mayor failed not of his charge. Presently after dinner the Provost taking the Mayor by the hand, intreated him to lead him to the place where the Gallows was; which when he beheld, he asked the Mayor if he thought them to be strong enough. Yes, (said the Mayor) doubtless they are. Well then, said the Provost, get you up speedily, for they are provided for you. I hope (answered the Mayor) you mean not as you speak. In faith (said the Provost) there is no remedy, for you have been a busie Rebel. And so without respite or defence he was hanged to death: a most uncourteous part, for a guest to offer his host. Near the said place dwelt a Miller, who had been a busie actor in that Rebellion; who, fearing the approach of the Marshal, told a sturdy fellow his servant, that he had occasion to go from home, and therefore bid him, that if any man came to enquire after the Miller, he should not speak of him, but say that himself was the Miller, and had been so for three years before. So the Provost came and called for the Miller; when out comes the servant, and faith, he was the man. The Provost demanded how long he had kept the Mill. These three years, answered the Servant. Then the Provost commanded his men to lay hold on him, and hang him on the next Tree. At this the Fellow cried out, that he was not the Miller, but the Millers man. Nay Sir, (said the Provost) I will take you at your word; and if thou beest the Miller, thou art a busie knave; if thou beest not, thou art a false lying knave: and howsoever, thou canst never do thy Master better service than to hang for him. And so without more ado he was dispatched.

When this Sedition in Devonshire was appeased, there arose another in Norfolk, and that specially upon a grievance for Inclosures. The Rebels had got one Robert Ket, a Tanner of Wymondham, to be their Leader, and were grown to a Body of twenty thousand, seating themselves at Mounthold near Mount-Surrey, where they carried a face as it were of Justice and Religion. For they had one Conyers, an idle fellow, to be their Chaplain, who morning and evening read solemn Prayers, also Sermons they had often: and as for Justice, they had a Bench under a Tree, where Ket usually sate, and with him two of every Hundred whence their Companies had been raised, to hear complaints, and to give Judgment; and from hence were Warrants sent in the Kings name, to bring in Powder, Shot, Victuals, and all things necessary. Which Tree hath ever since been called the Tree of Reformation. And now being grown to a height, they presented certain Complaints to the King, requiring he would send a Herald to them, to give them satisfaction. The King, though he took it for a great indignity to have such base Fellows to capitulate with him, yet framing himself to the time, he returned this answer, That in October following he would call a Parliament, wherein their Complaints should be heard, and all their Grievances should be redressed; requiring them in the mean time to lay down Arms, and return to their houses, and thereupon granting them a general Pardon. But this was so far from satisfying the Seditious, that hereupon first they assaulted the Town of Norwich, took it, and made the Mayor attend them as their Servant, and then returned again to their station at Moushold. Not long after, William Parre, Marquess of Norhampton, with the Lord Sheffield, the Lord Wentworth, divers Knights and fifteen hundred horse, with a small Band of Italians, was sent against them; whom the Seditious so stoutly opposed, that much mischief was done on both sides. The Lord Sheffield, falling with his Horse in a Ditch, was taken prisoner; and as he pulled off his Helmet to shew who he was, he was by a Butcher stricken down with a Club and slain. So as the Marquess with his Forces not prevailing, there was afterward sent the Earl of Warwick with six thousand Foot, and fifteen hundred Horse, with whom were the Lords Willoughby, Powis, and Bray, his two Sons Ambrose and Robert, and many Knights and Gentlemen of name. When the Earl was come near to the Camp of the Seditious, he sent a Herald to them, offering them the Kings Pardon, if they would desist: but they were so far from accepting it, that a lewd Boy turned up his naked breech towards the Herald, and bid him kiss it. Upon this, many Skirmishes passed between the Earl and them, with loss sometimes to one side, and sometimes to another. At last they came to Battel, where the Rebels placed in the Front all the Gentlemen they had taken Prisoners, meaning they should be the first slain; of whom yet very few were hurt, but of the Rebels were slain above two thousand. And now once again the Earl offered them pardon, if they would desist: but for all their losses, they continued obstinate still. At last, the Earl sent to know if they would entertain their Pardon, in case he should come in person and assure them of it. This moved them much; and then they answered, They knew him to be so honourable, that from himself they would embrace it. Whereupon the Earl riding to them, and causing their Pardon to be read, they threw away their Weapons, wishing all joy and prosperity to the King. Nine of the principal Rebels were hanged upon the Tree of Reformation: Ket himself flying away was taken, and hanged in Chains upon Norwich Castle. The day of this defeat of the Seditious was a long time after observed for a Festival day by the Inhabitants of Norwich. And thus ended the Sedition in Norfolk; when at the same time another arose in Yorkshire, whereof the chief movers were William Ombler a Gentleman, Thomas Dale a Parish-Clerk, and Stephenson a Poet, to whom were assembled four or five thousand: who took their encouragement from a certain Prophecie, which did foretel, that the time should come when there should be no King; when the Nobility and Gentry should be destroyed; when the Realm should be ruled by four Governours elected by the Commons, holding a Parliament in Commotion, which should begin at the South and North Seas of England: and that time they understood to be the present, and that the Rebels of Devonshire, Norfolk, and Yorkshire, should draw together to accomplish this Prophecie. But as soon as they heard that the Tumults of Devonshire and Norfolk were quieted, they found that they were deceived in the understanding of the Prophecie; and thereupon presently, upon the Kings Pardon, they fell off and dispersed. Their chief Leaders, Ombler, Dale, and four others, were executed at York; and with this, the Spirit of Sedition was quite laid in all places of the Kingdom.

But the King of France taking advantage of these Seditions, though he had been in Treaty of Peace with England before, yet now he brake off the Treaty, proclaimed War, and denounced it by his Embassadour to the King. Hereupon all French-men in England, not Denizens, were taken Prisoners, and all their Goods seized for the King: which the French King understanding, he sent a Fleet of Ships to surprize Gernsey and Jersey, but was repelled with the loss of a thousand men. After this, he levied an Army by land, and went himself in person against Bulloign, defended by the valiant Sir Nicholas Arnold. But being weary of the work, he left his Lieutenant Chatillon to pursue the Siege; who having made many fierce Batteries, and at last Assaults, and not prevailing, he then attempted to hinder the Town from supply of Victuals; and to this end charged a Galley with gravel and stones, meaning to sink it in the Haven. But the English took the Galley before it was sunk, and made use of the stones for their own defence. After this they made Faggots of light matter, mixed with Pitch, Tar, Tallow, Rosin, Powder, and Wild-fire, with intention to fire the Ships in the Haven: but that enterprize was defeated by the Bulloigners, and the Faggots taken from the French: and more than this there was little done in those parts at this time.

But in England, in the mean time, an unfortunate accident happened, which beginning upon a very light occasion, produced afterward very heavy effects; whereof though there were many concurrent circumstances, yet the original cause was the Pride of a woman, upon a point indeed wherein the natures of Women are commonly most tender, Precedency of place. The Protector had married Anne Stanhope, a Woman of an haughty stomach; & the Lord Admiral, his Brother, the Queen Dowager, a Lady of great mildness. The nearness of the Husbands gave occasions of the Ladies often meeting, where the Dutcheffs would inwardly murmur, why she, being the Wife of the elder Brother, and the better man, should give place to her, who was the wife of the younger Brother, and the meaner man. This envy of hers towards the Queen bred a malice in her towards the Admiral, as thinking the mischief she did to the Husband, to be a part of revenge upon the Wife; and though the Queen shortly after died in Child-bed, yet the malice of the Dutcheffs towards the Admiral lived still: (so hard a thing it is for malice, once settled in a Womans heart, to be removed.) Out of this malice, she puts divers surmises into her Husband the Protector's head, against his Brother the Admiral, as though he went about to procure his death, to the end he might aspire to the place he held; but certainly, as misliking his Government, being a Protestant, who was himself a Papist. In this case causes of jealousy against the Admiral were obvious enough; for it was known known that in King Henry's time, he had aimed at the marriage of the Lady Elizabeth, King Henry's second Daughter; and now his Wife the Queen Dowager being dead, (and not without suspicion of poyson) he fell upon that marriage afresh, which could not be thought to tend but to some very high aspiring end. The Protector, a plain man, and one that had not the deepest insight into practices, whether too importunately provoked by his Wife, or whether out of an honest mind, not willing to patronize faults, though in a Brother, gave way to Accusations brought against him: so as in a Parliament then holden, he was accused for attempting to get into his custody the Person of the King and Government of the Realm; for endeavouring to marry the Lady Elizabeth, the Kings Sister; for perswading the King in his tender years to take upon him the rule and ordering of himself. Upon which points (though perhaps proved, yet not sufficiently, against him, who was never called to his answer) he was by act of Parliament condemned; and within few days after condemnation, a Warrant was sent, under the hand of his Brother the Protector, to cut off his Head. Wherein (as after it proved) he did as much, as if he had laid his own Head down upon the Block: for whilst these Brothers lived and held together, they were as a strong Fortrefs one to the other; the Admirals courage supporting the Protectors Authority, and the Protectors Authority maintaining the Admirals stoutness; but the Admiral once gone, the Protectors Authority, as wanting support, began to totter, and fell at last to utter ruine. Besides; there was at this time, amongst the Nobility, a kind of faction; Protestants, who favoured the Protector for his own sake, and other of the Papal inclination, who favoured him for his Brothers sake: but his Brother being gone, both sides forsook him, even his own side, as thinking they could expect little assistance from him, who gave no more assistance to his own Brother. And perhaps more than all this, the Earl of Warwick, at this time, was the most powerfull man both in Courage and Council amongst all the Nobility, and none so near to watch him as the Admiral, while he lived; but he being gone, there was none left that either was able and durst, or durst and was able to stand against him. However it was not long after the Admirals death, the Protector was invaded with sundry Accusations; wherein the Earl of Warwick made not always the greatest show, but yet had always the greatest hand. One thing the Protector had done, which, though a private act, yet gave a publick distaste. To make him a Mansion-house in the Strand, (the same which is now called Somerset-House) he pulled down a Church, and two Bishops Houses by the Strand-Bridge; in digging the foundation whereof, the Bones of many who had been there buried were cast out, and carried into the fields: and because the Stones of those Houses and the Church sufficed not for his work, the Steeple, and most part of the Church of S. Johns of Jerusalem near Smithfield, was mined & overthrown with Powder, and the stones applied to this spacious Building: and more than this, the Cloyster of Pauls on the North tide of the Church, in a place called Pardon Church-yard, and the dance of Death very curiously wrought about the Cloyster, and a Chappel that stood in the midst of the Church-yard, also the Charnel House that stood on the South side of Pauls, (now a Carpenters Yard) with the Chappel, Timber, and Monuments therein, were beaten down, the bones of the dead carried into Finsbury Fields, and the Stones converted into this Building. This act of the Protectors did something alienate the peoples minds from him: which the Earl of Warwick perceiving, thought it now a fit time to be falling upon him; and thereupon drew eighteen of the Privy Council to joyn with him, who withdrawing themselves from the Court, held secret consultations together, and walked in the City with many Servants weaponed, and in new Liveries. Whereof when the Protector heard, he sent Secretary Peter to them, to know the causes of their Assembly, requiring them to resort to him peaceably, that they might commune together as Friends: but in the mean time he armed five hundred men, and removed the King by night from Hampton-Court to Windsor. On the other side, the Lords at London, having first taken possession of the Tower, sent for the Mayor and Aldermen of the City to the Earl of Warwicks Lodging at Ely-house, in Holborn; to whom the Lord Rich, then Lord Chancellour, made a long Oration, wherein he shewed the ill Government of the Lord Protector, and the many mischiefs that by it were come upon the Kingdom, and thereupon required them to joyn with the Lords there assembled to remove him. And presently that day a Proclamation was made in divers parts of the City to that purpose, to which the Lords and Counsellors that subscribed their names were these; the Lord Rich Chancellour, the Lord Saint-John Lord great Master, the Marquess of Northampton, the Earl of Warwick Lord great Chamberlain, the Earl of Arundell Lord Chamberlain, the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Earl of Southampton, Sir Tho. Cheyney Treasurer of the Household, Sir John Gage Constable of the Tower, Sir William Peter Secretary, Sir Edward North Knight, Sir Edward Montague chief Justice of the Common Pleas, Sir John Baker Chancellour of the Exchequer, Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Edward Wotton, Sir Richard Southwell, Knights, and Doctor Wotton Dean of Canterbury. In the afternoon of the same day the Lord Mayor assembled a Common-Council in the Guild-hall, where two Letters arrived almost in one instant, one from the King and the Lord Protector, for a thousand men to be armed for defence of the Kings Person; another from the Lords at London, for two thousand men to aid them in defence of the Kings Person also; both pretending alike, and therefore hard how to please them both. The Recorder set forth the complaint of the Lords against the Protector in such sort, that he made many inclinable to favour that side: but one named George Stadlow, better advised, stepped up, and in a long Speech shewed what mischiefs had come to the City by opposing the King; and therefore gave his opinion, to suspend giving aid to the Lords, at least for a time. His advice was hearkened unto and thereupon the Court resolved only to arm an hundred Horsemen, and four hundred Foot, in defence of the City; and to the Letters returned submissive, but dilatory Answers. After some other passages between the Protector and the Lords, Sir Edward Winfield, Captain of the Guard, was sent from the Lords to Windsor; who so well perswaded the King of the Lords loyal affection towards him, and of their moderate intention towards the Protector, that the King was contented to have him presently removed from him, and suffered him within two days after to be carried to the Tower. In whose absence, seven Lords of the Council, and four Knights, were appointed by turns to attend the Kings Person; and for Affairs of State, the Government of them was referred to the whole Body of the Council. Soon after were sent to the Protector in the Tower certain Lords of the Council, with Articles against him, requiring his present answer, whether he would acknowledge them to be true, or else stand upon his justification. The chief Article was this, that he took upon him the Office of Protector, with expresse condition, that he should do nothing in the Kings Affairs but by assent of the late Kings Executors, or the greatest part of them; and that, contrary to this condition, he had hindered Justice, and subverted Laws, of his own Authority, as well by Letters, as by other Command: and many other Articles, but all much to this purpose.

Upon his submission he is released, but no more Protector.

The Protector, whether thinking to speed better by submission than by contesting, or perhaps finding himself not altogether innocent, (for indeed, in so great a place, who can bear himself with such sincerity, but he will commit errors with which he may be taxed?) subscribed an acknowledgement with his own hand; humbly submitting himself to the Kings mercy, and desiring their Lordships favour towards him. Upon this submission, three months after he had been imprisoned, he was released, entertained, and feasted by the King, and sworn again to be a Privy Counsellour, but no more Protector. At which time, between him and the Lords a shew at least of perfect amity was made; and to make it the more firm, the Dukes Daughter was afterward married to the Lord Lisle, Son and Heir to the Earl of Warwick: at which Marriage the King was present. And perhaps to honour their reconciliation and this Marriage, the Earl of Warwick was made Lord Admiral of England; Sir John Russel, Lord Privy Seal, was created Earl of Bedford; the Lord Saint-John was created Earl of Wiltshire, and soon after made Lord Treasurer; Sir William Paget, Controller of the Kings House, was made Lord Paget; Sir Anthony Winfield, Captain of the Guard, was made Controller; and Sir Thomas Darcy was made Captain of the Guard. But of the other side, the Earl of Arundell, and the Earl of Southampton, were put off from the Council; of whom the Earl of Southampton died shortly after at Lincoln-Place in Holborn, and was buried in St. Andrews Church there.

About this time a Parliament was held at Westminster, wherein one Act was made against spreading of Prophecies; another against unlawful Assemblies: but for fear of new Tumults, the Parliament was untimely dissolved, & Gentlemen were commanded to retire to their Country Habitations; and for the same cause also, Trinity Term did not hold.

About this time also Pope Paul the Third died; after whose death the Cardinals being divided about the Election of a new Pope, the Imperial part, which was the greatest, gave their Voices for Cardinal Poole: which being told him, he disabled himself, and wished them to chuse one that might be most for the glory of God, and good of the Church. Upon this stop, some that were no friends to Poole, and perhaps looked for the place themselves, if he were put off, laid many things to his charge; amongst other, that he was not without suspicion of Lutheranism, as having been very conversant with Emanuel Tremellius, and Antonius Flaminus, great Lutherans: and not altogether without blemish of Incontinency, there being a young Nun that was thought to be his Daughter. But of these Criminations Poole so cleared himself, that he was afterward more importuned to take the place than he was before: and thereupon one night the Cardinals came unto him, being in bed, and sent him word they came to adore him, (which is one special kind of electing the Pope.) But he being awaked out of his sleep, and acquainted with it, made answer, that this was not a work of darkness, and therefore required them to forbear till the next day, and then to do as God should put into their minds. But the Italian Cardinals, attributing this putting off to a kind of stupidity and sloth in Poole, looked no more after him, but the next day chose Cardinal Montanus Pope, who was afterward named Julius the Third.

Cardinal Poole is chosen Pope, but making excuses is rejected.

And now the King of France, upon many just Considerations, was grown delirous to have a Peace with England; and thereupon sent one Guidotti, a Florentine, into England, to make some overture of his desire to the Lords of the Council: who addressing himself to the Earl of Warwick, whom he knew to be most prevalent, so prevailed, that it was concluded four Embassadors should be sent from the King of England into France, and four from the French King, to treat with them. The Commissioners for the English were John Earl of Bedford, William Lord Paget, Sir William Peter, and Sir John Mason, Secretaries of State. For the French, were Monsieur Rochpot, Monsieur Chatillon, Guyllart de Martier, and Rochetelle de Daffie. Much time was spent to agree about a place of Meeting; till at last the English, to satisfy the French, were contented it should be before Bulloigne: where were many Meetings, and many differences about Conditions. But in conclusion, a Peace was concluded upon certain Articles, the chief whereof was, that Bulloigne and the places adjacent should be delivered up to the French within six weeks after the Peace Proclaimed; and that the French should pay for the same two hundred thousand Crowns within three days after delivery of the Town, and other two hundred thousand Crowns upon the fifth day of August following. Hostages were on both sides given for performance, and to those Articles the French King was sworn at Amiens, and the King of England in London. The Lord Clinton, who had been Deputy of Bulloigne, was made Lord Admiral of England.

Presently after this Agreement, the Duke of Brunswick sent to the King of England, to offer his Service in the Kings Wars with ten thousand men, and to intreat a Marriage with the Lady Mary, the Kings eldest Sister. To his offer of Aid Answer was made, that the Kings Wars were ended: And touching the Marriage with the Lady Mary, that the King was in speech for her Marriage with the Infanta of Portugal; which if it succeeded not, he should then be favourably heard. Upon this, the Emperours Ambassadour demanded of the King, that the Lady Mary might have free exercise of the Mass; which the King not only constantly denied, but thereupon Sermons were exercised at the Court, and order taken that no man should have any Benefice from the King, but first he should Preach before him. And shortly after, under pretence of preparing for Sea-matters, five thousand pounds were sent to relieve Protestants beyond the Seas. At this time also an Ambassadour came from Gustavus King of Sweden, to enter League with the King for intercourse of Merchants; and charge was then also given, that the Laws of England should be administred in Ireland.

About this time the Queen Dowager of Scotland, going from France to her Country, passed through England, having first obtained a safe Conduct. She arrived at Portsmouth, and was there met by divers of the English Nobility; conducted to London, she was lodged in the Bishops Palace. After four days staying, having been Feasted by the King at White-Hall, she departed, being waited on by the Sheriffs of Counties to the Borders of Scotland. And now was one Stewart a Scot apprehended in England, and imprisoned in the Tower, for intending to poison the young Queen of Scots; whom the King delivered to the French King upon the Frontiers of Callice, to be by him Justiced at his pleasure.

The Emperour seeks to get the Lady Mary by stealth out of England.

At this time certain Ships were appointed by the Emperour, to transport the Lady Mary either by violence or by stealth out of England to Antwerp. Whereupon Sir John Gates was sent with Forces into Essex, where the Lady lay: and besides, the Duke of Somerset was sent with two hundred men, the Lord Privy-Seal with other two hundred, and Master Sentleger with four hundred more, to several Coasts upon the Sea: and the Lord Chancellour and Secretary Peter were sent to the Lady Mary, who, after some Conference, brought her to the Lord Chancellours House at Lye in Essex, and from thence to the King at Westminster. Here the Council declared unto her, how long the King had permitted her the use of the Mass; and considering her obstinacy, was resolved now no longer to permit it, unless she would put him in hope of some conformity in short time. To which she answered, that her Soul was Gods: and touching her Faith, as she could not change, so she would not dissemble it. Reply was made, that the King intended not to constrain her Faith, but to restrain the outward profession of it, in regard of the danger the Example might draw. After some like interchange of speeches, the Lady was appointed to remain with the King, when there arrived an Ambassadour from the Emperour, with a threatening Message of War, in case his Cousin the Lady Mary should be denied the free exercise of the Mass. Hereupon the King presently advised with the Archbishop of Canterbury, and with the Bishops of London and Rocheſter; who gave their Opinion, that to give Licence to sin, was sin; but to connive at sin, might be allowed, so it were not too long, nor without hope of Reformation. Then Answer was given to the Ambassadour, that the King would send to the Emperour within a month or two, and give him such satisfaction as should be fit.

To connive is less than to give Licence.

And now the King, being uncertain of the faith both of his Subjects and of his Confederates, intended by alliance to strengthen himself; and thereupon sent one Bartwick to the King of Denmark, with private Instructions to treat of a Marriage between the Lady Elizabeth, the Kings youngest Sister, and the King of *Denmark*s eldest Son: but when it came to the point, the Lady could not be induced to entertain Marriage with any.

The Lady Elizabeth cannot be induced to marry.

After this the Marquess of Northampton was sent Ambassadour to the French King, as well to present him with the Order of the Garter, as to treat with him of other secret Affairs. With him were joyned in Commission the Bishop of Ely, Sir Philip Hobbie, Sir William Pickering, Sir John Mason, and Master Smith Secretary of State; also the Earl of Worcester, Rutland, and Ormond, were appointed to accompany them; as likewise the Lords Lisle, Fitzwater, Bray, Abergavenny, and Evers, with other Knights and Gentlemen of note, to the number of six and twenty. And for avoiding of an immoderate Train, order was given, that every Earl should have but four Attendants, every Baron but three, every Knight and Gentleman but two, only the Commissioners were not limited to any number. Being come to the Court of France, they were forthwith brought to the King, being then in his Bed-chamber: To whom the Marquess presented the Order of the Garter, wherewith he was presently invested. Then the Bishop of Ely, in a short Speech, declared how the King of England, out of his love and desire of Amity, had sent this Order to his Majesty; desiring withall, that some persons might be Authorized to treat with them about some other matters of Importance. Whereupon a Commission went forth to the Cardinal of Lorraine, Chastillon the Constable, the Duke of Guise, and others. At first the English demanded, that the young Queen of Scots might be sent into England, for perfecting of a Marriage between King Edward and her. But to this the French answered, that conclusion had been made long before for her Marriage with the Dauphin of France. Then the English proposed a Marriage between King Edward and the Lady Elizabeth, the French Kings eldest Daughter. To this the French did cheerfully incline: but when they came to talk talk of Portion, the English demanded at first fifteen hundred thousand Crowns, then fell to fourteen, and at last to eight hundred thousand. The French offered at first one hundred thousand Crowns, then rose to two hundred thousand, and higher they would not be drawn; saying, It was more than ever had been given with a Daughter of France. Shortly after, Monsieur, the Marshal and other Commissioners were sent by the French King to deliver to the King of England the Order of S. Michael; and then was further Treaty about the Marriage. And because the French could be scrued no higher than two hundred thousand Crowns, it was at last accepted, and the Agreement was reduced into Writing, and delivered under Seal on both sides.

Dukes and
made.

And now King Edward supposing his state to be most safe, when indeed it was most unsure, in testimony both of his Joy and Love, advanced many to new Titles of Honour. The Lord Marquess Dorset, who had married the eldest Daughter of Charles Brandon, was created Duke of Suffolk; the Earl of Warwick, Duke of Northumberland; the Earl of Wiltshire was created Marquess of Winchester; Sir William Herbert, Lord of Cardiffe, and Master of the Horse, was created Earl of Pembroke: Also William Cecill the Kings Secretary, John Cheek one of his Schoolmasters, Henry Dudley and Henry Nevil were made Knights; and (which perhaps it had been happy if it had never been) Sir Robert Dudley, one of the Duke of Northumberland's Sons, (the same who was afterward the great Earl of Leicester) was sworn one of the six ordinary Gentlemen of the Kings Chamber. After whose coming into a place so near about him, the King enjoyed his health but a while.

The aspiring thoughts of the Duke of Northumberland were now grown to be put in execution. He was advanced in title of Honour equal with the highest; in authority and power above the highest: he had placed his Politick Son near about the Kings Person. The next thing was to remove the Duke of Somerset out of the way. And for this also, he had prepared Instruments, Sir Thomas Palmer, Crane, Hammond, Cecill, and others, who brought several Accusations against the Duke; some trenching upon the King and Kingdom, but one specially against the Duke of Northumberland's Person. Whose practices when the Duke of Somerset found, and had cause to fear; he went one day into the Duke of Northumberland's Chamber; with a purpose to kill him: but finding him in his Bed, and being received with much kind Complement by him, his heart relented, and thereupon he came away without any thing done. At his coming out, one of his Company asked him if he had done the deed: Who answered, No. Then, said he, you are your self undone. And indeed it so fell out; for when all other Accusations were refuted, this onely stuck by him, and could not be denied. And so on the first of December he was Arraigned at Westminster; where the Lord William Paulet, Marquess of Winchester, and Lord Treasurer, sat as High Steward of England, and with him Peers to the number of seven and twenty; the Dukes of Suffolk and Northumberland, the Marquess of Northampton, the Earls of Derby, Bedford, Huntington, Rutland, Bathe, Suffex, Worcester, Pembroke, and Hereford, the Barons Abergavenny, Andley, Whar-ton, Evers, Latimer, Borough, Zouch, Stafford, Wentworth, Darcy, Sturton, Winsor, Cromwell, Cobham, and Bray. The Lords being set, the Indictments were read, in number five, containing a Charge for raising men in the North-parts of the Realm; and at his House, for assembling men to kill the Duke of Northumberland; for resisting his Attachment; for raising London; for assaulting the Lords, and devising of their deaths. To all which he pleaded, Not guilty, and made a satisfactory Answer to every Point, though the Kings Learned Council pressed them hard against him. This done, the Lords went together, where Exception was taken by some, as a thing unfit, that the Duke of Northumberland, the Marquess of Northampton, and the Earl of Pembroke, should be of the Jury; seeing the Prisoner was chiefly charged with practices against them. But to this the Lawyers made answer, that a Peer of the Realm might not be challenged. So after much variation of Opinions, the Prisoner was acquitted of Treason, but by most Voices found guilty of Felony; and that by a Statute lately by his own procurement made, that if any should attempt to kill a Privy-Councillour, although the Fact were not done, yet it should be Felony, and be punished with death. But upon his being acquitted of Treason, the Axe at the Tower was presently laid down, which made people conceive he had been acquitted of all; who thereupon for Joy gave so great a Shout, that it was heard as far as Charing-Cross. But the Duke was little the better for being acquitted of Treason, seeing he was found guilty of Felony, and had Judgment to die. It is thought by some, he might have saved his life, if he had demanded his Clergy: but it is rather thought that in that Statute Clergy was denied. Two months after his Condemnation, (much against the Kings will) he was brought to the Tower-Hill to Execution: where being ascended the Scaffold, he entred into a Speech wherein though he justified himself for any matter tending to the hurt of the King or Kingdom; yet he confessed he was justly by the Law brought to his death; and thanked God, that had given him so large a time of repentance, especially that he had opened his eyes, to see clearly the light of the Gospel. And going on in his Speech, a sudden noise arose of some crying; Away, away; which made some think a Pardon had been come; but it was indeed the voice of some that had been warned to be at the Execution, and were come somewhat late. But the Tumult being appeased, the Duke went on with his Speech; and at last commending his Soul to God, with a countenance not shewing any sign of fear or perturbation, only his Cheeks a little redder than they used to be, he peaceably laid down his head upon the Block, and in a moment, with one stroke of the Axe, had it stricken off.

The Death of this Duke made the Duke of Northumberland more odious to the people than he was before; and there were some that dipped Handkerchiefs in his blood, and kept them to upbraid the Duke of Northumberland withall, when he came himself afterward to the like end. After execution of the Duke, Sir Ralph Vane and Sir Miles Partridge were hanged at the Tower-hill, Sir Michael Stanhope and Sir Thomas Arundel were there beheaded.

George Ferrers Lord of Misrule at Christmas.

After the Dukes condemnation, it was thought fit to have something done for averting the Kings mind from taking thought; and to that end, one George Ferrers, a Gentleman of Lincolns-Inne, was appointed in the Christmas-time to be Lord of Misrule; who so carried himself, that he gave great delight to many, and some to the King, but not in proportion to his heaviness.

A call of Serjeants.

About this time was a call of seven Serjeants at Law, who kept their Feast at Grays-Inne: of whom Master Robert Brooke, Recorder of London, was the first; and the next Master Dyer, who was chosen Speaker the next Parliament.

The Lord Paget hath the Garter taken from him, and why.

About this time also the Lord Paget was committed to the Tower, for what cause is not certain; and being a Knight of the Order, his Garter was taken from him by Garter King at Arms, upon this pretence, that he was said to be no Gentleman, either by Father or Mother: and the Garter was then bestowed on the Earl of Warwick, the Duke of Northumberland's eldest Son. And the Lord Rich, Lord Chancellor, was put off from his place, and the Seal then delivered to Doctor Thomas Goodrick, Bishop of Ely.

Sebastian Cabot sent to discover a Passage to the East-Indies.

About this time also three great Ships were set forth at the Kings charge, for discovery of a Passage to the East-Indies by the North Seas. The chief Pilot and Director in this Voyage was one Sebastian Cabot, an English-man, born at Bristol, but the Son of a Genoway. These Ships at the last arrived in the Country of Moscovia, but not without loss of their Captain Sir Hugh Willoughby, who being tossed and driven by tempest, was afterward found in his Ship frozen to death, and all his people.

Sir Hugh Willoughby frozen to death.

At this time also the Duke of Suffolk's three Daughters, which he had by Frances, Daughter of Charles Brandon and Mary Queen of France, were married at Durham-House: the eldest, Jane, to the Lord Guilford Dudley, fourth Son to the Duke of Northumberland; the second, Katharine, to Henry, Son and Heir to the Earl of Pembroke; the youngest, Mary, being somewhat deformed, to Martyn Keyes, the Kings Gentleman-Porter. And then also Katharine, the Duke of Northumberland's youngest Daughter, to the Lord Hastings, eldest Son of the Earl of Huntington. And now had the Duke of Northumberland gone a great way in his design: it remained to persuade King Edward to exclude his two Sisters from Succession in the Crown; for that done, his Daughter-in-law, the Lady Jane, would come to have a right. For as for pretenders out of Scotland, or any other, he made no great matter. And now to work the King to this perswasion, (being in a languishing sickness, not far from death) he inculcates to him, how much it concerned him to have a care of Religion, that it might be preserved in purity, not only in his own life, but as well after his death: which would not be, if his Sister the Lady Mary should succeed; and she could not be put by, unless her other Sister, the Lady Elizabeth, were put by also, seeing their rights depended one upon another. But if he pleased to appoint the Lady Jane, the Duke of Suffolk's eldest Daughter, and his own next Kinswoman to his Sisters, to be his Successor, he might then be sure that the true Religion should be maintained, to Gods great glory, and be a worthy Act of his own religious Providence. This was to strike upon the right string of the young Kings affection, with whom nothing was so dear as preservation of Religion; and thereupon his last Will was appointed to be drawn, (contrived chiefly by the Lord Chief Justice Mountague, and Secretary Cecil: ) by which Will, as far as in him lay, he excluded his two Sisters from the Succession, and all other but the Duke of Suffolk's Daughters. And then causing it to be read before his Council, he required them all to assent unto it, and to subscribe their hands: which they all, both Nobility, and Bishops, and Judges, did. Only the Archbishop Cranmer refused at first; Sir James Hales, a Judge of the Common-Pleas, to the last; and with them also Sir John Baker, Chancellor of the Exchequer. And now remained nothing for the Duke of Northumberland's purpose, but that the King should die: which soon after he did at Greenwich, the sixth of July, in the year 1553. One point of the Duke's policy must not be forgotten, that fearing what troubles the Lady Mary might raise after the Kings decease, if she should be at liberty, he therefore, seeing the King drawing on, used all means possible to get her within his power: to which end Letters are directed to her in the Kings name from the Council, willing her forthwith to repair to the King, as well to be a comfort to him in his sickness, as to see all matters well ordered about his Person. Whereupon the Lady, suspecting nothing, addressed her self with all speed to the Journey; till being upon the way, she was advertised of the Dukes design; and then she returned to her House at Hovesden, and so escaped the snare: by whose escape the whole Design of the Duke of Northumberland was disappointed; as soon after will be seen.

Of his Taxations.

IN no Kings Reign were ever more Parliaments for the time, nor fewer Subsidies: the greatest was in his last year, when yet there was but one Subsidy, with two Fifteens and Tenths, granted by the Temporality, and a Subsidy by the Clergy. And indeed, to shew how loath this King was to lay Impositions upon his people, this may be a sufficient argument; that though he were much in debt, yet he chose rather to deal with the Foulket in the Low-Countries for money upon loan, at the interest of fourteen pounds for a hundred for a year. But his ways for raising of money were, by selling selling of Chantrey Lands and Houses, given him by Parliament; and by inquiring after all Church-Goods, either remaining in Cathedral and Parish-Churches, or embezzelled away, as Jewels, Gold and Silver Chalice, ready Money, Copes, and other Vestments; reserving to every Church one Chalice, and one Covering for the Communion-Table, the rest to be applied to his benefit. He also raised money by enquiring after Offences of Officers in great places; in which enquiry one Beaumont, Master of the Rolls, being convinced of many Crimes, surrendered all his Offices, Lands and Goods into the Kings hands. Also one Whalley, Receiver of Yorkshire, being found a Delinquent, surrendered his Office, and paid a great Fine besides. Also the Lord Paget, Chancellour of the Dutchy, convinced that he had sold the Kings Lands and Timber-woods without Commission, and had applied the Kings Fines to his own use, for these and other Offences, surrendered his Office, and was fined at four thousand pounds, which he paid in hand. One thing more was done in his time for raising of Bullion was appointed to be made so much bafe, that the King might gain thereby a hundred and forty thousand pounds.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

IN his third year a Parliament was holden, wherein one Act was made against spreading of Prophecies; another against unlawful Assemblies. In his fourth year a Parliament was holden, wherein Priests Children were made legitimate; and Usury for loan of money was forbidden. In his fifth year it was ordained, that the Laws of England should be admitted in Ireland; and a King at Arms, named Ulster, was newly instituted for Ireland, whose Province was all Ireland: and he was the first fourth King of Arms, and first Herald appointed for Ireland. Also in his fifth year bafe moneys formerly coined were cried down; so as the shilling went but for nine pence, and shortly after but for six pence, the groat but for three pence, and shortly after but for two pence.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

IN the first year of this Kings Reign, Injunctions were set forth for pulling down and removing all Images out of Churches; also certain Homilies were appointed to be made by Learned men, to be read in Churches, for the peoples instruction. And at Easter this year it was ordered, that the Sacrament of the Lords Supper should be ministred to the Lay-people in both kinds. Also Marriage was allowed to Clergy-men; Auricular Confession and Prayer for the dead were forbidden. And it is observable, that the very same day that Images were pulled down at London, the great overthrow was given to the Scots at Musselborough. Also at this time, by the Archbishop Cranmers means, divers learned Protestants came over into England, and had here entertainment, as Peter Martyr, Martin Bucer, and Paulus Fagius: of whom

Peter Martyr was sent to read a Divinity Lecture in Oxford, Bucer and Fagius in Cambridge. In this Kings fourth year all Altars in Churches were commanded to be taken down, and Tables placed in their rooms. In his fifth year the Book of Common-Prayer was established.

Casualties happening in his time.

IN his second year S. Annes Church within Aldersgate was burnt. In his fifth year a Sweating-sickness infested first Shrewsbury, and then the North parts, and afterwards grew most extreme in London, so as the first Week there died eight hundred persons; and was so violent, that it took men away in four and twenty hours, sometimes in twelve, and sometimes in less. Amongst others of Account that died of this Sickness, were the two Sons of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, who died within an hour after one another, in such order that both of them died Dukes. This Disease was proper to the English Nation, for it followed the English wheresoever they were in foreign Parts, but seized upon none of any other Country. In this year one Mr. Arden of Kent, by procurement of his Wife, was murdered in his own house; being dead, his body was carried out and laid upon the ground in a Close hard by: where this is memorable, that for two years after, the ground where his body lay bore no grass, but represented still as it were a Picture of his body, only in the space between his legs and arms there grew grass; but where any part of his body touched, none at all. Yet this Miraculous Accident was not so much for the Murder, as for the Curses of a Widow-woman, out of whose hands the said Master Arden had uncharitably bought the said Close, to her undoing. And thus the Divine Justice, even in this World oftentimes, works Miracles upon Offenders, for a merciful warning to men, if they would be so wise to take it. In his sixth year, the third of August, at Middleton-stony, eleven miles from Oxford, a woman brought forth a Child which had two perfect bodies from the navel upward, the legs for both the bodies grew out at the midst where the bodies joyned, and it had but one issue for the Excrements of them both: they lived eighteen days, and were Women-children. This year also were taken at Quinborough three Dolphins, and at Black-Wall six more, the least of which was bigger than any Horse.

Works of Piety done by him, or others in his time.

THIS King gave three Houses to the Relief of the Poor. First, for the Fatherless and Beggars Children, he gave the late Gray-Fryers in London, which is now called Christs Hospital. Then for lame and diseased persons, he gave the Hospital of S. Thomas in Southwark, and S. Bartholomews in West-Smithfield. Thirdly, for riotous and idle persons, he gave his House of Bridewell. And for their Maintenance, he took six hundred pounds a year land from the House of the Savoy, (which had been long abused) and bestowed it upon these Houses; to which which he added four thousand Marks a year more. By his example, Sir William Chester Alderman of London, and John Calthrop Draper, at their own Costs, made the Brick-walls and Way on the Back side that leadeth to the Hospital of St. Bartholomews, and also covered and vaulted the Town-Ditch, which before was very noysome. In the second year of this King, Sir John Gresham, then Mayor of London, founded a Free-School at Holt in Norfolk. Also at his decease he gave to every Ward in London ten pounds, to be distributed amongst the Poor; and to Maids Marriages two hundred pounds. In his third year, Sir Rowland Hill, the then Lord Mayor of London, caused to be made a Cawsey, commonly called Overlane Pavement, in the High-way from Stone to Nantwich, in length four miles, for the ease of Horse and Man. He caused also a Cawsey to be made from Dun-Church to Bransfen in Warwickshire, more than two miles in length; and gave twenty pounds towards the making of Roitton Bridge, three miles from Coventry. He made likewise the High-way to Kilburne, near to London: Also four Bridges, two of them of Stone, containing eighteen Arches in them both; the one over the River of Severn, called Acham Bridge, the other Terne Bridges and two other of Timber at Stoke, where he built also a good part of the Church. A Free-School likewise he built at Drayton in Shropshire, with Master and Usher, and gave sufficient Stipends to them both. Also he purchased a free Fair to the said Town, with a free Market weekly; and every fourteen days a free Market for Cattel. Besides all this, he gave to the Hospital of Christ-Church in London in his life-time five hundred pounds, and at his death a hundred. In this Kings fourth year, Sir Andrew Jud, Mayor of London, founded a notable Free-School at Tunbridg in Kent; and gave threescore pounds land a year to the Skinners of London, for which they be bound to pay twenty pounds to the School-Master, and eight pounds to the Usher of his Free-School at Tunbridg yearly for ever. In his sixth year, Sir George Barnes, who was Mayor of London, gave a wind-Mill in Finsbury-Fields to the Haberdashers of London, the profits thereof to be distributed to the poor of that company: also to St. Bartholomews the Little, certain Tenements to the like use.

Concerning his Personage, it is said he was in Body beautiful, of a sweet aspect, and specially in his eyes, which seemed to have a starry liveness and lustre in them. Concerning his Conditions, in matter of Fact, there is not much to be said; but in matter of Disposition and Inclination very much, even to admiration. For though his Tree was not yet come to the maturity of bearing Fruit, yet it was come to the forwardness to bear plenty of Buds and Blossoms. For proof of his Merciful Disposition, this one example may be sufficient: when one Joan Butcher was to be burned for Blasphemy and Heresie, all the Council could not get him to sign the Warrant, till the Archbishop Cranmer, with much importunity, perswaded him; and then he did it, but not without weeping. For his pregnancy of Wit, and knowledge in all kinds of Learning, we shall need but to hear what Cardan (who coming into England, had often conference with him) reporteth of him; That he was extraordinarily skilful in Languages and in the Politicks, well seen in Philosophy and in Divinity, and generally indeed a very Miracle of Art & Nature. He would answer Embassadors sometimes upon the sudden, either in French or Latine. He knew the state of Foreign Princes perfectly, and his own more. He could call all Gentlemen of account through his Kingdom by their names. And all this when he had scarce yet attained to the age of fifteen years, and died before sixteen; that from hence we may gather, It is a sign of no long life, when the Faculties of the Mind are ripe so early.

IN the sixth year of his Reign, which was the year before he died, he fell sick of the Measels; and being well recovered of them, he fell soon after into the Small pox; and of them also was so well recovered, that the Summer following he rode a Progress with a greater Magnificence than ever he had done before, having in his Train no fewer than four thousand Horse. In January following (whether procured by sinister practice, or growing upon him by natural infirmity) he fell into an indisposition of body, which soon after grew to a Cough of the Lungs. Whereupon a rumour was spread abroad by some, that a Nosegay had been given him at New-years-tide, which brought him into this slow, but deadly Consumption: by others, that it was done by a Clyster. However it was, he was brought at last to so great extremity, that his Physicians despaired of his life: and when physicians could do him no good, a Gentlewoman (thought to be prepared for the purpose) took him in hand, and did him hurt; for with her applications his Legs swelled, his Pulse failed, his Skin changed colour, and many other symptomes of approaching death appeared. The hour before his death, he was over-heard to pray thus by himself; O Lord God, deliver me out of this miserable and wretched life. O Lord, thou knowest how happy it were for me to be with thee; yet for thy Chosens sake, if it be thy will, send me life and health, that I may truly serve thee. O Lord God, save thy chosen people of England, and defend this Realm from Papistry, and maintain thy true Religion, that I and my People may praise thy Holy Name, for thy Son Jesus Christ's sake. So turning his face, and seeing some by him, he said, I thought you had not been so nigh. Yes, said Doctor Owen, we heard you speak to your self. Then said the King, I was praying to God. O I am faint, Lord have mercy upon me, and receive my spirit: and in so saying, he gave up the Ghost, the sixth day of July, in the year 1553. and the sixteenth year of his age, when he had Reigned six years, five months, and nine daies. It is noted by some, that he died the same month, and the same day of the month, that his Father King Henry the Eighth had put Sir Thomas

King Edward's pitiful Disposition.

His pregnancy of Wit and Learning.

Suspected to be poisoned.

His Piety at the time of his death.

Thomas Moor to death. His Body was buried upon the ninth of August, in the Chappel of St. Peters Church in Westminster, and laid near to the Body of King Henry the Seventh, his Grandfather. At his Funeral, which was on the tenth of August following, his Sister Queen Mary shewed this respect to him, that though Doctor Day, a Popish Bishop, preached, yet all the Service with a Communion was in English.

Men of note in his time.

His King's Reign being short, and having but small Wars, had not many Sword-men famous for any Acts they did. Gown-men there were some: as, Edward Hall, a Counsellour in the Law, who wrote a notable Chronicle of the Union of the Two Houses of York and Lancaster, William Hugh, a Yorkshire man, who wrote a notable Treatise, called The Troubled man's Medicine; Thomas Sternhold, born in Southampton, who turned into English Meeter seven and thirty of David's Psalms.

The Interregnum between the death of King Edward, and the Proclaiming at London of Queen Mary.

The Duke of Northumberland bears all the sway. He causes the Mayor and Aldermen to swear allegiance to the Lady Jane.

Who is proclaimed Queen.

The Lady Mary rides post into Norfolk.

Takes upon her the name of Queen, and is assisted by the Norfolk-men, upon her promise not to alter Religion.

King Edward being dead, the Duke of Northumberland took upon him to sit at the Stern, and ordered all things at his pleasure. So two days after, he, with others of the Council, sent to the Lord Mayor, that he, with six Aldermen, and twelve principal Commons, should repair presently to the Court: to whom, when they came, it was signified that King Edward was dead; and that by his last Will, to which all the Nobility and Judges had given assent, he had appointed the Lady Jane, Daughter to the Duke of Suffolk, to succeed him, his Letters Patents whereof were shewed them: and thereupon they were required to take their Oaths of Allegiance to the Lady Jane, and to secure the City in her behalf; which, whether dissemblingly, or sincerely, whether for love, or fear, yet they did, and departed. The next day, the Lady Jane in great State was brought to the Tower of London, and there declared Queen; and by Edict with the sound of Trumpet proclaimed so through London. At which time, for some words seeming to be spoken against it, one Gilbert Pot, a Vintners servant, was set in the Pillory, and lost both his Ears. Before this time, the Lady Mary, having heard of her Brothers death, and of the Duke of Northumberland's designs, removed from Hovesdon to her Mannour of Keninghall in Norfolk, and under pretence of fearing infection, (having lately lost one of her Household-Servants of the Plague) in one day she rode forty miles, and from thence afterward to her Castle of Framlingham in Suffolk; where taking upon her the name of Queen, there resorted to her the most part of all the Gentlemen both of Norfolk and Suffolk, offering their Assistance; but upon condition, she would make no alteration in Religion: to which she condescended. And thereupon, soon after came to her the Earls of Oxford, Bath, and Suffex, the Lord Wentworth, Thomas Wharton, and John Mordant, Barons eldest Sons; and of Knights, Cornwallis, Drury, Walgrave, Shelton, Beningsfield, Jerningham, Suliard, Freston, and many others. The Lady Mary being thus assisted, wrote her Letter, signed the 9th of July, to the Lords of the Council; wherein she claimed the Crown, as of right belonging to her, and required them to proclaim her Queen of England in the City of London, as they tendred her displeasure. She writes to the Lords, and claimeth the Crown. The Lords Answer.

To this Letter of hers the Lords answered, That for what they did they had good Warrant, not only by King Edward's last will, but by the Laws of the Land, considering her Mothers Divorce, and her own Illegitimation; and therefore required her to submit her self to Queen Jane, being now her Sovereign. This Letter was written from the Tower of London, under the hands of these that Follow, Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Ely Chancellour, William Marquess of Winchester, John Earl of Bedford, Henry Duke of Suffolk, Francis Earl of Shrewsbury, John Duke of Northumberland, William Earl of Pembroke, Thomas Lord Darcey Lord Chamberlain, Cobham, Rich, Huntington, Cheyney, John Gates, William Peter, William Cecil, John Clerk, Mason, Edward North, and Robert Bowes. The quarrel on both sides being thus begun by Letters, is prosecuted by Arms; and the Lords for their General made choice of the Duke of Suffolk, as a man most likely to be firm and sure in the employment. But the Queen his Daughter cannot miss his presence, and besides, is not willing to hazard his person; and thereupon, she by intreaties, and the Lords by perswasions, prevail with the Duke of Northumberland to undertake the charge: who, before his going, having conference with the Lords, let them know how sensible he was of the double danger he underwent in this enterprise, both in respect of the Lady against whom he went, and in respect of them whom he left behind him: for if they in his absence should by any accident be drawn to waver in their resolution, they might work their own safety with his destruction, and make themselves seem innocent in his guiltiness. To which one of the Lords replied and said, Your Grace makes a doubt of that which cannot be, for which of us all can wash his hands clean of this business? And thereof it behoves us to be as resolute as your self. And the Earl of Arundel, Arundel, to testifie his resolution in the matter, said, He was sorry it was not his chance to go with him, at whose feet he could find in his heart to spend his blood. So the Duke, with the Marquess of Northampton, the Lord Gray, and divers others of account, on the fourteenth of July set forward on the Journey with eight thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse; and passing through Shoreditch, the Duke said to the Lord Gray, See how the people press to see us, but not one of them saith, God speed you. The Duke had every days march how far he should go appointed him by Commission: which being very slow, whether it were done of purpose by some that favoured the Lady Mary's side, was certainly a great help to her proceedings; for by this means she had the longer time to make her preparations. And indeed in this time two Accidents happened of great benefit to her. One, that Edward Hastings, the Earl of Huntington's Brother, having an Army of four thousand Foot committed to him by the Duke of Northumberland, he now left his Party, and went to the Lady Mary. The other, that six great Ships which lay before Tarmouth, to intercept the Lady Mary, if she should attempt to fly, now at the perswasion of Master Jerningham came to her aid. Which two revolts so terrified the Londoners, that though Doctor Ridley, Bishop of London, on the sixteenth of July, at Pauls Cross, preached a Sermon, wherein he invited the people to stand firm to Queen Jane, whose cause he affirmed to be most just, yet few or none were perswaded by him; so as the Lords themselves fell off from the side; who assembling at Baynards-Castle, first the Earl of Arundel, then the Earl of Pembroke fell to Invectives against the Duke of Northumberland; and then all the Lords joyning in Opinion with them, they called for the Mayor, and in London Proclaimed the Lady Mary Queen; as likewise the Lord Windsor, Sir Edmund Peckham, Sir Robert Drurie, and Sir Edward Hastings, did in Buckinghamshire; Sir John Williams of Tame, and Sir Leonard Chamberlain in Oxfordshire, and Sir Thomas Tresham in the County of Northampton. All this came soon to the knowledge of the Duke of Northumberland, being then at Bury; who thereby seeing how the World went, thought it his best course to turn with the stream: and thereupon returning to Cambridge, he took the Mayor of the Town with him into the Market-place, and there himself, for want of a Herald, Proclaimed the Lady Mary Queen, and in sign of joy threw up his Cap. Which yet served not his turn: for the next morning, Henry Fitz-Allen, Earl of Arundel, came into Cambridge from Queen Mary; who entering his Chamber, the Duke at his feet fell on his knees, desiring him for Gods love to consider his case, that had done nothing but by the Warrant of him and the Council. My Lord, (saith the Earl) I am sent hither by the Queen, to Arrest you. And I (saith the Duke) obey your Arrest; yet I beseech your Lordship to use mercy towards him, whose acts have been no other than were enjoined by Commission. You should have thought of that sooner, (saith the Earl:) and thereupon committed him to a Guard, and left him to the Queens mercy. Thus ended all this great Dukes designs in his own destruction, and brought him to fall on his knees to them, who had often before bowed their knees to him; and the Earl, who at the Dukes going out could have been contented to spend his blood at his feet, was now contented to be made an Instrument of his fall. So sudden are the turns of mens Affections, and so unstable is the building upon their Asseverations: at least, no man must look to have his case be of any weight against him, who hath his own case put in the Balance. Together with the Duke, his three Sons, John Ambrose, and Henry, the Earl of Huntington, Sir Andrew Dudley, the two Gates, John and Henry, Sir Thomas Palmer, and Doctor Sands, were conveyed towards London, and brought to the Tower; and the next day the Marquess of Northampton, the Lord Robert Dudley, and Sir Robert Corbet. Before which time, the Duke of Suffolk, entering his Daughters the Lady Jane's Chamber, told her, She must now put off her Royal Robes, and be contented with a private life. To which she answered, She would much more willingly put them off, than she had put them on; and would never have done it, but in obedience to him and her Mother. And this was the end of the Lady Jane's Ten Days Reign.

And with him divers more.

The Lady Jane hearing hereof, was nothing troubled at it. And thus ended her ten days Reign.

Which the Duke of Northumberland hearing, he also at Cambridge Proclaimed Queen Mary.

The Reign of QUEEN MARY.

The Lady Mary having been proclaimed Queen, comes to London, and so to the Tower.

Where she sets divers Lords at liberty.

And restores the Bishops who had been deprived.

THE Lady Mary, having been Proclaimed Queen in London, and other parts of the Realm; removed from her Castle of Framlingham towards London; and being come to Wansted in Essex, on the thirtieth of July, the Lady Elizabeth her Sister, with a Train of a thousand Horse, rode from her Place in the Strand to meet her. On the third of August the Queen rode through London to the Tower; where at her Entrance were presented to her Thomas Duke of Norfolk, Edward Lord Courtney, Stephen Gardiner, late Bishop of Winchester, and the Dutchess of Somerset, who all kneeling down, she kissed them, and said, These be my Prisoners, and then caused them presently to be set at liberty. The next day she restored the Lord Courtney to the Marquisate of Exeter; and the same day also she not only restored Stephen Gardiner to his Bishoprick of Winchester, but a few days after made him Chancellor of England: Yet this was the Man that had subscribed to her Mothers divorce, and had written books against the lawfulness of her Marriage. The fifth of August, Edmund Bonner, late Bishop of London, Prisoner in the Marshalsey, and Cuthbert Toustal, the old Bishop of Durham, Prisoner in the Kings Bench, had their Pardons, and were restored to their Sees. Shortly after, all the Bishops which had been deprived in the time of King Edward the Sixth, were restored to their Bishopricks, and the new removed: as Ridley was removed from London, and Bonner placed; Scory from Chichester, and Day placed; Miles Coverdale from Exeter, and West placed; John Hooper from Worcester, and Heath placed. Also all Beneficed men that were married, or would not renounce their Religion, were put out of their Livings, and other of a contrary opinion put in their rooms.

On the thirteenth of August, one Master Bourne a Canon of Pauls, preaching at Pauls-Cross, not only prayed for the dead, but also declared, that Doctor Bonner Bishop of London, (late restored, and there in presence) for a Sermon by him made four years before, in the same place, and upon the same Text, had unjustly been cast into the vile Prison of the Marshalsey. Which Speech so offended some of the Auditory that they cried, Pull him down, Pull him down; and had certainly done him violence, (for a Dagger was thrown at him) if Master Bradford, a Protestant Preacher, had not stepped into his place, and appeased the Tumult, and Master Rogers, another Protestant Minister, (who were both afterward burnt for Religion) had not shifted away Bourne into Pauls School.

Hitherto Queen Marias Reign had been without blood, but now the Cataracts of severity will be opened, that will make it rain blood: for now, on the eighteenth of August, John Dudley Duke of Northumberland, William Parre Marquess of Northampton, and John Earl of Warwick, Son and Heir, to the Duke, were arraigned at Westminster-Hall, before Thomas Duke of Norfolk as High Steward of England. Where the Duke of Northumberland, after his Indictment read, required the opinion of the Court in two Points. First, Whether a man doing any Act by authority of the Princes Council, and by Warrant of the Great Seal of England, might for any such Act be charged with Treason. Secondly, Whether any such persons as were equally culpable, and by whose Commandments he was directed, might be his Judges, and pass upon his Trial. Whereunto was answered, That concerning the first, the Great Seal, which he alledged for his Warrant, was not the Seal of the lawfull Queen of the Realm, but of an Usurper, and therefore could be no warrant for him. And as to the second, it was resolved, That if any were as deeply to be touched in the Case as himself, yet so long as no Attainder were of Record against them, they were persons able in Law to pass upon his Trial, and not to be challenged but at the Prince's pleasure. After which Answers, the Duke used few words, but confessed the Indictment, and accordingly had Judgment to die. By whose example, the other Prisoners arraigned with him, confessed the Indictments, and thereupon had Judgment. The nineteenth of August, Sir Andrew Dudley, Sir John and Sir Henry Gates, Brethren, and Sir Thomas Palmer, Knights, were Arraigned at Westminster; who confessing their Indictments, had Judgment, which was pronounced by the Marquess of Winchester, Lord High Treasurer, sitting that day as Chief Justice. After these Condemnations followed the Executions: for on the two and twentieth of August, John Duke of Northumberland was brought to the Tower-Hill, and there beheaded. Being upon the Scaffold in a Gown of green-coloured Damask, he put it off, and then made a long Speech, wherein he asked the Queen forgiveness, ness, whom he acknowledged to have grievously offended : and then making profession of his Faith, that he died a true Catholick, (meaning a Papist) he said the Psalms of Miserere & De Profundis, the Pater noster, and six of the first vers. of the Psalm In te domine speravi, ending with this ver. Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my Spirit. And this said, he looked about him, as looking for a Pardon; but none coming, he laid his head down upon the Block, and at one blow had it stricken off. His Body with the Head was buried in the Tower, by the body of Edward late Duke of Somerset, (mortal enemies while they lived, but now lying together as good friends :) so as there lieth before the high Altar in St. Peters Church, two Dukes between two Queens, namely, the Duke of Somerset and the Duke of Northumberland; between Queen Anne and Queen Katharine, all four beheaded. Of what Religion this Duke was, may well be doubted, seeing at his death he professed himself a Papist, when lately before he had importuned King Edward to make the Lady Jane his Successour, lest the Papal Religion should be restored. It seems he was not greatly of either, but for other ends: a Protestant then, when it was to make his Daughter-in Law Queen; now a Papist, when it was to save his life, (for it was thought he had a Pardon promised, if he would recant.) At the same time and place were beheaded Sir John Gates and Sir Thomas Palmer, who were no such Temporizers, but persisted and died in the Protestant Religion, which they had always professed.

Latimer & Cranmer sent to the Tower. Cranmer and the late Queen Jane, with the Sons of the Duke of Northumberland, arraigned and condemned. Queen Mary is Crowned, and in what order.

After this, a sprinkling of Mercy came from the Queen: for on the third of September the Lord Ferrers of Chartley, the two Chief Justices, Sir Roger Cholmely and Mountague, Sir John Cheek, and others were delivered out of the Tower, whither they had been committed. But a shower of severity followed: soon after for on the fifteenth of September Master Latimer, and Doctor Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury, were sent to the Tower; and on the third of November following, the said Archbishop Cranmer, the Lady Jane, (late Queen) and the Lord Guilford her Husband, with the Lords Ambrose and Henry, Sons to the late Duke of Northumberland were all arraigned at the Guildhall, found guilty, and had Judgment to die. All this while Queen Mary had contented her self to be Queen by proclamation; but now that things were something settled, she proceeds to her Coronation: for on the last of September she rode in her Chariot through London towards Westminster in this order. First rode a number of Gentlemen and Knights, then Doctors, then Judges, then Bishops, then Lords, then the Council; after whom followed the Knights of the Bath, thirteen in number, in their Robes, then the Bishop of Winchester Lord Chancellour, and the Marquess of Winchester Lord High Treasurer: next came the Duke of Norfolk, and after him the Earl of Oxford, who bore the Sword, then the Mayor of London in a Gown of Crimson Velvet, who bore the Scepter of Gold: after came the Queens Chariot, and then followed another Chariot, wherein sat the lady Elizabeth her Sister, and the Lady Anne of Cleve, and then came Ladies and Gentlewomen riding on Horses, trapped with red Velvet, &c. In this order they came through London to Westminster, where in many places by the way were Pageants and stately Shews, and many rich Presents given to the Queen. The next day she went by Water to the old Palace, and remained there till eleven of the clock, and then went on foot upon blue cloth, being railed on either side, to St. Peters Church, where she was Crowned and Anointed by the Bishop of Winchester, the two Archbishops being then in the Tower, with all Rites and Ceremonies of old accustomed.

After her Coronation, a general Pardon was published in her name, but interlaced with so many exceptions of matters and persons, that very few took benefit by it: for after the Pardon published, there were Commissioners assigned to compound with such persons as were excepted; from some of whom they took away their Fees and Offices, some they fined, and some they deprived of their Estates and Livings.

A Pardon granted, but full of exceptions.

About this time, Sir James Hales, one of the Justices of the Common Pleas, who in the time of King Edward had refused to sign a Writing for disinheriting the Lady Mary and the Lady Elizabeth, (a fact worthy at least of a kind of remembrance from the Lady Mary now Queen) yet now, for that at a Quarter-Sessions in Kent he gave charge upon the Statutes of King Henry the Eighth and King Edward the Sixth, in derogation of the Primacy of the Church of Rome, he was first committed to the Kings-Bench, then to the Counter, and lastly to the Fleet; where he grew so troubled in mind, that he attempted with a Pen-knife to kill himself: and being afterward recovered of that hurt, and brought to the Queens presence, who gave him very comfortable words, yet could he never come to be quiet in his mind; but in the end drowned himself in a River not half a mile from his house, the River being so shallow, that he was fain to lie groveling before he could dispatch himself of life.

Sir James Hales Justice of the Common Pleas drowns himself, and why.

And now another sprinkling of Mercy came from the Queen; for the Marquess of Norhampton and Sir Henry Gates, lately before condemned to die, were now pardoned, and set at liberty. The Lady Jane also was allowed the liberty of the Tower, not without hope of life and liberty all together, if her Father the Duke of Suffolk had not the second time been cause of her destruction.

The Lady Jane, though condemned, is allowed the liberty of the Tower.

About this time also a Synod was assembled, for consulting about matters of Religion, and the point specially of the Real Presence in the Sacrament. The Prolocutor was Doctor Weston; and of the Protestant side were John Ailmer and Richard Cheney, both Bishops afterward in Queen Elizabeths time, also John Philpot, afterward burnt, James Haddon, and others. After long Disputation, where reasons were not so much weighed, as voices numbred, the Papal side, as having most voices, carried it: and thereupon was that Religion again restored, and the Mass commanded in all Churches to be celebrated, after the ancient manner.

Upon a conference about Religion, the Mass is again restored.

It was now the year 1553. when Queen Mary was come to the age of seven and thirty years, and therefore high time now to think of Marriage,

Marriage, at least if she meant to have Issue of her body: but a hard matter it was to find a Husband in all points fitting for her: yet three at this time (in common fame at least) were taken into consideration. One was the Lord Courtney, Marquess of Exeter, a goodly Gentleman, and of Royal blood: but there was an exception against him, because inclining (as was thought) to Lutheranism. Another was Cardinal Poole, of a dignity not much inferiour to Kings, and by his Mother descended from Kings: but there was exception against him also, because four and fifty years old, (as old a Batchelour as Queen Mary was a Maid) and so the less hope of Issue between them. But the third (if he might be had) was without exception, and this was Philip Prince of Spain, the Emperour Charles his eldest Son, with whom, being a Spaniard, she was the fitter matched, as being by the Mother a Spaniard her self. And now very opportunely came in the beginning of January Embassadors into England about it; amongst others, the Count of Egmond, Admiral of the Low-Countries, and John of Memorancy Lord of Curryers: whose Message was so kindly entertained, that the Marriage in short time was absolutely concluded; though it seemed something strange to many, that she should now be the Wife to the Son, who thirty years before should have been Wife to the Father. But so it is, Queens are never old so long as they are within years of bearing Children. And indeed the Match was concluded with Conditions of far more advantage to Queen Mary than they were to King Philip, as on the fourteenth of January Stephen Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, and Lord Chancellour of England, openly in the Presence-Chamber at Westminster, declared to all the Lords and Gentlemen there present. For it was agreed, that after the Marriage, King Philip should have the Title of all the Queens Dominions, and be assumed into fellowship of the Government; but yet with reservation to the Queen of all Privileges and Customs of the Kingdom, and free disposition of all Offices and Honours. As likewise the Queen would be assumed into the fellowship of all the Kings Dominions, and surviving him, should have a Joynture of two hundred thousand pounds a year. Then for the Issue between them, if she had a Son, that he should inherit the Low-Countries and Burgundy; and King Philip's Son Charles, which he had by a former Wife, should inherit all his Dominions in Italy and Spain: but if his Son Charles should fail without Issue, then the Son he should have by Queen Mary should inherit his Kingdom of Italy and Spain also. And the like good provision was also made for Daughters. But notwithstanding these great advantages of the Match, yet such was the precipitant rashness of some, that thinking themselves wiser than the Queen and the Council, they sought by all means to oppose the match; giving out, that it tended to bring England under the yoke of Spain, and to make the Country a slave to strangers. This was the general murmuring of people: but the first that shewed himself in Arms, was Sir Thomas Wyat of Kent, who having communicated the matter with the Duke of Suffolk the Lady Janes Father, with Peter Caroe a Knight of Devonshire, and divers others, intended only to make secret provision, but not to stir till Prince Philip should be come, that so their cause of taking Arms might have the better colour. On the fifteenth of January, Robert Dudley, Son to the Duke of Northumberland, was arraigned at the Guild-Hall of high Treason; who confessed the Indictment, and had Judgment given by the Earl of Suffex, to be drawn, hanged, bowelled and quartered.

The Lord

Dudley is

But now in Counsels communicated to many, it is a hard matter to have counsel kept; and Sir Peter Caroe finding that their Plot was discovered, fled privily into France, where lurking for a time, he was afterward taken at Bruxells, and brought Captive into England: as likewise at the same time and place Sir John Cheek King Edward's School-Master, was taken; who being drawn by terrours to embrace the Papal Religion, with very grief afterward of his error pined away and died. Sir Peter Caroe lived many years after, and died in Ireland; though it be falsely recorded, they were both burnt for Religion in June this year. Wyat hearing of Sir Peter Caroe's flight, and that all their purpose was discovered, was driven before his time to enter into Arms, giving out for the Cause, that it was not to attempt any thing against the Queen, but only to remove ill Counsellours, and chiefly to repel Prince Philip, left by his Marriage the Kingdom should come in subjection to the Spaniard. With Wyat were joyned Sir Henry Isle, Sir George Harper, Anthony and William Knevet, and divers other Gentlemen of the County. Against him, were the Lord Abergavenny, Sir Thomas Cheiney Lord Warden of the Ports, Sir Robert Southwell Sheriff of Kent, Sir Warham Sentleger, Sir Thomas Kemp, Sir Thomas Moyle, Sir Thomas Finch, with divers other; yet all these great men had such doubt of the people, that they durst not proceed but very warily. The five and twentieth of January news came to London of Wyat's rising; against whom was presently sent the Duke of Norfolk with Sir Henry Jerningham Captain of the Guard, Sir Edward Bray, Sir John Fogge, John Covert, Roger Appleton Esquires and five hundred Souldiers out of London appointed to go after him, under the leading of Captain Bret. And now see in times of Sedition how uncertain a thing it is to trust to the people; for before Bret could overtake the Duke, Sir George Harper was secretly got to him, who so perswaded him, that he and his five hundred Souldiers left the Duke, and went all to Wyat; which made the Duke and those with him presently to flie, and put such boldness into Wyat, that now he marched with great confidence towards London, with so great terrour to all sorts of people, that at Westminster-Hall the Serjeants and other Lawyers pleaded in harness.

In the mean time the Duke of Suffolk was perceived in Warwickshire to be raising of Forces in assistance of Wyat: against whom was presently sent the Earl of Huntington; and the Duke finding himself unable to make resistance, stance, having with all his industry gotten together but only fifty men he betook himself to a Tenant of his, one Underwood, with whom he hoped, and had promise, to remain undiscovered, till he might have opportunity to escape, as some say; as others, to a Keeper of his Park, called Nicholas Lawrence, who kept him in a hollow Oak in the said Park for two or three dayes. But whether Underwood or Lawrence, either out of fear, or out of hope of reward, he betrayed him to the Earl, by whom he was taken, and under a strong Guard carried to the Tower. Upon this, Queen Mary her self came into London, where calling the Mayor and chief of the City together, she made an Oration, wherein she shewed the insolency of Wyat; who though he pretended but only the crossing of the Marriage, yet was now grown to such presumption, that he required to have the Custody of her Person, and to have Counsellors retained or removed at his pleasure. And as for her Marriage, she there affirmed she had done nothing in it but by the advice of her Council; and for her self, that she was not so longing for a Husband, but that if it were not more for the good of the Kingdom, than for her own Satisfaction, she would never once think of entertaining it. Having by her Speech confirmed the minds of the Citizens, Forces were presently raised and placed about the Bridge, and other fit places of the City. The third of February, Wyat with an Army of three or four thousand came to London, hoping of present entrance; but finding the Bridge broken, and Souldiers placed to resist him, after two dayes stay in Southwark, he removed to Kingstone, where he found likewise the Bridge broken; yet with great industry suddenly repairing it, he passed over his men, and meant with all speed to get to the Court, before the Queen should have notice of his coming: and had done so indeed, if a mischance, and an error upon that mischance had not hindered him. For being come within six miles of London, the Carriage of one of his great Ordnance brake; in mending whereof so much time was spent, (and Wyat by no persuasions would go forward without it) that the time was past in which his Friends at London expected his coming: which disappointment made many in those parts to fall off, and being perceived by those about him, many of them also; so as one half of his Army was suddenly gone and left him; amongst other, Sir George Harper, the most intimate of all his Council, went to the Queen, and discovered all his purposes. Whereupon the Earl of Pembroke, with a Company levied upon the sudden, was sent against him, who made Wyat slack his pace, so as it was Noon before he came to the Suburbs of the City; and then placing his Ordnance upon a Hill, and leaving there the greatest part of his Army, he only with five Ensigns marched towards Ludgate, and being encountered at Charing-Cross by the Lord Chamberlain and Sir John Gage, after a small fight put them to flight in such sort, that word was carried to the Queen, how near Wyat approached, and how wonderfully he prevailed all the way he came. With which nothing dismayed, Well then

(said she) I will go in person against him myself; and was preparing to do so indeed, (so much was her Father's Valour running in her veins) but it needed not; for by this time Sir Henry Jerningham Captain of the Guard, Sir Edward Bray Master of the Ordnance, and Sir Philip Paris had given him Battel, and slain many of his men. And that which was more, coming to Ludgate, he was denied entrance; and then thinking to retire, he heard the Earl of Pembroke with his Forces was behind at Charing-Cross: so as neither able to go forward, nor yet back-ward, he was at a stand and in amazement, and then leaning a while upon a Stall by the Bell-Savage, after a little musing, he returned towards Temple-Gate: where Clarenceaux the Herald meeting him, fell to persuade him, not to be a cause of more effusion of blood, nor by persisting in obstinacy to exclude all hopes of the Queens mercy. The Soldiers of Wyat were earnest with him to have stood it out: but Wyat as fillily ending, as he had unadvisedly begun, yielded himself to Sir Maurice Berkley, and getting up upon his horse behind him in that manner rode to the Court; where he had not the entertainment he expected, for without more adoe he was presently sent away to the Tower. The Captain taken, the rest made no resistance, few fled, and of the other many were taken and laid in prison: and this was done the sixth of February. And now consultation was held what Delinquents should be punished: where the first that was thought on was the Lady Jane, in whom was verified, The Fathers have eaten sour Grapes, and the Childrens teeth are set on edge; the innocent Lady must suffer for her Fathers fault: for if her Father the Duke of Suffolk had not this second time made shipwrack of his Loyalty, his daughter perhaps had never tasted the salt-waters of the Queens displeasure: but now, as a Rock of offence, she is the first that must be removed; and thereupon is Doctor Fecknam sent to acquaint her, That she must prepare her self to die the next day. Which Message was so little unpleasing unto her, that she seemed rather to rejoyce at it, as whereby she should at last be set at liberty. And the Doctor being earnest with her to leave her new Religion, and to embrace the old; she answered, She had now no time to think of any thing but of preparing her self to God by Prayer. Feckman thinking she had spoken this, to the end she might have some longer time of life, obtained of the Queen three days longer, and then came and told so much to the Lady Jane, whereat she smiling said, You are much deceived, if you think I had any desire of longer life; for I assure you, since the time you went from me, my life hath been so tedious to me, that I long for nothing so much as death; and since it is the Queens pleasure, I am most willing to undergoe it. Before she was brought to Execution, her Husband, the Lord Guilford, had made suit, and obtained to see her, and have some conference with her: but she refused it, saying, These were rather augmenters of grief, than comforts of death; she made no doubt, but they should shortly meet in a better place, and in a better condition of society. So on the twelfth of

Wyat being denied Entrance at Ludgate, retires, and at last yields himself to Sir Maurice Berkley, and is sent to the Tower.

The Lady Jane hath word sent her to prepare her self to die. Whereat she seemed to rejoyce.

She is beheaded.

The Duke of Suffolk is beheaded.

Steph. Gardiner practices against the Lady Elizabeth.

February her Husband the Lord Guilford first, and then she, an hour or two after, was beheaded within the Tower; where she acknowledged her self to have deserved death, not for seeking the Crown, but for not refusing it being offered. And after Prayers to God, unclothing her self, and putting a Handkerchief before her eyes, she laid her Head down upon the Block, and patiently suffered death, more grievous to the beholders than to her self. This end had the Lady Jane Gray, a Lady of incomparable Piety, and (for her years) of incomparable Learning; for being not past seventeen years of age, she understood perfectly the Greek and Latine Tongues, and was so ready in Points of Divinity, as if she knew them by inspiration rather than by instruction: no less a Miracle in this kind than King Edward; and therefore no marvel if he appointed her to succeed him in the Kingdom, who in the endowments of Mind was so like unto him, that whilest she reigned, it might be thought he continued to reign himself, at least no more differing but only the Sex. It may not be forgotten, that Judge Morgan, who at her Arraignment gave the sentence against her, shortly after fell mad, and in his raving, cried continually to have the Lady Jane taken away from him, and so ended his life.

Two days after the Execution of the Lady Jane, namely, the fourteenth and fifteenth of February, twenty pair of Gallows were set up in divers places of the City, whereon were hanged fifty of Wyat's Faction. On the eighteenth of February Bret was hanged at Rochester in Chains: Sir Henry Isle, who had been taken in an old freez Coat and an old pair of Hose, with his Brother Thomas Isle, and Walter Mantell, were hanged at Maidstone: Anthony Knevet, and his Brother William, with another of the Mantells, were executed at Sevenock. But then on the twentieth of February, a sprinkling of mercy came, for four hundred of Wyat's followers, being brought before the Queen with halters about their necks, were all pardoned and set at liberty. But then severity soon after began again, for on the three and twentieth of February the Lord Henry Gray, Duke of Suffolk, and Father to the Lady Jane, who the week before had been arraigned and condemned, was on the Tower-Hill beheaded; and on the eleventh of April in the same place was beheaded (the Author of all this mischief) Wyat himself, whose quarters were set up in divers places of the City, his Head upon the Gallows at Hay-hill, besides Hide-Park. This man, in hope of life, having before accused the Lord Courtney, and the Lady Elizabeth, the Queens Sister, to be privy to his Conspiracy, yet at his death he cleared them, and protested openly, that they were altogether innocent, and never had been acquainted with his proceedings. Yet was this matter so urged against them by Stephen Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester and Lord Chancellour, that both of them in March before had been committed to the Tower, though in May following they were both again released; but yet confined, the Lady Elizabeth to Woodstock, under the custody of Sir Henry Bedingsfield of Oxenborough in the County of Norfolk; the Lord Courtney to Fotheringhay, under the custody of Sir Thomas Tresham, who after some time was set at liberty, and going into Italy there died. It is memorable, what malice this Bishop Gardiner bore to the Lady Elizabeth, by whose only procurment, not only she was kept in most hard durance, but a Warrant was at last framed under certain Counsellours hands, to put her to death: which had been done, but that Mr. Bridges, Lieutenant of the Tower, pitying her case, went to the Queen to know her pleasure, who utterly denied that she knew any thing of it; by which means her life was preserved. Indeed the Bishop would sometimes say, how they cut off boughs and branches, but as long as they let the root remain, all was nothing: and it is not unworthy the remembring what trains were laid to ensnare her. The common Net at that time for catching of Protestants, was the Real Presence, and this Net was used to catch her: for being asked one time, what she thought of the words of Christ, This is my Body, whether she thought it the true Body of Christ that was in the Sacrament; it is said, that after some pausing, she thus answered,

*Christ was the Word that spake it:
He took the Bread, and brake it:
And what the Word did make it,
That I believe, and take it.*

Which though it may seem but a slight expression, yet hath it more solidness than at first sight appears; at least it served her turn at that time to escape the Net, which by direct answer she could not have done.

On the seventeenth of February, Thomas Lord Gray, the Duke of Suffolks Brother was beheaded, the last, and indeed the least, in Delinquency, that suffered for having any hand in Wyat's Conspiracy. There remained yet a fagg-end, and was indeed but a fagg-end, as nothing worth: for on the same day Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, being accused to have been a party in Wyat's Conspiracy, was at the Guild-Hall arraigned before Sir Thomas White Lord Mayor, the Earls of Shrewsbury and Derby, Sir Thomas Bromley Lord Chief Justice of England, Sir Nicholas Hare Master of the Rolls, Sir Francis Englefield Master of the Wards, Sir Richard Somthwell and Sir Edward Walgrave Privy Counsellours, Sir Roger Cholmely, Sir William Portman, one of the Justices of the Kings Bench, Sir Edward Sanders, one of the Justices of the Common Pleas, Mr. Stamford and Mr. Dyer Serjeants at Law, Mr. Edward Gryffin Attorney-General, Mr. Sendal and Peter Tichborne Clerks of the Crown; where the said Sir Nicholas Throgmorton so fully and discreetly answered all Objections brought against him, that he was found by the Jury Not guilty and was clearly acquitted. But the Jury notwithstanding was afterward troubled for acquitting him, and sent Prisoners, some of them to the Tower, and some to the Fleet, and afterward fined to pay a thousand Marks apiece at least, and some two thousands pounds; though these Sums were afterward something mitigated.

He procures a Warrant to put her to death. And how she was preserved.

Thomas Lord Gray, the Duke of Suffolks brother beheaded. Sir Nicholas Throgmorton arraigned, and by the Jury acquitted.

It is scarce worth remembring, that in the end of this first year of the Queens Reign, one Elizabeth Croft, a Wench of eighteen years old, was by practice put into a Wall, and thereupon called The Spirit in the Wall, who, with a Whistle made for the purpose, whistled out many seditious words against the Queen, the Prince of Spain, the Mass, Confession, and such other points; for which she did Penance, standing upon a Scaffold at Paul's Cross all the Sermon-time, where she made open confession of her fault.

There had been good store of Lay-mens blood shed already, & now the time is coming to have Clergy-mens shed: and for a preparative to it, on the tenth of April, Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury, Nicholas Ridley late Bishop of London, and Hugh Latimer late Bishop of Worcester, are conveyed from the Tower to Oxford, there to dispute with Oxford and Cambridge-men in Points of Religion, but especially of the Eucharist. The Oxford-men were Cole, Chadsey, Pye, Harpsfield, Smith, and Doctor Weston Prolocutor: the Cambridg-men, Young, Seaton, Watson, Atkinson, Fecknam, and Sedgewick. The Disputation ended, which (we may well think as the matter was carried) went against the Prisoners, on the twentieth of April they were brought again on the Stage; and then demanded, whether they would persist in their Opinion, or else recant. And affirming they would persist, they were all three adjudged Hereticks, and condemned to the Fire: but their Execution we must not look for till a year or two hence. But in the meantime we have John Rogers, the first Martyr of these Times, burnt at London the fourth of February: after whom, the ninth of February, John Hooper, late Bishop of Worcester, burnt at Gloucester: after him Robert Ferrar, Bishop of Man, burnt at Carmarthen: after him, John Bradford, with many others; and then the two famous men, Ridley and Latimer, no less famous for their constant deaths than their Religious lives, both burnt at Oxford the sixteenth of October.

that suffered for Religion in Queen
time.

This Rising of Wyat had been a Remora to the Queen's Marriage; and now to avoid all such obstacles hereafter, the Queen in April called a Parliament, wherein were propounded two things; one for Confirmation of the Marriage, the other for restoration of the Popes Primacy. This latter was not assented to but with great difficulty; for the six years Reign of King Edward had spread a plantation of the Protestant Religion in the hearts of many: but the Proposition for the Marriage was assented to readily, but yet with the adding of some conditions, which had not been thought of in the former Articles. 1. That King Philip should admit of no Stranger in any Office, but only Natives. 2. That he should innovate nothing in the Laws and Customs of the Kingdom. 3. That he should not carry the Queen out of the Realm, without her consent, nor any of her Children, without consent of the Council. 4. That surviving the Queen, he should challenge no right in the Kingdom, but suffer it to descend to the next Heir. 5. That he should carry none of the Jewels of the Realm out of the Kingdom, nor suffer any Ships or Ordnance to be removed out of the Realm. And lastly, That neither directly nor indirectly, he should cause the Realm of England to be intangled with the War between Spain and France.

All things being thus agreed on, the Earl of Bedford Lord Privy-Seal, the Lord Fitz-waters, and divers other Lords and Gentlemen, are sent into Spain, to fetch over Prince Philip; who arrived at Southampton the twentieth of July, in the year 1554. and the three and twentieth came to Winchester, where the Queen met him, and the five and twentieth the Marriage between them there was openly solemnized: (the disparity of years, as in Princes, not much regarded, though he were then but seven and twenty years of age, she eight and thirty.) At which time the Emperours Embassadors being present, openly declared, that in Consideration of that Marriage, the Emperour had given to Prince Philip his Son, the Kingdoms of Naples and Hierusalem. And thereupon (the solemnity of Marriage being ended) Garret King of Heralds openly in the Church, in the presence of the King, the Queen, and the Lords both of England and Spain, solemnly proclaimed the Title and Style of these two Princes, as followeth: Philip and Mary, by the Grace of God, King and Queen of England, France, Naples, Hierusalem, and Ireland, Defenders of the Faith; Princes of Spain, and Sicily; Arch-Dukes of Austria; Dukes of Millain, Burgundy, and Brabant; Counts of Habsburg, Flanders, and Tyroll. After this, the King and Queen by easie journeys came to Windsor Castle, where the King was installed Knight of the Garter, and the Earl of Suffex with him. The eleventh of August they removed to Richmond, the seven & twentieth to Suffolk-Place in Southwark, and the next day to London, (where the stately Shews that were made may well enough be conceived without relating:) from hence after four days they removed again to Richmond, where all the Lords had leave to depart into their Countries: and indeed so many departed, that there remained not an English Lord at the Court but the Bishop of Winchester. From Richmond they removed to Hampton-Court, where the Hall door within the Court was continually kept shut, so as no man might enter, unless his errand were first known; which might perhaps be the fashion of Spain, but to Englishmen seemed very strange.

the King and Queen, came over into England; and had come sooner; but that the Emperour, fearing he might prove a Corival with his Son Philip, had used means to stop his passage; but now that his Son's Marriage was past, he was content to let him pass: who though he came from Rome with the great authority of a Legate à Latere, yet he would not but come privately into London, because his Attainder was yet upon Record. An act therefore was presently passed to take it off, and to restore him in blood. For passing of which Act, the King & Queen in Person came to the Parliament-House, whither a few days after the Cardinal came himself; which was then kept in the great Chamber of White-hall, because the Queen, by reason of sickness, was not well able to go abroad. And here the King and Queen sitting under the Cloath of Estate, and the Cardinal on their right hand, all the Lords, Knights and Burgeses being present, the Bishop of Winchester, Lord Chancellour, made a short Speech unto them, signifying the presence of the Lord Cardinal, and that he was sent from the Pope as his Legate à Latere, to do a Work tending to the glory of God, and the benefit of them all; which (saith he) you may much better hear from his own mouth. Then the Cardinal rose up, and made a long solemn Oration, wherein he first thanked them for his restoring, by which he was enabled to be a Member of their Society: Then exhorting them to return into the bosom of the Church, for which end he was come; not to condemn, but to reconcile; not to compel, but to call and require. And for their first work of Reconcilement, requiring them to repeal and abrogate all such Laws as had formerly been made in derogation of the Catholick Religion. After which Speech, the Parliament, going together, drew up a Supplication, which within two dayes after they presented to the King and Queen; wherein they shewed themselves to be very penitent for their former Errors, and humbly desired their Majesties to intercede for them to the Lord Cardinal and the See Apostolick, that they might be Pardoned of all they had done amiss, and be received into the bosom of the Church, being themselves most ready to abrogate all Laws prejudicial to the See of Rome. This Supplication being delivered to the Cardinal, he then gave them Absolution in these words; [We, by the Apostolick Authority given unto Us, by the most Holy Lord Pope Julius the Third, (Christ's Vicegerent on Earth) do absolve and deliver you, and every of you, with the whole Realm and Dominions thereof, from all Heresie and Schism, and from all Judgments, Censures, and Pains for that cause incurred. And also We do restore you again to the Unity of our Mother the Holy Church.] The report hereof coming to Rome, was cause that a solemn Procession was made for joy of the Conversion of England to the Church of Rome. And now the Queen had a great desire to have King Philip Crowned, but to this the Parliament would by no means assent.

In October this second year of her Reign a rumour was spread of the Queens being with child, and so forward, that she was quick; and thereupon were Letters sent from the Lords of the Council to Bonner Bishop of London, that Prayers of Thanksgiving should be made in all Churches; and the Parliament it self was so credulous of it, that they entred into consideration of the Education of the Child, and made an Act, desiring the King, (out of the confidence they had in him) that if the Queen should fail, he would be pleased to take upon him the Rule and Government of the Child. But after all this, in June following, it came to be known that it was but a Tympany; or at least the Queen so miscarried, that there was no Child, nor the Queen likely ever after to have any. But howsoever, in hope of the joy that was expected; in January this year; divers of the Council, as the Lord Chancellour, the Bishop of Ely, the Lord Treasurer, the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Controller of the Queens House, Secretary Bourne, and Sir Richard Southwell Master of the Ordinance, were sent to the Tower, to discharge and set at liberty a great part of the Prisoners in the Tower; as namely, the late Duke of Northumberland's Sons, Ambrose, Robert, and Henry, also Sir Andrew Dudley, Sir James Crofts, Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, Sir John Rogers, Sir Nicholas Arnold, Sir George Harper, Sir Edward Warner, Sir William Sentlow, Sir Gomen Carow, William Gybbs Esquire, Cuthbert Vaughan, and some others.

About this time one William Fetherstone, a Millers Son, of the age of eighteen years, named and bruted himself to be King Edward the Sixth: for which being apprehended and examined, he answered as one Lunatick, and thereupon was whipped at the Carts tail, and banished into the North. But the year after, spreading abroad again that King Edward was alive, and that he had talked with him, he was arraigned and condemned of Treason, and at Tyburn hanged and quartered.

In the month of March the Queen was taken with a fit of Devotion, and thereupon called unto her four of her Privy Council, namely, William Marquess of Winchester Lord Treasurer, Sir Robert Rochester Controller, Sir William Peter Secretary, and Sir Francis Englefield Master of the Wards, and signified unto them, That it went against her Conscience to hold the Lands and Possessions, as well of Monasteries and Abbeys, as of other Churches, and therefore she did freely relinquish them, and leave them to be disposed as the Pope and the Lord Cardinal should think fit; and thereupon charged them to acquaint the Cardinal with her purpose. And shortly after, in performance hereof, John Fecknam, late Dean of Pauls, was made Abbot of Westminster, and had possession delivered him, and with him fourteen Monks received the Habit at the same time: and on the twentieth of November, Sir Thomas was instituted Lord of St. Johns of Hierusalem, and was put in possession of the Lands belonging unto it. And when it was told her, that this would be a great diminution of the Revenues of her Crown; she answered, She more valued the salvation of her Soul, than a thousand Crowns. A most religious speech, and enough, if there were but this, to shew her to be a most Pious Prince.

The Queen is preached in Churches to be with child, and prayers made for her safe delivery; but proved no such thing.

Divers that were in the Tower condemned are set at liberty.

One Fetherstone, a Millers Son, takes upon him to be King Edward the Sixth.

Is taken and hanged at Tyburn.

The Queen delivers up all the Lands of Monasteries that were in her hands.

King Philip goes into Flanders, where he stays eighteen months.

The fourth of September this year King Philip, waited on with the Earl of Arundel Lord Steward, the Earl of Pembroke, the Earl of Huntington, and others, went over to Calice, and from thence to Brussels in Brabant, to visit the Emperour his Father; who delivering him possession of the Low-Countries, in March following he returned into England; but on the sixth of July following, by reason of Wars with France, he passed again over to Calice, and so into Flanders, from whence he returned not till eighteen months after. Which made great muttering amongst the Common people, as though he took any little occasion to be absent, for the little love he bore to the Queen.

Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Winchester dies a strange death.

Bishop Cranmer upon hope of life recants.

Yet is brought to the stake and burnt: where he burns his hand first. When his whole body was burnt, his heart remained untoucht of the fire.

In the third year of the Queen died Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Winchester, at his house in Southwark. Of whose death it is memorable, that the same day in which Bishop Ridley and Mr. Latimer suffered at Oxford, he would not go to Dinner till four a clock in the afternoon, though the old Duke of Norfolk was come to dine with him: the reason was, because he would first hear of their being burnt; and as soon as word of that was brought him, he presently said, Now let us go to Dinner; where sitting down, and eating merrily, upon a sudden he fell into such extremity, that he was fain to be taken from the Table and carried to his Bed; where he continued fifteen days, without voiding any thing either by Urine or otherwise; which caused his Tongue to swell in his mouth, and so he died. After whose death, Nicholas Heath Archbishop of York was made Lord Chancellour.

And now comes the time of Archbishop Cranmer's Execution, who the year before had been condemned, and degraded by Commission from the Pope: after which, being by the subtilty of some put in hope of life, out of frailty he subscribed to a Recantation, which yet did him no good; for whether it were that Cardinal Poole would no longer be kept from being Archbishop, (which he could not be as long as he lived) or that the Queen could not be gotten to forget his being the chief Instrument of her Mothers Divorce, his Execution was resolved to be the fourteenth of February, in the same place at Oxford, where Ridley and Latimer five months before had died. Before the Execution, Doctor Cole preached, who, to make use of Cranmer's Recantation, told the people, they should do well to hearken to this Learned mans Confession, who now at his death, and with his death, would testify which was the true Religion; never thinking that Cranmer would have denied his former Recantation. But Cranmer being brought to the Stake, (contrary to expectation) acknowledged, that through frailty he had subscribed it, praying God heartily to forgive it; and now for a punishment, that Hand which had done it should first suffer: and therewithall thrusting his right Hand into the fire, he there held it, till it first, and then his whole body was consumed; onely (which was no smal miracle) his heart remained whole, and not once touched with the fire. The same year also, no fewer then eighty four of both Sexes were burnt for Religion. And it was a cruelty very far extended, that the bones of Bucer and Fagius, some time before dead and buried, were taken up, and publicly burnt in Cambridge. No sooner was Cranmer dead, but the very same day was Cardinal Poole made Archbishop of Canterbury.

In the fourth year of the Queen, exemplary Justice was done upon a great Person: for the Lord Stourton, a man much in the Queens favour, as being an earnest Papist, was for a Murther committed by him arraigned and condemned, and he (with four of his Servants) carried to Salisbury, was there in the Market-place hanged, having this favour, to be hanged in a silken Halter; his Servants in places near adjoining to the place where the Murther was committed.

The four and twentieth of April, Tho. Stafford, second Son to the Lord Stafford, with others to the number of two and thirty persons, (set on by the French King) attempted to raise Sedition against the Queen, for marrying with King Philip; and coming out of France, arrived at Scarborough in Yorkshire, where they took the Castle, but within two days were driven out by the Earl of Westmorland, and then taken and arraigned. The eight and twentieth of May, Stafford was beheaded on the Tower-Hill; and the next day three of his Associates, Strelly, Bradford, and Proctor were drawn from the Tower to Tyburn, and there executed. The first of May, Thomas Percy was first made Knight, after Lord, and the next day was created Earl of Northumberland; to whom the Queen gave all the Lands that had been his Ancestors.

At this time the Queen intangled her self (contrary to her promise) in her Husbands Quarrel; sent a defiance to the French King, by Clarenceaux King at Arms; and after on the Monday in the Whitsun-week, by sound of Trumpet, proclaimed open War against him in Cheapside, and other places of the City; and shortly after, caused an Army of a thousand Horse, and four thousand Foot, to be transported over, to the aid of her Husband King Philip, under the leading of the Earl of Pembroke Captain-General, Sir Anth. Brown Viscount Montague Lieutenant-General, the Lord Gray of Wilton Lord Marshal, the Earl of Rutland General of the Horse, the Earl of Lincoln Colonel of the Foot, the Lord Robert Dudley Master of the Ordnance, the Lord Tho. Howard, the Lord De la Ware, the Lord Bray, the Lord Chandoy, the Lord Ambrose Dudley, the Lord Henry Dudley, with divers Knights and Gentlemen; who joyning with King Philip's Forces, they all set down before S. Quintins, a Town of the French Kings of great importance. To the rescue whereof, the French King sent an Army, under the leading of the Countable of France, which consisted of nine hundred men at Arms, with as many light Horse, eight hundred Reysters, two and twenty Ensigns of Lancequenets, and sixteen Ensigns of French Footmen. Their purpose was, not to give battel, but to put more Succours into the Town; which the Philippians perceiving, encountred them, and in the fight slew John of Bourbon Duke of Anguine, the Viscount of Torrain, the Lord of Chadenier, with many Gentlemen of account. They took prisoners the Duke of Memorancy Constable of France, the Duke of Montpensier, Duke Longueville, the Marshall of Saint Andrews, the Lord Lewis Brother to the Duke of Mantoua, the Baron of Courton, the Rhinegrave Colonel of the Almanes, Monsieur d'Obigny, Monsieur de Biron, and many others; and then pursuing the Victory, under the Government of the Earl of Pembroke, on the seven and twentieth of August, they took the Town of S. Quintins: in the assault whereof, the Lord Henry Dudley, youngest Son to the Duke of Northumberland, was with a piece of great Ordnance slain, and some other of account. The Saccage of the Town K. Philip gave to the English, as by whose valour chiefly it was won.

The joy was not so great for this winning of S. Quintins, but there will be a greater sorrow presently for other losses. Many of the Garrison of Callice had been drawn from thence for service of S. Quintins, and no new supply sent: which being perceived by the French King, a Plot is laid how to surprize it; which yet was not so secretly carried, but that the Officers of Callice had intelligence thereof; who thereupon signified it to the Council of England, requiring speedy Succours, without which against so great an Army as was raised against them, they should not be able to hold out. But whether they gave no credit to their relations, or whether they apprehended not the danger so imminent as indeed it was, they neglected to send Supplies till it was too late. For the Duke of Guise, with no less speed than Policy, took such a course, that at one and the same time he set both upon Newnham-Bridge, and also upon Ricebank, (the two main Sconces for defence of the Town) and took them both; and then fell presently to batter the Walls of the Castle it self, and that with such violence of great Ordnance, that the noise was heard to Antwerp, being a hundred miles off. But having made the Walls assailable, the English used this Stratagem, they laid trains of Powder to blow them up, when they should offer to enter: but this Stratagem succeeded not; for the French in passing the Ditch had so wet their cloths, that dropping upon the Train, the Powder would take no fire, (so all things seemed to concur against the English.) And thereupon the Castle was taken also; and with it the Town also had been taken, but that Sir Anthony Ager, with the loss of his own life, and his eldest Sons, valiantly defended it, and for that time repelled the French. But their numbers increased so fast upon the Town, that the Lord Wentworth the Deputy, seeing no other way of safety, demanded Parlee; where a Composition was made, That the Town should presently be yielded to the French King, the lives of the Inhabitants onely saved, and safe conduct to pass away, saving the Lord Deputy, with fifty other, such as the Duke should name. And here to be quit with the English for their hard usage at S. Quintins, the Duke caused Proclamation to be made, that all and every person of the Town should bring their Money, Jewels and Plate, to the value of a Groat, and lay it down upon the high Altar of the Church: by which means, an inestimable sum of treasure was there offered, enough to enrich an Army, which had before enriched a Town. And now to make it appear how unable the Town was to hold out against so great an Army, it is said, there were in it but onely five hundred Souldiers of ordinary, and scarce two hundred more of able fighting men; but of other people, men, women and children, four thousand and two hundred: all which were suffered to depart, saving the Lord Wentworth the Deputy, Sir Ralph Chamberlain Captain of the Castle, John Hurlestone Captain of Ricebank, Nicholas Alexander Captain of Newnham-bridge, Edward Grimston the Controller, John Rogers the Surveyor, with others to the number of fifty, who were all carried prisoners into France. And thus Callice, which had been in possession of the English above two hundred years, was won from the English in eight days, which King Edward the Third had not won from the French in less then a year. The Lord Wentworth was suspected, and in Queen Elizabeth's time arraigned for betraying it; but was acquitted by his Peers. Callice thus won, the Duke with his Army marched to Guines, five miles distant, whereof was Captain the Lord Gray of Wilton, who held out the siege and batteries five or six days, with so great valour and resolution, that he appeared in nothing inferiour to the Enemy but in multitude: yet at last overlaid with their numbers, and importuned by his Souldiers, much against his own will, he made composition, that the Town and Castle should be wholly rendred, himself and all Officers remain prisoners, all other to depart with their Armour and Baggage. The Lord Gray was afterward ransomed for four and twenty thousand Crowns. And now the Duke of Guise considering that Guines would be too costly a Castle to be kept, and too dangerous a Neighbour to Callice, if it should be recovered, razed it with the Bulwarks and Fortifications to the ground. Guines thus won, there remained nothing within the English Pale, but the little Castle of Hammes, whereof was Captain the Lord Edward Dudley; who considering, that though it were naturally strongly situate, as being invironed with Fens and Marshes, yet it had but little helps by Art of Fortifications, and being assured that the Duke of Guise would speedily come upon him, he secretly in the night with all his Garrison departed into Flanders; so as the Castle was not won, but taken by the Duke of Guise; and with the loss of this Castle, the English lost all their footing in Terra Firma, and the Kings of England all the reality of their Title in France, having nothing left but nudum nomen.

Guines also won by the French.

And so the English lost all their footing in France.

Presently after this, the French King caused the Marriage between his eldest Son Francis the Dauphin, and Mary Stuart, sole Heir of James the Fifth King of Scotland, to be solemnized: whereupon great Wars ensued soon after between England and Scotland.

The Dauphin of France marries Mary Stuart Heir of Scotland.

Queen Mary being infinitely troubled in mind for the loss of Callice, sent presently forth her Admiral the Lord Clinton, with a Fleet of more than a hundred Sail, to recover at least reparation in honour, by doing some exploit upon France; who not finding opportunity to set upon Brest, as he was appointed, fell upon the Town of Conquest, which he took and burnt, and also divers Villages thereabouts, and then returned. In which mean time many great Conflicts having having been between King Philip and the King of France; at last, by mediation of the Dutcheſs of Lorrain, a Treaty of Peace is agreed on, where all things ſeemed to be well accorded, but only that King Philip by all means required reſtitution of Callice, to which by no means the French would aſſent. But whilſt they ſtood upon theſe terms, it hapned that firſt the Emperor Charles, King Philips Father, died, and ſhortly after Queen Mary, and the day after Cardinal Poole, and ſhortly after Sir John Baker of Siſſingberſt in Kent, who had been a Privy Counſellour to Henry the Eighth, Edward the Sixth, and Queen Mary. And ſo our Story hath no further relation to either War or Peace, between the two Kings of France and Spain.

Of her Taxations.

SHE began with a rare example; for in the firſt year of her Reign, was pardoned, by Proclamation, the Subſidy of four ſhillings the pound of Land, and two ſhillings the pound of Goods, granted in the laſt Parliament of King Edward the Sixth. In her ſecond year, in a Parliament then holden, was granted to the King and Queen a Subſidy of the Laity, from five pounds to ten pounds, of eight pence in the pound; from ten pounds to twenty pounds, of twelve pence in the pound; and from twenty pounds upwards, ſixteen pence in the pound: all Strangers double, and the Clergy ſix ſhillings in the pound. If this were all, then upon the matter, in all her time, there came no new charge upon her people; for one Subſidy remitted, and one received, made but even. In her laſt year ſhe borrowed twenty thouſand pounds of the City of London; and paid twelve pounds a year Inter-eſt for every hundred pound.

IN her firſt year, on the fourth of September, were proclaimed certain new Coins of Gold and Silver; a Sovereign of Gold of thirty ſhillings, the half Sovereign fifteen ſhillings, an Angel of ten ſhillings, the half Angel five ſhillings: of Silver, the groat, the half groat, and penny. All theſe Coyns to be currant as before. In her ſecond year, Proclamation was made, forbidding the ſhooting in Hand-guns, and bearing of weapons. The year in which ſhe was married to King Philip, a ſtrait charge was to all Victuallers, Taverners and Alehouſe-keepers, that they ſhould ſell no meat nor drink, nor any kind of victuals, to any Serving-man whatſoever, unleſs he brought a teſtimonial to ſhew whoſe ſervant he was. Alſo in a Parliament holden this year, amongſt other Acts, the Statute Ex Officio and other Laws made for the puniſhment of Hereſies, were revived; but chiefly the Popes Bull of Diſpenſation of Abbey-Lands was there confirmed. In her ſecond year, on Michalemas even, the Priſoners that lay in the Counter in Breadſtreet were removed to a new Counter made in Woodſtreet, of the Citys purchase and building; the which removing was confirmed by the common Council of the City.

IN the firſt year of this Queens Reign, all Biſhops which had been deprived in the time of King Edward the Sixth were reſtored to their Biſhopricks, and the new removed; alſo all benefited men that were Married, or would not forſake their Opinion, were put out of their Livings, and other of a contrary opinion put in their rooms. Alſo this year, on the ſeven and twentieth of Auguſt, the Service begun to be ſung in Latine in Pauls Church. Alſo this year the Popes Authority was by Act of Parliament reſtored in England, and the Maſs commanded in all Churches to be uſed. In her ſecond year the Realm was Abſolved, and reconciled to the Church of Rome by Cardinal Poole; and Firſt-fruits and Tenths were reſtored to the Clergy; but this was ſoon revoked, the Council finding the neceſſity of it for the Queens ſupport. In her fourth year Monafteries were begun to be re-edified; of which number were that of Weſtmiſter, that of Sheen and Sion, that of the Black-Fryers, and the Fryers of Greenwich. Of the number of thoſe that died for Religion in her time, there are recorded five Biſhops, one and twenty Divines; and of all ſorts of Men and Women, two hundred threeſcore and ſeventeen.

Works of Piety done by her, or others, in her time.

THIS Queen reſtored a great part of Abbey-lands that were in her poſſeſſion, and if ſhe had lived longer, very likely ſhe would have reſtored more. In her firſt year, Sir Thomas White, then Mayor, erected a Colledge in Oxford, now called St. Johns Colledge; before, Bernard Colledge. He alſo erected Schools at Briſtow and Reading, and gave two thouſand pounds to the City of Briſtow to purchaſe Lands, the profits whereof to be employed for the benefit of young Clothiers for ten years, and after that to be employed in like manner to the benefit of two and twenty other Shires and Cities. In her third year died Sir John Greſham, late Mayor of London, who founded a Free School at Holt in Norfolk, and gave to every Ward in London ten pounds to be diſtributed to the Poor; alſo to Maids Marriages two hundred pounds. Cuthbert Tunſtal Biſhop of Durham erected a goodly Library in Cambridge, ſtoring it with many excellent both Printed and Written Books: he alſo beſtowed much upon building at Durham, at Alnewick, and at Tunbridge.

Casualties happening in her time.

IN her firſt year, on the ſeven and twentieth of Auguſt, the goodlieſt Ship in England, called The Great Harry, being of the burthen of a thouſand Tun, was burnt at Woolwich by negligence of the Mariners. In her ſecond year, on the fifteenth of February, appeared in the Skie a Rainbow reverſed, the Bow turned downward, and the two ends ſtanding upward; alſo two Suns ſhined at one time a good diſtance aſunder:

asunder: which were taken for ill signs. This year also in the month of August, at a place in Suffolk by the Sea-side, all of hard stone and pebble, lying between the Towns of Orford and Alborough, where never grass grew, nor any earth was ever seen, there chanced suddenly to spring up, without any tillage or sowing, so great abundance of Peason, that the Poor gathered above a hundred quarters; yet there remained some ripe, and some blossoming, as many as were before. In her fourth year, hot burning Agues and other strange Diseases took away much people: so as between the twentieth of October and the last of December there died seven Aldermen, namely, Henry Heardson, Sir Richard Dobbs late Mayor, Sir William Laxton late Mayor, Sir Henry Hobblethorn late Mayor, Sir John Champneys late Mayor, Sir John Ayleph late Mayor, and Sir John Gresham late Mayor. In her fourth year, before Harvest, Wheat was sold for four Marks the quarter, Malt at four and forty shillings the quarter, and Pease at six and forty shillings and eight pence; where after Harvest, Wheat was sold for five shillings the quarter, Malt at six shillings eight pence, Rye at three shillings four pence the quarter. In the Country, Wheat was sold for four shillings the quarter, Malt at four shillings eight pence, and in some places a bushel of Rye for a pound of Candles, which was four pence. In her fifth year, within a mile of Nottingham, so marvelous a Tempest of thunder happened, that it beat down all the Houses and Churches in two Towns thereabouts, cast the Bells to the outside of the Church-yard, and some webs of Lead four hundred foot into the field, writhen as if it had been leather; the River of Trent running between the two Towns, the Water with the mud in the bottom was carried a quarter of a mile, and cast against Trees, with the violence whereof the Trees were pulled up by the Roots, and cast twelve score off: also a Child was taken forth of a mans hand, and carried two spears length high, and then let fall two hundred foot off, of which Fall it died: five or six men thereabouts were slain, and neither flesh nor skin perished: also there fell some Hail-stones that were fifteen inches about. This year also in Harvest-time was a great Mortality, and especially of Priests, so as many Churches were unserved, and much corn was lost in the field for want of Workmen; whereupon infused a great scarcity, so that Corn was sold for fourteen shillings a quarter, and Wood sold in London for thirteen shillings a thousand of Billets, and Coals ten pence a sack. Also this year, on the last of September, fell so great store of Rain, that Westminster-Hall was full of water, and Boats were rowed over Westminster-Bridge into Kings-Street.

Of her Personage and Conditions.

Of her Personage we can make no particular description; only we may say, she was none of the most amiable, but yet without Deformity. But of her Conditions we may say, she was not without Deformity, and yet was very amiable. If we account her Religion a Deformity; yet her constancy and devotion in it we must needs count a beauty. If it were a Deformity to promise the Suffolk-men, not to alter the Religion which King Edward had established; yet it was certainly a pious dissimulation, Cretizare cum Cretensibus; and Equivocation (will some say) was there a vertue, where she deceived them into truth, and did them good against their wills. And as for her Sister Elizabeth, if she did not love her, it was but a quality hereditary in her; for their Mothers did not love one another before: and indeed not without some cause in both; for as those upbraided each others Marriage, so these each others Birth. We shall not do her right, if we deny her to be of a merciful disposition, seeing oftentimes she pitied the person, where she shed the blood. She could have found in her heart to have spared the Lady Jane's life, if Ragion di stato had not been against it; and she did spare her Father the Duke of Suffolks life, till his second offence gave her just provocation. The goodness of her nature might be seen in the badness of her fortune, who took nothing so much to heart, as unkindness of friends; the revolt of Callice, and the absence of King Philip, being the two chief Causes that brought her to her end.

Of her Death and Burial.

THE Conceit of her being with child had kept Physicians from looking into the state of her body; so as her first Distemper at first neglected, brought her by degrees into a Dropsie, to which was added a burning Fever, brought upon her by a double grief, one for the long absence of King Philip, (who had now been away a year and a half) the other, and perhaps the greater, for the loss of Callice; as she forbore not to say to some about her, that if they looked into her Heart, being dead, they should find Callice there. She began to fall sick in September, and died at her Mannor of Saint James on the seventeenth of November, in the year 1558. when she had reigned five years, four months, and eleven dayes; lived three and forty years. Her Body was interred in a Chappel in the Minster of St. Peters Church at Westminster, without any Monument or other Remembrance.

Men of Note in her time.

OF Men of Valour in her time there were many, as may be seen in the Story of her Reign: but to name some for example, there was William Herbert Earl of Pembroke, the chief assistant of King Philip in the winning of St. Quintyns; there was William Lord Gray of Wilton, Captain of Guysnes, who though he yielded the Town, yet more out of tenderness to his Souldiers, than out of fear of his Enemies, which he never else would have yielded up: and to speak of one of a meaner rank, there was Sir Anthony Ager, who in defence of the Town of Callice lost his life, but not till he made the Enemy turn their backs and flee. Of Learned men also there were very many: as John Rogers, born in Lancashire, who translated the Bible into English with Notes; Richard Moryson Knight, born in Oxfordshire, who wrote divers

Cuthbert Tunstall Bishop of Durham, whose Ancestor was Barber to the Conqueror. divers Treatises, Robert Record, a Doctor of Physick, who wrote a Book of Arithmetick; Cuthbert Tunstall, of a Worshipfull Family in Lancashire, though base born, whose Ancestor came into England with the Conqueror as his Barber, and therefore hath three Combs his Arms, Bishop first of London, and after of Durham, who wrote divers learned Works; Richard Sampson Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, who wrote certain Treatises; Lucas Shepheard, born at Colchester in Essex, an English Poet; Jane Dudley, Daughter to Henry Gray Duke of Suffolk, wrote divers excellent Treatises; William Thomas a Welshman, who wrote the History of Italy, and other things; James Brooks and John Standish, both of them Writers in defence of the Pope's Doctrine; William Peryn a black Fryer, who wrote in defence of the Mass, and also divers Sermons; Henry Lord Stafford, Son to Edward Duke of Buckingham, who, amongst other things which he wrote, translated a Book out of Latin into English, entituled Utriusque Potestatis Differentia; which Book (as some think) was first compiled by Edward Fox Bishop of Hereford; John Hopkins who translated divers of Davids Psalms into English Metre, which are to be found amongst those appointed to be sung in the Church.

Mayors and Sheriffs of London in her Reign.

In her first year,
Sir Thomas White was Mayor.
Thomas Offley, William Hewet, Sheriffs.

In her second year,

QUEEN Mary dying on Thursday the seventeenth of November, in the Year 1558. her Sister, the Lady Elizabeth, of the Age of five and twenty years, the onely surviving Child of King Henry the VIII. by undoubted Right succeeded her in the Crown: which happening in a time of Parliament, Nicholas Heath Archbishop of York, and Lord Chancellour, sent to the Knights and Burgeses in the Lower House, to repair immediately to the Lords of the Upper House; to whom he signified, that Queen Mary was that morning dead, and therefore required their Assents to joyn with the Lords in proclaiming Queen Elizabeth: which accordingly was done by the sound of Trumpet, first at Westminster, and after in the City of London. The Queen was then at Hatfield, from whence on Wednesday the three and twentieth of November she removed to the Lord North's House in the Charter-House, where she stayed till Monday the eight and twentieth of November, and then rode in her Chariot through London to the Tower; where she continued till the fifth of December, and then removed to Somerset-House in the Strand; from whence she went to her Palace at Westminster, and from thence, on the twelfth of January, to the Tower, and on the fourteenth of January to Westminster to her Coronation: whither as she went, she said this Prayer.

O Lord, Almighty and everlasting God, I give thee most hearty thanks, that thou hast spared me to this joyfull day: and I acknowledge that thou hast dealt as wonderfully and as mercifully with me, as thou didst with thy faithfull Servant Daniel whom thou deliveredst out of the Den, from the cruelty of the raging Lions; even so was I overwhelmed, and onely by thee delivered. To thee therefore onely be thanks, honour and praise for ever.

And it is incredible, what Pageants and Shews were made in the City as she passed. On Sunday, the five and twentieth of January, she was Crowned in the Abbey-Church at Westminster, by Doctor Oglethorp Bishop of Carlisle, with all Solemnities and Ceremonies in such case accustomed. At this time, to honour her Coronation, she conferred more Honour, than in all her time after. William Parre, degraded by Queen Mary, she made Marques of Northampton; Edward Seymour, whose Father had been Attainted, she made Earl of Hartford; Thomas Howard, second Son to the Duke of Norfolk, she made Viscount Bindon; Sir Henry Carie, her Cousin-german, she made Baron of Hunsdon; and Sir Oliver Saint-John she made Baron of Blembo.

And now the Queen, though she were her self very wise, yet would not trust (and it was a great point of wisdom that she would not trust) to her own wisdom; and therefore she chose Counsellours to assist her. In which number she took Nicholas Heath Archbishop of York, William Pawlet Marques of Winchester, Lord High Treasurer, Henry Fitz-Allen Earl of Arundell, Francis Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, Edward Stanley Earl of Derby, William Herbert Earl of Pembroke, Edward Lord Clinton, Lord Admiral, and William Lord Howard of Effingham, Sir Thomas Cheiney, Sir William Peter, Sir Richard Sackville, and Nicholas Winton Dean of Canterbury; all which had been Counsellours to Queen Mary, and were of her Religion. But then to make a counterpoise of Counsellours of her own Religion, she joyned with them, William Parre Marques of Northampton, Francis Russell Earl of Bedford, Sir Thomas Parrey, Sir Edward Rogers, Sir Ambrose Cave, Sir Francis Knolles, and Sir William Cecil, late Secretary to King Edward the Sixth; and a little after Sir Nicholas Bacon, whom she made Keeper of the Great Seal. And having thus provided for her State at home, she seeks correspondence with Princes abroad. To the Emperour Ferdinand, she sent in Embassage Sir Thomas Chaloner; to the King of Spain in the Low-Countries, the Lord Cobham; to the Princes of Germany, Sir Henry Killigrew, Sir Armigill Waad to the Duke of Holstein, and another Ambassador to the King of Denmark. There were also Ambassadors sent to the Pope, to the State of Venice, and to the French King; with whom at this time there was a Treaty of Peace holden at Cambray, between the Kingdoms of France, England and Spain: where for England, were employed the Earl of Arundell, Thursby Bishop of Ely, and Doctor Wotton Dean of Canterbury; with whom William Lord Howard of Effingham was joined by a new Commission.

King Philip solicited Queen Elizabeth for Marriage.

Whom she puts off, by bringing in an alteration of Religion: which yet she doth by degrees.

The alteration of Religion by Parliament, by the difference only of six voices.

As soon as King Philip heard of the death of his Wife Queen Mary, partly out of considerations of State, and partly out of affection of love, he solicited Queen Elizabeth by his Ambassador, the Earl of Feria, to joyn in Marriage with himself; it being no more for two Sisters to have successively one Husband, than was done before, for two Brothers to have successively one Wife; and for this he promised to procure a Dispensation from the Pope. To which Motion the Queen, though she well knew, that to allow a Dispensation in this case to be sufficient, were to make her own Birth illegitimate; yet to so great a Prince, and who in her Sisters time had done her many favours, she would not return so blunt an Answer; but putting the Ambassador off for the present in modest terms, she conceived there would be no better way to take him off clean from further suit, than by bringing in an alteration of Religion: which yet she would not do all at once, and upon the sudden, (as knowing the great danger of sudden changes,) but by little and little, and by degrees. As at first she permitted only Epistles and Gospels, the Ten Commandments, the Lords Prayer, and the Creed, to be read to the people in the English Tongue; in all other matters they were to follow the Roman Rite and Custom, until order could be taken for establishment of Religion by Authority of Parliament; & a severe Proclamation was set forth, prohibiting all Points of Controversie to be meddled with. By which means, she both put the Protestants in hope, and put not the Papists out of hope. Yet privately she committed the correcting of the Book of Common Prayer, set forth in the English Tongue under King Edw. the Sixth, to the care and diligence of Dr. Parker, Bill, May, Cox, Grindhall, Whitehead and Pilkington, Divines of great Learning, with whom she joyned Sir Thomas Smith, a learned Knight: but the matter carried so closely, that it was not communicated to any, but to the Marquess of Northampton, the Earl of Bedford, and Sir William Cecil. The two and twentieth of March, the use of the Lords Supper in both kinds was by Parliament allowed. The four and twentieth of June, the Sacrifice of the Mass was abolished, and the Liturgy in the English Tongue established; though, as some say, but with the difference of six Voices. In July the Oath of Supremacy was propounded to the Bishops and others: And in August, Images were removed out of Churches, and broken or burnt. By these degrees Religion was changed; and yet the Change, to the wonder of the world, bred no disturbance; which if it had been done at once, and on the sudden, would hardly, at least not without dangerous opposition, have been admitted.

During this time, a Parliament had been summoned to begin at Westminster upon the fifteenth of January: and now the Queen for satisfaction of the People appointed a Conference to be held between the Prelates of the Realm, & Protestant Divines now newly returned, who had fled the Realm in the time of Queen Mary. For the Prelates were chosen John White, Bishop of Winchester; Ralph Bayne, Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield; Thomas Watson, Bishop of Lincoln; Doctor Cole, Dean of Pauls; Doctor Langdell, Archdeacon of Lewis; Doctor Harpsfield, Archdeacon of Canterbury; and Doctor Chadsey, Archdeacon of Middlesex. For the Protestant side were appointed Doctor Scory, Doctor Cox, Doctor Sands, Doctor Whitehead, Doctor Grindall, Master Horne, Master Guest, Master Elmer, and Master Jewel. The place was prepared in Westminster-Church; where, besides the Disputants, were present the Lords of the Queens Council, with other of the Nobility; as also many of the Lower House of Parliament. The Articles propounded against the Prelates and their Adherents, were these. First, That it is against the Word of God, and the Custom of the Ancient Church, to use a Tongue unknown to the People in Common Prayer, and in the Administration of the Sacrament. Secondly, That every Church hath Authority to appoint and change Ceremonies and Ecclesiastical Rites, so they be to edification. Thirdly, That it cannot be proved by the Word of God, that there is in the Mass a Sacrifice Propitiatory for the living and the dead. For the manner of their Conference, it was agreed it should be performed in Writing; and that the Bishops should deliver their Reasons in writing first. The last of March was the first day of their meeting; where, contrary to the Order, the Bishops brought nothing in Writing; but said, they would deliver their minds onely by Speech. This breaking of Order much displeased the Lords, yet they had it granted. Then rose up Doctor Cole, and made a large Declaration concerning the first Point. When he had ended, the Lords demanded if any of them had more to say: who answered, No. Then the Protestant Party exhibited a written Book, which was distinctly read by Master Horn. This done, some of the Bishops began to affirm, they had much more to say in the first Article. This again much displeased the Lords; yet this also was granted them, to do at their next meeting on Monday next; but when Monday came, so many other differences arose between them, that the Conference broke off, & nothing was determined. But in the Parliament there was better agreement; for there it was Enacted, That Queen Elizabeth was the lawful and undoubted Qu. of England, notwithstanding a Law made by her Father King Henry the Eighth, that excluded both her & her Sister Mary from the Crown, seeing, though the Law be not repealed, yet it is a principle in Law, That the Crown once gained-taketh away all defects. Also in this Parliament, First-fruits & Tithes were restored to the Crown; and the Title of Supreme Head of the Church of England was confirmed to the Queen, with so universal consent, that in the upper House none opposed these Laws, but onely the Earl of Shrewsbury, and Sir Anthony Brown, Viscount Mountague:

Montague : and in the Lower House only some few of Papal inclination murmured, saying, that the Parliament was packt; and that the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Arundel, & Sir William Cecil, for their own ends, had cunningly begged Voices, to make up their Party.

The Oath of Supremacy readily taken by all, but only some few, and who they were.

Supremacy thus confirmed to the Queen, the Oath was soon after tendred to the Bishops and others; of whom, as many as refused to take it, were presently deprived of their Livings. And that we may see how inclining the Kingdom at this time was to receive the Protestant Religion; it is said, that in the whole Realm (wherein are reckoned above nine thousand Spiritual Promotions) there were no more that refused to take the Oath, but only fourscore Parsons, fifty Prebendaries, 15 Masters of Colledges, twelve Archdeacons, twelve Deans, six Abbots, and fourteen Bishops, (indeed all that were at that time, except Anthony Bishop of Landaffe) as Nicholas Heath Archbishop of York, Edmund Bonner Bishop of London, Cuthbert Tunstal Bishop of Durham, Thomas Thursby Bishop of Ely, Gilbert Bourn Bishop of Bath and Wells, John Christopherson Bishop of Chichester, John White Bishop of Winchester, Thomas Watson Bishop of Lincoln, Ralph Bayne Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, Owen Ogletborp Bishop of Carlisle, James Turbervile Bishop of Exeter, and David Poole Bishop of Peterborough; and with these, Dr. Fecknam Abbot of Westminster. All which were at first committed to prison, but soon after delivered to the custody of private Friends, excepting those two sawcy Prelates, Lincoln and Winchester, who threatned to excommunicate the Queen. Three only, namely, Cuthbert Scot Bishop of Chester, Richard Pate Bishop of Worcester, and Thomas Goldwell Bishop of Saint Asaph, changed their Religion of their own accord; as also did certain Noble Personages, namely, Henry Lord Morley, Sir Francis Englefield, and Sir Robert Peckham, (who had been Privy-Councillors to Queen Mary) Sir Thomas Shelley, and Sir John Gage.

Papal Bishops removed, and Protestants placed in their rooms.

In the Sees of the Prelates removed were placed Protestant Bishops: as Matthew Parker was made Archbishop of Canterbury; (who was consecrated by the Imposition of the hands of three that formerly had been Bishops; namely, William Barlow of Bath and Wells, Job. Scory of Chichester, and Miles Coverdale of Exeter) and being consecrated himself, he afterward consecrated Edmund Grindball Bishop of London, Richard Cox Bishop of Ely, Edwin Sands Bishop of Worcester, Rowland Merick Bishop of Bangor, Thomas Young Bishop of Saint Davids, Nicholas Bullingham Bishop of Lincoln, John Jewell Bishop of Salisbury, Richard Davis Bishop of Saint Asaph, Edward Guest Bishop of Rochester, Gilbert Barkely Bishop of Bath and Wells, Thomas Benthiam Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, William Alley Bishop of Excester, John Parkhurst Bishop of Norwich, Robert Horn Bishop of Winchester, Richard Cheiney Bishop of Gloucester, Edmund Scambler Bishop of Peterborough, William Barlow Bishop of Chichester, John Scory Bishop of Hereford, Young Archbishop of York, James Pilkington Bishop of Durham, John Best Bishop of Carlisle, and William Downham Bishop of Chester.

Whilest these things were done in England, the Treaty of Peace at Cambray continued still; wherein King Philip stood for the restitution of Callice to the English, as firmly as if it had been his own Interest, and without it, would agree to no Peace with France. But when by Messages he understood that his suit for marriage with Queen Elizabeth was rejected, and that the Protestant Religion was established in the Kingdom, he then left Queen Elizabeth, seeing she would not be his, to her self: and though he became not presently a Foe, yet he became presently less than a Friend, and forbore to do any more good Offices in that business. Queen Elizabeth, thus left to her self, agreed with the French King, to conclude her own peace apart; and thereupon Delegates on both sides were appointed to meet at Cambray. For the Queen of England were Thursby Bishop of Ely, the Lord Williams, the Lord Howard of Effingham, Chamberlain to the Queen, and Doctor Wotton, Dean of Canterbury and York: For the King of France were Charles Cardinal of Lorraine, the first Peer of France, Annas Duke of Memorancy, James Allon Lord of Saint Andrews, John Morvilliers Bishop of Orleans, and Claude Aubespine Secretary to the Privy Council. The Commissioners meeting, the chief point in difference was the restitution of Callice; for which the English Commissioners, by the Queens appointment, offered to remit two millions of Crowns, that by just accompt were due from France to England: but the Queen was not more desirous to recover Callice, than the French King was to hold it. And thereupon at last it was concluded, that Callice should remain in possession of the French for the term of eight years; and those expired, it should be delivered to the English, upon forfeiture of five hundred thousand Crowns, for which Hostages were given. But all this notwithstanding, though the conditions were sealed and sworn to, & though Hostages were assigned to remain in England, till one or other were performed, yet all was frustrate, and came to nothing.

King Philip stood for restitution of Callice, till he understood of the alteration of Religion in England.

Where it was concluded, that Callice should be restored after eight years, but yet it came to nothing.

About this time, Henry King of France married his Daughter Isabel to Philip King of Spain, and his Sister Margaret to Emanuel Philibert Duke of Savoy: at the Solemnity of which Marriages he would needs be a Tilter himself, & thereupon commanded the Earl of Montgomery to run against him; who unfortunately breaking his lance upon the Kings Curials, a splinter thereof (his Beaver being somewhat open) struck him so deep in the Eye, that within few days he ended his life. After whose death, Francis his Son, at the age of sixteen years, succeeded him in the Crown, having by the Marriage of Queen Mary the Title of Scotland, and upon ground thereof laying claim to the Crown of England also, & giving the Arms of England, as properly belonging to him.

Henry King of France unfortunately slain running at Tilt.

And now begins the game of Faction to be plaid, wherein the whole Estate of Queen Elizabeth lies at stake; a Game that will hold playing the most part of her Reign, and if not plaid well will put her in jeopardy of losing all, seeing all about her was against her. Philip of Spain hath a quarrel to her, for being rejected in his suit; the King of France hath a quarrel to her in right of his Wife, which is now his right; the Queen of Scots hath a quarrel to her, for detaining her Inheritance;

heritance ; the Pope hath a quarrel to her, for excluding his Authority ; the King of Sweden hath a quarrel to her, for slighting his Son in the way of Marriage. And all these being against her, whom hath she on her side, but only her own Subjects, Papists yesterday, and to day Protestants? who being scarce settled in their Religion, how shall they be settled in their Loyalty? and not being Loyal, where can she find to cast Anchor for her safety? But it is a true saying, Nullum numen abest, si sit Prudentia; Wisdom is a supply for all defects. And indeed, the Queen being very wise in her self, and having a wise Council about her, she passed all these difficulties, though not without danger, yet with little or no hazard.

Knox in Scotland preaches against the Prince's Authority.

It happened (if at least it happened, and were not rather plotted of purpose) that a Reformation of Religion was pretended in Scotland; but was indeed an incroachment upon the Prince's Authority: for at the preaching of John Knox, and other headstrong Ministers, not only Images and Altars were cast down and burnt, the Monasteries of Saint Andrews, of Stone, of Strive-ling, and of Lynlithgow were overthrown; but it was further put into the heads of the Nobility, that it pertained to them, of their own Authority to take away Idolatry, and by force reduce the Prince to the prescript of Laws. Whereupon there was presently a bandying of the Lords of Scotland against the Queen Dowager, Regent of the Country; and in this case each of them sought for aid. The Queen Dowager had aid out of France, the Lords of Scotland sent for aid to the Queen of England. But this was matter for consultation. It seemed a bad Example, for a Prince to give aid to the rebellious Subjects of another Prince. On the other side, it seemed no less then impiety, not to give aid to the Protestants of the same Religion. But most of all, it seemed plain madness, to suffer adversaries to be so near Neighbours, and let the French nestle in Scotland, who pretend Title to England. Upon such considerations, it was resolved to send them aid. And thereupon an Army of six thousand Foot, and twelve hundred Horse, was sent under the Command of the Duke of Norfolk, the Lord Gray of Wilton his Lieutenant General, Sir James Crofts, Assistant to him, the Lord Scroop, Lord Marshal, Sir George Howard, General of the men at Arms, Sir Henry Piercy, General of the Light Horse, Thomas Huggens, Provost Marshal, Thomas Gower, Master of the Ordnance, Master William Pelham, Captain of the Pioneers, and Master Edward Randol, Serjeant-Major, and divers others. These coming into Scotland, joy- ned with the Scottish Lords, and set down before Leith; where passed many small Skirmishes, many Batteries, and sometimes Assaults: to whom, after some time, a new supply came of above two thousand Foot; whereof were Captains, Sir Andrew Corbet, Sir Rowland Stanley, Sir Thomas Hesketh, Sir Arthur Manwaring, Sir Lawrence Smith, and others. Yet with this new supply there was little more done then before; many light Skirmishes, many Batteries, and sometimes Assaults; so long, till at last the young French King, finding these broyls of Scotland to be too furious for him to appease, he sent to the Queen of England, desiring that Commissioners might be sent to reconcile these differences. Whereupon were dispatched into Scotland, Sir William Cecil, her principal Secretary, with Doctor Wotton Dean of Canterbury; who concluded a Peace between England and France, upon these Conditions: That neither the King of France, nor the Queen of Scotland, should thenceforth use the Arms or Titles of England or Ireland; and that both the English and the French should depart out of Scotland; and a general Pardon should be enacted by Parliament, for all such as had been actors in those stirs. This Peace was scarce concluded, when Francis the young King of France died, leaving the Crown to his younger Brother Charles, who was guided altogether by the Queen-Mother, and molested with the Civil Diffensions between the Princes of Guise and Conde: for whose reconciliation, the Queen sent Sir Henry Sidney, Lord President of Wales; and shortly after an Army, under the leading of the Lord Ambrose Dudley, Earl of Warwick; who arriving at Newhaven, was received into the Town; which having kept eleven months, he was then constrained, by reason of a Pestilence, to surrender again upon Composition, and so returned.

Francis King of France dieth, and leaveth Mary Qu. of Scots a Widow.

Newhaven taken by the English, but soon surrendered.

About this time, when the Parliament was upon dissolving, it was agreed upon by the House of Commons, to move the Queen to marry, that she might have Issue to succeed her. To which purpose Thomas Gargrave, Speaker of the House, with some few other chosen men, had access to the Queen, who humbly made the motion to her, as a thing which the Kingdom infinitely desired; seeing they could never hope to have a better Prince than out of her Loyns. Whereunto the Queen answered in effect thus; That she was already married, namely, to the Kingdom of England; and behold (saith she) the Pledge of the Covenant with my Husband: and therewith she held out her finger, and shewed the Ring, wherewith, at the time of her Coronation, she gave her self in Wedlock to the Kingdom. And if (saith she) I keep my self to this Husband, and take no other, yet I doubt not but God will send you as good Kings, as if they were born of me; forasmuch as we see by daily experience, that the Issue of the best Princes do often degenerate. And for my self, it shall be sufficient that a Marble-Stone declare, that a Queen having reigned such a time, lived and died a Virgin. Indeed, before this time, many Matches had been offered her. First, King Philip: and when he was out of hope of matching with her himself, he then dealt with the Emperour Ferdinand his Uncle, to commend his younger Son Charles, Duke of Austria, to her for a Husband. And when this succeeded not, then John Duke of Finland, second Son to Gustavus King of Sweden, was sent by his Father, to solicit for his eldest Brother Ericus; who was honourably received, but the Match rejected. Then Adolphus Duke of Holst, Uncle to Frederick King of Denmark, came into England, upon a great hope of speeding; but the Queen bestowed upon him the Honour of the Garter, and a yearly Pension, but not her self. Then James Earl of Arran was commended to her by the Protestants of Scotland, but neither the man nor the motion was accepted. Of meaner Fortunes, there were some at home home that pleased themselves with hopes of her Marriage. First, Sir William Pickering, a Gentleman of a good House, and a good Estate: but what most commended him was his studiousness of Letters, and sweet demeanor. Then Henry Earl of Arundel, exceeding rich, but now in his declining age. Then Robert Dudley, youngest Son of the Duke of Northumberland, of an excellent feature of face, and now in the flower of his age. But these might please themselves with their own conceit, but were not considerable in her apprehension: they might receive from her good Testimonies of her Princely favour, but never pledges of her Nuptial love.

Great offers made by the Pope to the Queen, if she would become a Papist.

About this time the Earl of Feria, (who had married the Daughter of Sir William Dormer) being denied leave of the Queen for some of his Wives friends to live out of England; grew so incensed, that he made means to Pius the fourth, then Pope, to have her excommunicate as an Heretick and Usurper. But the Pope inclining rather to save than to destroy, and knowing that gentle courses prevail more with generous minds, than roughness and violence, in most loving manner wrote unto her, exhorting her to return to the Unity of the Catholick Church; and, as it is said, made her great offers, if she would hearken to his counsel: particularly, that he would recal the Sentence pronounced against her Mothers Marriage, confirm the Book of Common Prayer in English, and permit to her people the use of the Sacrament in both kinds. But Queen Elizabeth, neither terrified with the Earl of Feria's practices, nor allured with the Popes great offers, according to her Motto, Semper eadem, persisted constant in her resolution, to maintain that Religion which in her Conscience she was perswaded to be most agreeable to the word of God, and most consonant to the Primitive Church.

But she persisted constant in her Religion.

Joh. Oneal, Earl of Tyrone, began to rebel.

Whilest these grounds of troubles are sowing in England, France and Scotland, it is not likely that Ireland will lie fallow; though indeed it be a Country that will bring forth troubles of it self, without sowing: but howsoever, to make the more plentiful Harvest of troubles at this time, John Oneal (whose Father K. Henry the eighth made Earl of Tyrone) to prevent the punishment of a private Outrage upon a Brother, broke into open Rebellion against the Prince: and though his attempts were maturely made frustrate by timely opposition; yet this was he that in the beginning of the Queens Reign sowed the seeds of that trouble in Ireland, which afterward took so deep root, that till the ending of her Reign it could never thoroughly be rooted out; though this man a year or two after came into England, and casting himself at the Queens feet, acknowledged his fault, and obtained pardon.

Qu. Eliz. requires the Treaty of Edenburgh, to be confirmed by the Queen Dowager. And her Answer.

The Treaty of Edenburgh should by promise have been confirmed by Francis the French King while he lived; but he not having done it, Queen Elizabeth requires his Dowager, the Queen of Scots to confirm it: but she, solicited often to it by Throgmorton the Queens Leiger in France, made always answer, she could not do it without the Counsel of her Nobility in Scotland. Whereupon Queen Elizabeth suspecting that this Answer was but to hold her in amazement, while some mischief was practising against her, sent Sir

Thomas Randol into Scotland, to perswade the Lords there to enter into a League of mutual Amity with her and other Protestant Princes; and further, by no means to permit their Queen, now a Widow, to marry again to any Foreign Prince; for which she alledged many great Reasons. In the mean while the Queen of Scots, purposing to return into Scotland, sent before-hand Dr. Oysotte a French Lord, to entreat Queen Elizabeth, that with her leave she her self might pass by Sea into Scotland, & Dr. Oysotte might pass by Land. But Queen Elizabeth openly denied both the one and the other, unless she would confirm the Treaty at Edenburgh; saying, It was no reason she should do the Queen of Scots courtesie, if the Queen of Scots would not do her right.

The Queen of Scots, much troubled with this Answer, expostulates the matter with her Leiger Throgmorton, & much complains of the unthankfulness: but in the mean time providing shipping, she loosed from Callice, and under covert of a mist, notwithstanding that Ships were laid to intercept her, she arrived safe in Scotland; where she intreated her Subjects in so loving a manner, that she gave great contentment to the whole Kingdom, as well to the Protestant Party, as the other: and then sent Letters to Queen Elizabeth, proffering all observance & readiness to enter League with her, so she might by Authority of Parliament be declared her Successor; which was but her right. To this Queen Elizabeth answered, That though she would no way derogate from her Right; yet she should be loth to endanger her own security, and as it were to cover her own eyes with a Grave-cloth while she was alive; then fell again to her old Admonition, requiring her to confirm the Treaty of Edenburgh. And now, to shew the respect she bore her, when her Uncles the Dukes D' Aumale, D' Albeuse, and other Lords of France that had brought her home, returned through England, she gave them most bountifull and loving entertainment.

The Qu. of Scots passeth safely into Scotland, though laid wait for to be intercepted. She offered all observance to Queen Elizabeth; so she might be declared her Successor. Qu. Eliz. Answer.

These two Queens indeed were both of great spirits, and both very wise; but there grew such jealousies of State between them, (the Queen of Scots doubting lest Queen Elizabeth meant to frustrate her Succession, Qu. Eliz. doubting lest the Qu. of Scots meant to prevent her Succession) that it kept them more asunder in love than they were near in blood, and was cause of many unkind passages between them: in all which, though the Q. of Scots were a very near match to the Q. of Engl. in the abilities of her mind, yet in the favours of Fortune she was much her inferior.

But now for all the courtesie which Queen Elizabeth shewed to the Queen of Scots Uncles, at their returning through England, yet new practices were again set on foot against her at Rome; the Duke of Guise especially laboring to have her be Excommunicated. But Pope Pius, still averse from such roughness, meant now to try the Queen another way; and thereupon sent the Abbot Martinengi; and when he might not be admitted to enter England, then caused the Bishop of Viterbo, his Nuntio in France, to deal earnestly with the Queens Leiger Throgmorton, that she (as other Princes had done) would send her Orators to the Council of Trent, which he before had called. But the Queen, nothing tendering this point, made peremptory answer, That a Popish pish Assembly she did not acknowledge to be a General Council; nor did she think the Pope to have any more right or power to call it, than any other Bishop. This answer not only exasperated the Pope, but also alienated the King of Spain's mind from her, that he was never after so kind a friend to her as he had been; and none of her Embassadors ever after had any great liking to be employed to him. And now at this time, as the Abbot Martinengi was the last Nuntio that ever was sent from the Pope into England, so Sir Edward Carne, now dying at Rome, was the last Leiger that was ever sent to the Pope from the Kings of England.

And now Queen Elizabeth knowing well that she had drawn many ill-willers against her State, she endeavored to strengthen it by all the means she could devise. She caused many great Ordinance of Brasse and Iron to be cast; She repaired Fortifications in the Borders of Scotland; She encreased the number of Ships, so as England never had such a Navy before; She provided great store of Armour and Weapons out of Germany; She caused Musters to be held, and Youth to be trained in exercises of Artillery; &, to please the people, (whose love is the greatest strength of all) She gave leave to have Corn & Grain transported, and called in all base Coins and brasse Money.

It was now the fifth year of Qu. Elizabeth's Reign, when divers great persons were called in question. Margaret Countess of Lenox, Niece to King Henry the Eighth, by his eldest Sister, and her Husband the Earl of Lenox, for having had secret conference by Letters with the Queen of Scots, were delivered prisoners to Sir Richard Sackville, Master of the Rolls, and with him kept a while in custody. Also Arthur Poole and his Brother, whose great Grandfather was George Duke of Clarence, Brother to King Edward the fourth, Anthony Fortescue, who had married their Sister, and others, were arraigned for conspiring to withdraw themselves to the Duke of Guise in France, and from thence to return with an Army into Wales, to declare the Queen of Scots Queen of England, and Arthur Poole Duke of Clarence. Which particulars they confessed at the Bar, and were thereupon condemned to die; but had their lives spared, in regard they were of the Blood-Royal. Also the Lady Katharine Gray, Daughter to Henry Duke of Suffolk, by the eldest Daughter of Charles Brandon, having formerly been married to the Earl of Pembroke's eldest Son, and from him soon after lawfully divorced, was some years after found to be with child by Edward Seymour Earl of Hartford: who being at that time in France, was presently sent for; and being examined before the Archbishop of Canterbury, and affirming they were lawfully married, but not being able within a limited time to produce witnesses of their marriage, they were both committed to the Tower, where she was brought to bed; and after, by the connivance or corruption of their Keepers, being suffered sometimes to come together, she was with child by him again. Which made the Queen more angry than before; so that Sir Edw. Warner Lieutenant of the Tower was put out of his place, and the Earl was fined in the Star-Chamber five thousand pounds, and kept in Prison nine years after. Though in pleading of his Case, one John Hales argued, they were lawful Man and Wife, by vertue of their own bare consent, without any Ecclesiastical Ceremony. The Lady a few years after, falling through grief into a mortal sickness, humbly desired the Queens Pardon, for having married without her knowledg, and commending her children to her clemency, died in the Tower.

At this time (the King being under age) dissensions amongst the Peers grew hot in France, of which there were two Factions, both pretending the cause of Religion. Of the one, the Duke of Guise, a Papist, was Head; of the other, the Prince of Conde, a Protestant. But while Delirant Reges, plebuntur Achivi; while these Princes are at variance, the people suffer for it; and chiefly (as being under the weaker protection) the Protestant party. Whereupon Queen Elizabeth, (having well learned the Lesson, Tum tuas res agitur, paries cum proximus ardet, and fearing lest the flame of their dissention might kindle a fire within her own Kingdom) sent over Sir Henry Sidney, Lord President of Wales, into France, to endeavour by all possible means their reconciliation: which when he could not effect, (and perhaps it was never meant he should effect it, but only to see what Invitations would be made to the Qu. for her assistance) she thereupon at the moan of the afflicted Protestants, sent over an Army of six thousand Soldiers under the Conduct of the Earl of Warwick, in assistance of the Prince of Conde and other Protestant Lords, who delivered to him the Town of Newhaven, to hold in the King of France his name, until such time as Callice was restored. But the Prince of Conde marching to joyn with the English Forces, was by the Duke of Guise intercepted and taken prisoner; which had been a great disappointment to the English, but that the Duke of Colen joyned with him, besieged Caen in Normandy, and took it, together with Bayeux, Falaise, and Saint Lo. The French Hostages that were pledges for the payment of five hundred thousand Crowns, if Callice were not restored, were remaining still in England; who perceiving there was like to be War with France, prepared secretly to get away; but being ready to take shipping, were discovered, and brought back again.

In the mean while the Prince of Conde, drawn on with a hope to marry the Queen of Scots, and to have the chief Government in France during the Kings Minority, concluded a Peace with the King and with the Guises; so as now all French, as well Protestants as Papists, required to have Newhaven delivered up. But the Earl of Warwick, perceiving the sickness of the French Protestants, first to make suit to draw him into France, and now upon so slight occasion to require him to be gone, he shutteth all French, both Protestants and Papists, out of the Town, and lays hold of their Ships: the French on the other side make ready to set upon the Town, saying, they fought not now for Religion, but for their Country; wherefore it was meet that both Protestants and Papists should joyn their Forces, seeing they had already concluded a Peace betwixt themselves. And hereupon the Duke of Memorancy sent a Trumpeter to the Earl of Warwick, commanding him to yield the Town: who making answer by Sir Hugh Pawlet, that he would never yield it without the Queens leave; he thereupon besieged the Town, and with a great violence of Battery, sought to get it by force.

Which

Which Queen Elizabeth hearing of, she sent a Commission to the Earl of Warwick to yield it up, if upon honourable Conditions; which soon after was accordingly done, after the English had held it eleven months: & then the Earl, without any dishonour for yielding up a Town, which the Pestilence made him no less unwilling than unable to hold, returned into England. But that which was more doleful than the loss of Newhaven, he brought the Pestilence with him into England. The recovery of this Town not only made the French to triumph, but hereupon the Chancellour of France pronounced openly, that by this War the English had lost all their Right to Callice, and were not to require it any more, seeing it was one of the Conditions, that neither of the Nations should make war upon the other: which was the Point stood upon by the King of France and his mother, when Queen Elizabeth sent Sir Thomas Smith to demand Callice to be restored.

At this time there were such cross designs amongst the Princes of Christendom, that a very good Politician could hardly understand their aims. The Duke of Guise being slain in the Civil war, the Queen of Scots Dowry was not paid her in France, and the Scots were put off from being the Kings Guard. This exceedingly displeased the Queen of Scots. But then to please her again, and for fear lest hereupon she should apply her self to the friendship of the English, her Uncle the Cardinal of Lorraine solicited her afresh, to marry Charles Duke of Austria; offering her for her Dowry the County of Tyrol.

The Queen of Scots, to make use of her Uncles fear, and perhaps to bring Queen Elizabeth into an opinion of depending upon her, acquaints her with this motion, and therein requires her advice. Queen Elizabeth, not willing she should marry with any forein Prince, perswades her to take a Husband out of England, & particularly commended to her the Lord Robert Dudley, (whose Wife a little before had with a fall broke her neck;) promising withal, that if she would marry him, she should then by Authority of Parliament be declared her Successor, in case she died without Issue. But when her Uncles and the Queen mother were informed of this motion, they so much disdained the Marriage with Dudley, that so she would refuse that Match, and persevere in the Friendship of the French, they offered to pay her the Dowry-money that was behind, and to restore the Scots to all their former liberties in France. And as for the King of Spain, he had indeed a Leiger Embassador here in England, but rather by way of Complement, and to watch advantages, than for any sincere love; which he began to withdraw from the English, as suspecting them to intend a Trade to the West-Indies.

At the marriage of the Prince of Navarre was the great Massacre of the Protestants in France. And now the French Protestants may see what they brought upon themselves, by leaving the English at Newhaven, and by trusting to their Country-men the French Papists; for their peace was but a snare, and the Marriage of Henry of Burbon, Prince of Navarre, with Margaret of Valois, the French Kings Sister, was but a bait to entrap them. For upon the confidence of this Marriage, being drawn together into Paris, they were the readier for the slaughter: and a few days after the Marriage, which were all spent in Feasts and Masks, to make them the more secure, upon a Watch-word given, the bloody Faction fell upon the Protestants, and neither spared age, nor sex, nor condition, but without mercy, and sense of humanity, slaughtered as many as they could meet with, to the number of many thousands.

It was now the sixth year of Queen Elizabeths Reign, a year fatal for the death of many great Personages. First died William Lord Gray of Wilton, Governour of Barnwick; a man famous for his great Services in War: then William Lord Paget, a man of as great Services in Peace, who by his great deservings had wrought his advancement to sundry Dignities and honourable places: and though zealous in the Roman Religion, yet held by Queen Elizabeth in great estimation to his dying day: then Henry Mannors Earl of Rutland, descended by his Mother from King Edward the fourth: and lastly, Frances the Dutcheß of Suffolk, Daughter to Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, and Mother to Queen Jane.

And now Queen Elizabeth, finding how fickle the French Protestants had carried themselves towards her, intended to make a Peace; and to that end sent Sir Thomas Smith into France, joyning Throgmorton in Commission with him. And in conclusion, a Peace was agreed on; whereof, amongst other Articles, this was one, That the Hostages in England should be freed, upon the payment of Six hundred thousand Crowns. And this Peace was ratified by the Oath both of the Queen of England, and the King of France.

About this time the English Merchants were hardly used both in Spain and in the Netherlands, upon pretence of Civil differences, but indeed out of hatred to the Protestant Religion: whereupon the English removed the Seat of their Trading to Embsden in Friesland. But Gusman, the Spanish Leiger newly come into England, finding the great damages that the Netherlands sustained by these differences, endeavoured by all means to compose them: and thereupon Viscount Mountague, Nicholas Wotton, and Walter Haddon Master of the Requests, were sent to Bruges in Flanders; who after many interruptions brought the matter at last to some indifferent agreement.

It was now the seventh year of Queen Elizabeth, when making a Progress, she went to see Cambridge; where after she had viewed the Colledges, and been entertained with Comedies and Scholastical Disputations, she made her self a Latine Oration, to the great Encouragement of the Scholars, and then returned. Presently after her return, she made the Lord Robert Dudley, Master of her Horse, first, Baron of Denbigh, (giving him Denbigh and all the Lands belonging to it) and then, Earl of Leicester, to him and the Heirs-males of his body lawfully begotten: which Honor was conferred upon him with the greatest State and Solemnity that ever was known. And now Leicester, to endear himself to the Queen of Scots, accused Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper, for being privy to the Libel of Hales, who affirmed the right of the Crown to belong to the Family of Suffolk, in case the Qu. should die without Issue: & thereupon was Bacon cast into Prison; soon; till afterward, upon his purgation, and the mediation of Sir William Cecill, he was set at liberty, and restored to his place.

And now for a while we must cast our eyes upon Scotland, for that was now the Stage where all great businesses of State were acted. Matthew Stuart Earl of Lenox, who had married Margaret Douglas King Henry the Eighth's Niece by his eldest Sister, had been kept as an Exile in England now twenty years. Him the Queen of Scots invites to come into Scotland, under pretence of restoring to him his ancient Patrimony; but indeed to confer with him about a Marriage with his Son the Lord Darley; for he being reputed Heir to the Crown of England, next after her self, she thought, by matching with his Son, to strengthen her own Title, and to prevent the hope of any other. Queen Elizabeth, upon suit made by his Wife, gave the Earl leave to go; but soon after, suspecting what the Queen of Scots intent was in sending for him, she, to hinder the proceeding, sent Sir Tho. Randoll to her, to let her know, that if she proceeded in this Match, she would exceedingly wrong her self; for that it was a Match so much disliked by all the English, that she was fain to prorogue the Parliament, lest upon dislike thereof, there should something be enacted against her Right of Succession: But if she would marry the Earl of Leicester, she should then by Parliament be declared her next Heir. Hereupon, in the month of November, the Earl of Bedford and Sir Thomas Randoll for Queen Elizabeth, the Earl of Murray and Liddington for the Queen of Scots, at Barwick entered into a Treaty concerning the Marriage with the Earl of Leicester. The English Commissioners urged the great benefits that by this Match would accrew both to the Queen of Scots her self, and to the whole Kingdom of Scotland: The Scottish, on the other side, urged the great disparagement it would be to the Qu. of Scots, if, refusing the offers made her of divers great Princes, she should match her self with so mean a Person as the Earl of Leicester. This matter held long debate, partly for that the English Commissioners were so appointed by Q. Elizabeth; and partly for that the Scottish Commissioners had a good mind to hinder her from marrying at all: and perhaps not the least, for that the Earl of Leicester, being verily perswaded he should at last obtain Queen Elizabeth her self, by secret Letters warned the Earl of Bedford not to urge the Marriage with the Queen of Scots too far; and was thought for this cause to favour Darley under-hand. The matter being in this manner protracted for two whole years together; the Queen of Scots, impatient of longer delay, and being resolved in her mind what she would do, used means, that the Lord Darley got leave of Queen Elizabeth to go into Scotland for three months only, under colour to be put in possession of his Fathers Lands. (Though it be strange, the Queen upon any terms would let him go, if she really intended to hinder the marriage: but such was the destiny, if there were not a plot in it.) And so in February he came to Edenburgh: who being a young man, of not above nineteen years of age, of a comely countenance, and most Princely presence, the Queen of Scots, as soon as she saw him, fell in love with him; yet modestly dissembling it for the present, she thought to get a Dispensation from Rome, because of their nearness in Consanguinity. And now, her inclination being grown so apparent, that there was no concealing it, she sent Liddington to Qu. Eliz. desiring her consent. But she through the suggestions of the Earl of Murray, being induced to believe that the Qu. of Scots intention was, by this Marriage to get the Crown of England, and to bring in Popery, entered into consultation with her Privy Council, what was fit to be done to hinder the Marriage: who all concluded, that these were the best ways: First, to have a Company of Souldiers levied for terror sake about the Borders towards Scotland; then to commit to Prison the Countess of Lenox, the Lord Darley's Mother; and to recal from Scotland the Earl of Lenox, and his Son Darley, upon pain of the loss of all their goods in England; then that the Scots, who were known to be averse from the Marriage, should be relieved and assisted; and lastly, that Katharine Gray, with the Earl of Hartford, should be received into some grace, about whom only (it was thought) the Queen of Scots was most solicitous, as being her Rival to the English Crown. Hereupon Sir Nicholas Throgmorton was sent to the Queen of Scots, to counsel her in the Queens name not to proceed in this Marriage; and to shew her the many inconveniences that would accrew unto her by it. But she returned answer, that the matter was too far passed to be recalled; & that Queen Elizabeth had no cause to be displeased with it, seeing herein she followed her advice, not to match with a stranger, but with an English-man born.

Queen Elizabeth, being informed of her Answer, calleth home the Earl of Lenox and the Lord Darley his Son, commanding them upon their Allegiance to return. The Father modestly by Letters excuseth himself: the Son humbly intreateth her not to be a hindrance to his preferment; which he vows to employ in her Majesties Service, to the uttermost of his power.

And now, to make him the fitter match for her, the Queen of Scots honoured him first with Knighthood; then with the Dignities of the Lord Armanack, Earl of Rosse, and Duke of Rothsay; which Dukedom by Birth pertaineth to the eldest Sons of the Kings of Scotland. After this, when he had not been above five months in Scotland, she married him; and, with the consent of most of the Peers, declared him King. At this the Earl of Murray, and others whom he drew to his party, extremely fretted, and fell to moving of turbulent questions, Whether it were lawful to admit a Papist King; Whether the Queen of Scots might chuse a Husband at her own pleasure; and Whether the Peers of the Kingdom might not out of their own Authority impose one upon her. But however, they raised Arms, and had disturbed the Nuptials, but that the Queen levied an Army to encounter them: with which she pursued them so closely, that they were fain to fly into England for protection. Where Queen Elizabeth made no scruple to receive them, seeing the Queen of Scots had received Yardley, Standon and Walsh, that were fled out of England; but the Earl of Murray especially, who had alwayes been found addicted to the the English. Queen Elizabeth perhaps was not much troubled at the Marriage; partly, as knowing the mild disposition of the Lord Darley, and how little access of strength it brought to the Queen of Scots; but most of all, as plainly seeing there would troubles arise in Scotland upon it, and the troubles of Scotland would be the quietness of England, which as a good Mother of her Country, was the mark she aimed at: yet she made a shew of being offended with it; but rather to conceal her aim, then that she was offended with it indeed.

Qu. Eliz. is moved again to marry Charles the Emperors Brother.

At this time the Emperor Maximilian sent to Queen Elizabeth his Ambassador, Adam Smiricote, renewing the former suit for his Brother Charles of Austria; for which Marriage the Earl of Suffex was very earnest; the Earl of Leicester as much against it: so as it grew to a quarrel between them, and the Court was divided into factions about it: but the Queen, who never liked the dissention of her Peers (though it be a Rule with some, Divide and Reign) made them friends, at least in countenance.

We may now leave Scotland a while, and see the Honour done at this time to Queen Elizabeth, not much inferior to the Honour done to Solomon by the Queen of Sheba; for now Cecill, the Sister of Erick King of Sweden, and Wife of Christopher Marquess of Baden, being great with Child, came from the farthest part of the North (a long Journey) thorow Germany, of purpose to see her, for the great fame she had heard of her Wisdom: At her being here, she was delivered of a Child, to whom, in requital of her kindness, Queen Elizabeth was God-mother, and named him Edwardus Fortunatus; giving to her and her Husband, besides Royal Entertainment, a yearly Pension. At this time also, for the great Fame of her Wisdom, Donald mac Carti More, a great Potentate of Ireland, came and delivered up into her hands all his most ample Territories; and then receiving them again from her, to hold them to him and his Heirs-males lawfully begotten; and for want of such Issue, to remain to the Crown of England. The Queen in requital invested him with the honour of Earl of Glenkare, and Baron of Valence; and besides many Presents given him, paid the charges of his Journey.

The Governors of Ireland what Titles they had.

A President of Munster when first ordained.

It was now the eighth Year of Elizabeths Reign, when Sir Nicholas Arnold, a Knight of Gloucester-shire, governing Ireland under the Title of a Justice, was called home, and Sir Henry Sidney placed in his room. And here by the way it is to be noted, That the Governours of Ireland, after it came under the English, were at first called Justices of Ireland; afterwards, Lieutenants, and their Vice-gerents were called Deputies. Afterwards at the Princes pleasure, sometimes Deputies, sometimes Justices, and sometimes Lieutenants; which last Title, though it be of greatest honour, yet in power is in a manner but the same. Sir Henry Sidney at his coming into Ireland, found the Province of Munster in much disorder, by reason of strife between Gyrالد Earl of Desmond, and Thomas Earl of Ormond: whereupon the Queen sending for the Earl of Desmond into England, ordained a new Government in that Province, appointed a President to administer Justice, together with an Assistant on the Bench; two Lawyers and a Notary: and the first President she made in this place, was Sir William Sent-leger.

And now Queen Elizabeth in a Progress went to Oxford; where she took pleasure in viewing the Collidges, in hearing Orations, in seeing of Comedies, till the Comedy of Palemon and Arcett turned into a Tragedy; for by the fall of a wall, through the multitude of people that pressed in to see it, three men were slain. At her coming away, she made an Oration in Latine to the Scholars, a sufficient recompence for all the Orations they had made to her. And this year was a call of seven new Serjeants at Law, who kept their Feast at Grayes-Inn in Holbourn.

Qu. Eliz. makes a Progress to Oxford.

A call of seven Serjeants at Law.

In a Parliament at this time, the Queen is moved again to marry.

Upon the Queens return from Oxford, the Parliament began, where they presently fell upon the matter of succession, and moving the Queen to marry; in which points some went so far, that they spared not to accuse the Queen, as one careless of Posterity; to defame Cecill with Libels and reproaches, as if he were her Counsellour in this matter; but above all, to curse Doctor Huic, her Physitian, who was thought to dissuade her from Marriage, by reason of I know not what womanish insufficiency. At least in the Upper-House it was agreed, That Sir Nich. Bacon Lord Keeper, their Orator, should in all their names beseech the Queen to marry; and withal, to declare a Successour in the Crown, if she should happen to die without Issue; for which he gave many Reasons, declaring what mischiefs were likely to befall the Kingdom, if she should die before a Successour were designed. But in the Lower-House there were some, amongst whom were Bell and Mounson, (two Lawyers of great account) Dutton, Sir Paul Wentworth, and others, who grew to far higher terms, disparaging the Queens Authority, & saying, That Princes were bound to design a Successour; and that in not doing it, the Queen should shew her self no better than a parricide of her Country. The Queen was contented to bear with words spoken in Parliament, which spoken out of Parliament, she would never have endured; but not willing to expostulate the matter with the whole number, She commanded that 30 of the Higher House, and as many of the Lower, should appear before her, to whom She delivered her mind to this effect; That she knew what danger hangeth over a Princes Head, when a Successour is once declared; She knew that even Children themselves, out of a hasty desire of bearing Rule, had taken up Arms against their own Fathers, and how could better Conditions be expected from Kindred? She had by reading observed, That Successors in a Collateral Line have seldom been declared; and that Lewis of Orleance, and Francis of Angoulesme, were never declared Successors, and yet obtained the Crown without any noise.

And to declare a Successor.

The Queen answer to their motions.

Lastly, She said, Though I have been content to let you debate the matter of Succession, yet I advise you to beware, that you be not injurious to your Princes patience. With these and the like Reasons, she gave so great satisfaction, that they never after troubled her with making any such motion: and though she consented not in plain terms to declare a Successor, yet soon after

She gave some intimation of it; for one Thorn-ton, a Reader of the Civil Law in London, who in his Lectures called the Queen of Scots Right in question, was clapped up in Prison for his labour.

1567. In the begining of her ninth year, Charles the 9th King of France, sent his Ambassadour Ramboulet into England to the Queen, with the Robes and Ornaments of the Order of Saint Michael, to bestow upon which two of her Nobility she pleased; and she making choice of the Duke of Norfolk, and the Earl of Leicester, they were by Ramboulet invested with them; an Honour that had never been conferred upon any English, but only King Henry the 8th, King Edward the 6th, and Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, though afterward prostituted almost to any, without difference.

The Qu. of Scots is delivered of a Son. And now to return to the affairs of Scotland: The nineteenth of June last past, the Queen of Scots, in a happy hour, was at Edenburgh Castle delivered of a Son, that was afterward James the sixth of Scotland; and the first Monarch of Great Britain; whereof She presently sent word to Queen Elizabeth, by James Melvyne; who thereupon sent Sir Henry Killigrew to congratulate her safe deliverance, and her young Son, with all demonstration of love and amity. But now the love of the Queen of Scots to her Husband the L. Darley, was not so hot at first, but it was now grown to be as cold; and she had not heaped honours on him so fast before, but now as fast she taketh them off: for where before in publick Acts, she had used to place her Husbands name first, now she caused it to be placed last, and in the coyning of Mony began to leave it quite out.

David Rizie an Italian, grows a great Favourite to the Qu. of Scots. This unkindness between them, was fomented by one David Rizie an Italian, whom the Queen had taken into her Service, first, as a Musician, and then taking a liking to him, made him her Secretary for the French Tongue; by means whereof, he had oftentimes secret conference with her, when the King her Husband might not be admitted. This indignity the King himself being given to his pleasures of Hunting and Hawking, resented not so much, as some Lords that were his friends; who told him plainly, that it stood not with his Honour to suffer this fellow to live. By whose instigation, the King drawn to plot his death; one day taking with him the Earl of Renven, and others, he rushed into the Queens Chamber at her Supper time, where finding David Rizie at a Cupboard, tasting some meat that had been taken from the Table, he seized upon him, dragged him forth into an outer Chamber, and there murdered him, the Queen at that time being great with Child, and like by that affright to have miscarried: But the Fact being done, the King came in to her again, assuring her there was no hurt at all intended to her Person. The man that had animated the King to do this Fact, was especially the Earl of Murray, of whom it is necessary to say something, because his part will be the greatest of all the Scottish Actions of this time. He was the base Son of King James the Fifth, and so the base Brother of the Queen; made at first Prior of Saint Andrews: But not liking that Religious Title, he affected rather some Temporal Honour; which when the Queen, being then in France, denied him, then in an angry mood he returned into Scotland, where by the advice of Knox, whom he held for a great Patriarch, he brought the matter so to pass, that in an Assembly of the States, the Religion was altered, and the French were banished out of Scotland; Yet afterward, as soon as the Queen was a Widow, he posted into France, and so insinuated with her, that she created him Earl of Murray, and promoted him to an Honourable Marriage. Being thus exalted, he returned into Scotland; where, for the growth of his ambitious designs, he sowed seeds of Sedition, affirming often, what a misery it was to be under the Command of a Woman; and that Royalty was not to be tied to any Stock or Kindred, but to Vertue only, whether the Parties were legitimate or no: By this course, making way to the Kingdom for himself. To this end, he used all the means he could to keep the Queen from marrying again; which when he could not effect, he then sought ways how to make discord between her and her Husband; for which cause he had caused the King to murder Rizie. Of the foulness of which Fact, when the King after a while grew sensible, he meant to be revenged of Murray, who had counselled him to do it: Which Murray understanding, prevented it with causing the like to be done to him, as will presently be seen. For the Queen having been delivered of a Son, and the day appointed for the Christning being come; where the Godfathers were Charles King of France, and Philibert Duke of Savoy; Queen Elizabeth being requested to be God-mother, sent thither the Earl of Bedford as her Deputy, and a Font of Massie Gold for a present, in value 1043 l. but gave him express Command, That he should not honour Darley with the Title of King. But before a month or two, after the Christning, were passed, the King in a stormy and tempestuous night was strangled in his Bed, and then cast forth into the Garden, and the house immediately blown up with Gun-powder.

The rumour of this Murder being spread abroad, the common Fame laid it upon Murray and Morton, and their Confederates; Murray and Morton upon the Queen: But we must not here give ear to that which Buchanan writes, who to curry favour with the Earl of Murray, lays most impudent scandals upon the Queen; whereof, before his death, he repented himself extremely. The King thus murdered, and the Queen left alone to her self, she is counselled to marry with some that might be able to assist her against all her opposites: James Hepburn Earl of Bothwell being then greatly in her favour, and of great eminency for his valour; and though he were the man that had acted the murder, yet is he by Murray and his Confederates commended to the Queen: To which motion, as being destitute of friends, and not knowing whom to trust, she at last consents; but upon these Conditions, That above all things, respect might be had to her young Son; and that Bothwell might be legally quitted, both from the bond of his former marriage, and also of the Kings murder. Hereupon a course is plotted, by which Bothwell is called to the Bar; and Morton being his Advocate, by the Sentence of the Judges he is clearly acquitted. Upon this he is created Duke of Orkeney, and by consent of many of the Nobility, he is married to the Queen; which bred a suspicion in many,

The King intends to be revenged on him.

But the Earl prevents him, and the King is strangled in his Bed. The death of the King is by common fame laid upon Murray & Morton, by them upon the Queen.

many, that the Queen was conscious of the murder; which was the thing that by marriage they intended: And the suspicion once raised, they seek by all means to increase, that they may have the better colour against her; & so, the very same man who had absolved Bothwell, and consented to the marriage, now takes Arms against her, as a Delinquent in both; force him to fly, and then seize upon the Qu. whom, clad in a very homely Garment, they thrust into prison in Locheleven, under the Custody of Murray's Mother, who had been the Harlot of King James the Fifth; but boasting her self to have been his lawful Wife, & her Son his lawful Issue. Queen Elizabeth having at length notice hereof, sent Sir Nicholas Throgmorton into Scotland to expostulate with the Confederates, touching this insolent usage of the Queen; and to consult by what means she might be restored to her liberty. But Throgmorton coming into Scotland, found the Confederates in more insolent terms than had been reported; being divided in Opinion, what to do with the Queen, some would have her banished perpetually into England or France; some would have her questioned before the Judges, committed to perpetual custody, & her Son proclaimed King: Others, more inhumane, who would have her at once deprived of Princely Authority, of life and all; and this Knox and some other Ministers thundred out of the Pulpits. Throgmorton on the other side, alledged many passages out of the holy Scriptures, touching Obedience to the higher Powers; maintaining, That the Queen was subject to no Tribunal, but that in Heaven; That no Judge upon Earth might call her in question; That there was no Office, nor Jurisdiction in Scotland, which was not derived from her Authority, and revokeable at her pleasure. They again opposed the peculiar Right of the Kingdom of Scotland; and that in extraordinary cases, they were to proceed besides order: taking up Buchanan's Arguments, who in those days, by instigation of Murray, wrote that damned Dialogue, De jure Regni apud Scotos, wherein, against the verity of the Scottish History, he endeavours to prove, That the people have power both to create, & to depose their King. After all their debating, all that Throgmorton could get of them, was a Writing without any subscription, wherein they protested, They had shut up the Queen for no other intent, but to keep her apart from Bothwell, whom she loved so desperately, that to enjoy him, she regarded not all their ruines; willing himself to rest satisfied with this Answer, till such time as the rest of the Peers met together. And notwithstanding all he could say, they shut up the Queen daily in more strait custody, though with tears she besought them to deal more mildly with her, & to let her but once have a sight of her Son: which would not be granted her. At last, when fair persuasions would not serve to make her freely give over the Kingdom, they threatened to question her openly for incontinent living, for the Kings Murder, and for Tyranny, so as through fear of death, they compelled her, unheard, to set her hand to three Instruments: In the first whereof, she gave over her Kingdom to her young Son, at that time scarce thirteen Months old. In the second, she constituted Murray Voice-Roy during the minority of her Son. In the third, in case he refused the Charge, these Governours were nominated; James Duke of Chastean Herald, Giles Spike Earl of Argyle, Matthew Earl of Lenox, John Earl of Atholl, James Earl of Morton, Alexander Earl of Glencarn, and John Earl of Marr. And presently she signified to Queen Elizabeth by Throgmorton, That she had made these Grants by compulsion through the Counsel of Throgmorton, telling her, That a Grant extorted from one in Prison (which is a just fear) is actually void, and of no effect.

Five days after the Queen had made this Resignation, James the sixth, the Queens Son, was Anointed and Crown'd King, John Knox preaching at the same time; but a Protestation was then put in by the Hamiltons, That all this ought to be no prejudice to the Duke of Chastean Herald, in his right of Succession against the Family of Lenox; but Queen Elizabeth had forbidden Throgmorton to be at the Action, that she might not seem by the presence of her Embassadour, to approve their proceeding in displacing of the Queen.

Fifteen days after this transaction, Murray himself returned out of France into Scotland, and within three days went to the Queen with some other of the Confederates, who charged her with many Crimes, and wished her if she tendered her Life and Honour, to observe these Prescriptions: Not to disturb the Peace of the Kingdom, nor desire to be at Liberty; Nor to stir up the Queen of England, or the King of France to molest Scotland with any War; nor to think any more of Bothwells love, or meditate Revenge upon Bothwells Adversaries.

Murray being now proclaimed Regent of Scotland, he bindeth himself under his Hand and Seal to do nothing which shall concern War or Peace, the Kings Person or his Marriage, or the Liberty of the Queen, without the consent of the Confederates; and then gives Throgmorton warning by Lydington, not to make any further intercession for the Queens Liberty, for that he & the rest had rather run any hazard than to suffer it. Soon after he puts to death John Hepburn, Daglas, and others that were Bothwells Servants, for having a hand in the Murder of the King: But they (which he little expected) when they were at the Gallows, ready to die, protested before God and his holy Angels, that Bothwell had told them, that Morton and Murray were the first Authors of the Murder. The freed the Queen from all suspicion, like as Bothwell himself being Prisoner in Denmark, both living and dying, often protested with deep asseverations, That the Queen was innocent. And fourteen years after, Morton going to Execution, confessed that Bothwell dealt with him to consent to the murder of the King; which when he refused utterly, unless the Queen under her hand-writing would allow of it; Bothwell made answer, That could not be, but the fact must be done without her knowledge.

A little before this time, upon one and the same day died two of the Privy-Council, Sir John Mason Treasurer of the Queens Chamber, a Grave and Learned man, but a great Usurper and Encroacher upon Ecclesiastical Livings; and Sir Richard Sackville Vice-Treasurer of the

The Marriage of Qu. Elizabeth with the Emperors Brother is again treated of; but after seven years breaks utterly off.

It was now the year 1567, and the tenth year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when the Earl of Stolberg came into England from the Emperor Maximilian, to treat of the Marriage of the Queen with the Arch-Duke Charles, upon which very occasion the Queen a little before had sent the Earl of Sussex to the Emperour, with the Order of the Garter. But in the treaty of Marriage there fell out so many difficulties about Religion, Maintenance of the Duke, about the Royal Title, and concerning Succession, that after it had been treated of seven whole years together, it came at last to nothing, and the Duke not long after married Mary Daughter to Albert the Fifth Duke of Bavaria; yet both he and the Emperour continued ever after a good correspondence with the Queen.

About this time there came from John Basil Emperour of Russia and Muscovia, Stephen Twerdico, and Theodore Pogorella, with a Present of rich Furs of Otter, Miniver, and the like, tending all service and obsequiousness to the Queen and the English. The Merchants by vertue of a Grant from Queen Mary, had combined themselves into a Society, which they called the Muscovia Company; and having large Privileges granted them from the Emperour, went thither with a Navy yearly, making a very gainful voyage: but then it proved most gainful, when for the Queens sake they obtained at the Emperour's hands in the year 1569. That none but the English of that Company should Traffick in the North-parts of Russia. With these Russian Embassadors there returned into England, Anthony Jenkinson, who in his Travels had made curious Observations of Russia, set forth a Geographical Description of it, and was the first of the English that failed through the Caspian Sea. And this year the eighth of June, Sir Thomas Sackville was created Baron of Buckhurst, at Whitehall.

Sir Thomas Sackville is created Baron of Buckhurst. The Queen of Scots after eleven months Imprisonment escapes and raiseth an Army, but is defeated by Murray.

We have seen before the first Act of the Queen of Scots Tragedy: Now comes in the second, having been eleven Months kept a Prisoner, at last, by the help of George Dowglas, to whose Brother she was committed, she made escape from Loch-leyn to Hamilton's Castle; where upon the testimonies of Robert Melvyn, and others, in a meeting of a great part of the Nobility, there was drawn a Sentence declaratory, That the Grant extorted from the Queen in Prison, (which is Justus metus) was actually void from the beginning. Upon which Declaration, great multitudes flocked to her, so as within a day or two she had gotten an Army of at least six thousand; but when they joyned Battel with Murray, being but raw and unexpert Souldiers, they were soon defeated. In this case the Queen sought to save her self by flight, journeying in one day threescore miles, and coming at night to the House of Maxwell Lord Heris, from thence she sent John Beton to Queen Elizabeth, with a Diamond Ring, which she had formerly received from her, as a Pledge of mutual amity; intimating, that she would come into England, and implore her aid, if her Subjects offered to prosecute her any further. Queen Elizabeth returned answer, that she should expect from her in abundant manner, all loving and friendly Offices.

But before the Messenger was returned, she, contrary to the advice of her friends, entred into a small Bark, and with the Lords, Heris & Flemming, and a few others, landed at Wickinton in Cumberland, near the mouth of the River of Derwent, the 17th day of May; and the same day wrote Letters to the Queen in French with her own hand, the effect whereof was, That having made an escape from the hands of her insolent & rebellious Subjects, she was now come into England, upon certain hope of her approved clemency, and therefore humbly desiring, she might forthwith be conducted to her Presence. Queen Elizabeth sending Letters by Sir Francis Knolles, comforted her, and promised her aid & defence, according to the equity of her cause; but denied her access, for that she was held guilty of many Crimes, giving command to have her brought to Carlisle, as a place of better safety. The Queen of Scots receiving this answer, and finding access to the Queen denied her, making request again by Letter, that she might have leave both to unfold the Injuries she had received, and to answer the Crimes objected, in her own presence; humbly intreating her, that either she might be admitted to have conference and assistance, or else have free leave to depart out of England, to gain supply elsewhere, and not to be held a Prisoner in the Castle at Carlisle; for as much as she came voluntarily into England, relying upon her love so often professed. Upon these Letters, Qu. Eliz. exceedingly commiserated her case, and could have found in her heart to admit her to her presence, but that her Counsellors conceived it to be matter for consultation, what to do in this case. To detain her in Engl. had many mischiefs attending on it; to send her into France, as many; to send her back into Scotland many more; so as in conclusion, the most were of opinion to have her detained, as one taken by right of War, and not to be dismissed, till she had made satisfaction for assuming the Title of England, & for the death of Darley her husband, who was born one of the Queens Subjects. In this diversity of opinions Qu. Eliz. out of her own judgment, sent word by Middlemore, to the Regent of Scotland, that he should come himself in person, or else depute some fit persons to answer the Complaints of the Queen of Scots against him and his Confederates, and render sufficient reasons wherefore they had deprived her, otherwise she would forthwith dismiss her, & with all the forces she could, settle her in her Kingdom. To this Summons, Murray obeys and comes to York, the place appointed for this Treaty, accompanied with seven more of his intimate friends, who stood Delegates for the Infant King, namely, James Earl of Morton, Adam Bishop of Orkeneys, Robert of Dunferm, Patrick Lord of Lyndsey, James Mack-gilly, and Henry Badinary; and with these Lyndington the Secretary, and George Buchanan. And the very same day came thither Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Ratcliff Earl of Essex, and Sir Ralph Saeler a Privy Counsellour, appointed Com-

Reasons for detaining the Queen of Scots.

Qu. Eliz. appoints Commissioners to hear the cause of the Qu. of Scots.

Commissioners for Queen Elizabeth. For the Queen of Scots, (who took it hainously that Queen Elizabeth would not hear the cause, her self, but refer her to Subjects, being an absolute Prince, and not tied to their proceedings) there appeared John Lesley Bishop of Ross, William Lord Levenston, Robert Lord Boyde, Comen of Kilwinnin, John Gourdon, and James Cockburn. Being met, Lydington turning himself to the Scots in a wondrous liberty of Speech gave them this advice, Maturely to consider, what prejudice they should draw upon themselves, by accusing the Queen of Scots, and calling her Reputation in question publickly before the English, professed enemies of the Scottish Nation. Likewise, what account they shall be able to give hereof to the King, when he shall grow to riper years, and shall see what an injury this was to the Kingdom, his Mother, and his own Person. Wherefore (said he) it seemeth requisite to forbear this business altogether, unless the Queen of England will enter into a mutual league of Offence and Defence, against all those, which under this pretence, shall go about to molest us. Upon this Speech of his, the Delegates of the Queen of Scots made Protestation, That although it pleased the Queen of Scots to have the cause between her and her disloyal Subjects, debated before the English, yet she being a free Prince, and obnoxious to no earthly Prince whatsoever, did not thereby yield her self subject to the Jurisdiction and command of any person. On the contrary, the English protested, That they did in no wise admit that Protestation, in prejudice to the right which the Kings of England have anciently challenged as superiour Lords of the Kingdom of Scotland. The day after, the Queen of Scots Delegates set forth at large the injurious dealing of Morton, Murray, Marre, Glencarn, Humes, and others against the Queen; and how they had compelled her, for fear of death, to resign her Crown; which therefore (they said) was of no force. Murray and his Confederates make answer, That they had done nothing, but by consent of the Peers in Parliament, and that in prosecuting of Bothwell, the Author of the Kings murder, whom the Queen protected; and as for her resignation, that it was voluntarily and freely done. All this the Queen of Scots Delegates answered and confuted, affirming in particular, That where there are one hundred Earls, Bishops and Barons, (more or less) that had voyces in the Parliament of Scotland, there were not in that tumultuous assembly they speak of, above four Earls, one Bishop, an Abbot or two, and six Barons; wherefore their earnest Request was, that the Queen of England would be sensible of these indignities offered her; and take some course for a speedy redress.

The Queen of Scots requires to have the French & Spanish Ambassadors to be added to the Commissioners.

After this, some new Commissioners from Queen Elizabeth were added to the former, to some of whom the Queen of Scots took exception; unless the French and Spanish Embassadors might be taken in, and her self admitted into the presence of the Queen and them, publickly to defend her own innocency; and that Murray might be detained and cited, whom she affirmed, she was able to prove to have been the chief Plotter of the murder of her Husband Darley. This was held to be a just demand by the Duke of Norfolk, the Earls of Arundell, Suffex, Leicester, and the Lord Clinton. But Queen Elizabeth waxing somewhat angry, openly said, that the Queen of Scots should never want an Advocate as long as Norfolk lived: It was seen here, which is said, that the heart of the King is inscrutable; for how Queen Elizabeth stood affected in this case of the Queen of Scots, no man could well discern; she detested the insolency of her Subjects in deposing her, and yet gave no assistance to restore her.

After long agitation of this business, and nothing concluded, Murray a little before his return into Scotland, slyly propounded the marriage of the Queen of Scots to the Duke of Norfolk; which he with a modest answer rejected as a thing full of danger. But withal, Murray the more to alienate Queen Elizabeths mind from the Queen of Scots, gave out, that she had passed away to the Duke of Andyn her Right to the Crown of England, and that the transaction was confirmed at Rome; he shewed Letters also which the Queen of Scots had written to some Friends whom she trusted; wherein she accused the Queen for not dealing with her according to promise, and boasting of succours she expected from some others. This last clause something troubled Queen Elizabeth, neither could she conjecture from whence any such succour should come; seeing both France with the Civil Wars, and the King of Spain in the Low-Countries had enough to do at home. But at last it brake out, that one Robert Ridolph a Florentine, under the habit of a Merchant in London, was suborned by Pope Pius the Fifth, to make a secret commotion of the Papists in Engl. against the Queen, which he performed indeed with a deal of secrecy, and much cunning; whereupon the Queen of Scots was removed from Bolton (a Castle of the Lord Scroops) where all the neighbouring people were Papists, to Tutbury more toward the heart of the Country, under the Custody of George Earl of Shrewsbury.

About this time the Guises in France, and the Duke D'Alva in the Low-Countries began to endeavor the utter extirpation of the Protestant Religion. In France, the Ministers of the Gospel are commanded within a limited time to depart the Kingdom; when Queen Elizabeth forgetting the fickleness of the Protestants at Newhaven, once again takes upon her their protection, supplies them with two hundred thousand Crowns in money, besides Munition in abundance, and with all humanity receives the French that fled into England; therather, for that they made solemn protestation, they took not up Arms against their Prince, but only stood upon their own defence. In the Low-Countries likewise, the Duke D'Alva breathing nothing but slaughter and blood, made the Dutch come flocking into England, as into a Sanctuary, where with all courtesie they were received.

And here it will be fit to shew how the War in the Low-Countries began first, which was thus: At which time the King of Spain brought in the Spanish Inquisition, a small number of the meaner sort of people, in tumultuous manner, cast the Images out of Churches, and brake them in pieces: and although that tumult was soon quieted, yet the King of Spain taking advantage at the rashrashness of a few, to charge the whole nation with Rebellion, sent amongst them Ferdinando Alvarez, Duke D'Alva, a bloody and fierce man, who (contrary to the Ordinances and Customs of the Country) took away all authority from the ordinary Courts of Justice; erected new Consistories; condemned and put to death the Peers, without tryal by their lawful Judges; placed Garrisons of Spaniards throughout all their Cities and Villages, and by force exacted the 20th part of the Fruits of the Earth, and the tenth of the moveables upon every Alienation. At that time a mighty mass of money borrowed from the Genoways, and other Italian Merchants was sent out of Spain into the Low-Countries, there to be imployed to interest, which being brought by Shipping, was pursued by the French; and forced to fly for succour into the Havens of England, whom the Qu. commanded to be succour'd; as conceiving the money to be the King of Spains, as it was given out: But at the same time, Cardinal Odette coming out of France into England, and giving notice to the Queen, that the money was not the King of Spains, but belonged to certain Merchants of Genova, from whence the Duke D'Alva had taken it against their will, with a purpose to imploy it to the ruine of the Protestants; and information also being given her by one that had a property in the money that it was so; she determined to put in security, & to borrow the money of the Merchants her self, which is an usual thing with Princes, when Goods are taken in their Ports; and the King of Spain himself had lately done the like. The Duke D'Alva being informed of this dealing of the Queens, by Gerard de Spese, the King of Spains Embassador in England, seizeth presently upon all the Goods of the English in the Low-Countries, and kept the men prisoners; The Queen did the like with the Dutch Merchants in England; Letters of Mart were granted on both sides, and this grew to such a quarrel between the Nations, that being nourished with other differences afterward, it brought forth in Eighty Eight that Spanish Invasion, which is, and will be memorable in all future Ages.

Sir William Cecil accused by the Duke of Norfolk & others, is protected by the Queen.

Upon occasion of this money detained, certain Peers of England, amongst whom were the Duke of Norfolk, the Marquess of Winchester, the Earls of Arundell, Northumberland, Pembroke, Leicester, and others, accused Sir William Cecil, for sending away money into France, making this their colour, but done indeed out of envying his great favour with the Queen, and suspecting him to incline to the House of Suffolk in the matter of succession. Hereupon they consult secretly how to get him imprison'd; and Throgmorton (who envied him as much as they) suggesting that if he were once clapp'd up, they might soon find out a way to crush him; But the Queen (by what means it is uncertain) coming to have notice hereof, gave a check to their purpose, and protected Cecil against their combined practices.

The Earl Murray being returned into Scotland, makes the Lords believe that he desires a meeting at Edinburgh, to consult about restoring the Queen to her Liberty, but as Hamilton Duke of Chasteau Herald (appointed Vicegerent of the Kingdom by the Queen) and the Lord Heris were coming thither, he circumvented them, and before any of the rest came, cast them into Prison; and forthwith in an open War oppresseth all her Favoures. It may be thought, the Earl Murray could have been content the Queen should have been set at liberty; but that he knew, her liberty could not be without his servitude; and Queen Elizabeth perhaps would willingly have had her restored to her Kingdom, but that she doubted, such restoring would indanger her own security: And thus, while they regarded their own ends in the first place, and hers but in the second, she had the fortune to be pitied, but not the happiness to be relieved; and all she could do her self, was but to tie the knot of her bonds the faster; if she could have fate still, they would perhaps have loosened of themselves; but now, the more she stirred, the more she was intangled.

And now the Destiny of the Duke of Norfolk began to work: It was in every ones mouth, that the Duke should marry the Queen of Scots; and it is true, there had been motions made; but the matter not so forward, as the Voice of the People, which commonly presageth what will follow. It had been motion'd to the Duke at Tork, by the Bishop of Rosse; and afterward (in pretence at least) by Murray himself at Hampton-Court; but the Duke, before he would resolve in the matter, deliberated with the Earl of Arundell, Northumberland, Westmerland, Suffex, Pembroke, Southampton, and Leicester himself, who all judged it fit, he should acquaint the Queen with it first, and then leave the matter to her liking. Within a few days, Sir Nicholas Throgmorton meeting the Duke in the Palace at Westminster, advised him, to move the Earl of Leicester himself to embrace the Match, seeing he had formerly sued for it: but if he refused it, then at least to take him along with him, for that himself alone would hardly be able to procure the Queens consent. A day or two after, the Earl of Leicester propounded the matter to the Duke, and then communicateth it to the Earls of Arundell and Pembroke, who thereupon, together with Throgmorton, wrote Letters to the Queen of Scots, commending the Duke of Norfolk to her for a Husband; the Duke himself likewise writeth to her, tending his singular love and respect unto her. Upon this, Articles are drawn, written with Leicesters own hand, & sent to the Queen of Scots; to which if she consented, they then promised to procure, that Queen Elizabeth should give her assent, and that forthwith she should be re-invested in her Kingdom, and the Succession of England should be confirmed upon her. We may easily believe, the Queen of Scots was not hardly drawn to give consent to her own desire; but in the mean time, the Duke had imparted to the Lord Lumley the whole proceeding, and had much ado to get the Earl of Leicesters consent that he might advise of it with some other of his Friends; yet a little after, he opened the matter to Cecil also.

The Duke of Norfolk first proceeding about the Marriage with the Queen of Scots.

Articles between them are drawn by Leicester.

The rumour of this Marriage was soon come to the Queens Ears; which the Duke understanding, he dealt earnestly with the Earl of Leicester, to have the matter propounded to the Queen out of hand. Leicester makes delays, and pretends causes to put it off; which Cecil seeing, he adviseth the Duke to go and acquaint the

the Queen with it himself. This Counsel Leicester opposed, promising to open it to the Queen as she went in Progress. At length, at Farnham, the Duke standing by as the Queen sat at Table, she gave him a tart Admonition, That he were best take heed upon what Pillow he rested his Head. After this, at Titchfield, Leicester fell sick, or at least counterfeited; to whom the Queen coming, and bidding him be of good cheer, he with sighs and tears craved pardon for his fault, and unfolded to her the whole story from the very beginning. Whereupon, the Queen called the Duke into the Gallery, reproving him sharply, for going about the Marriage, without acquainting her; and commanding him, upon his Allegiance, to desist. The Duke made her a free and hearty promise of obedience, and spared not to say (as if he little regarded the Queen of Scots) that his Revenues in England were not much less than hers in Scotland; and that when he was at his House in Norwich, he thought himself in a sort not inferior to some Kings; but notwithstanding, finding the Queens anger by her countenance, and perceiving Leicester to be in a manner quite alienated, and most of the Nobility also, as scarcely saluting him when they met him; he grew extremely dejected, and prepared presently to leave the Court, meaning to stay at Norwich, till by his friends intercession, and his own submissive Letters, the Queens heart might be mollified towards him: Mean while, the Court was suspiciously fearful, lest he should raise Rebellion, and (they say) it was concluded, that if he did so, the Queen of Scots should presently be made away. And now the Duke, who held secret commerce by Letters with the Bishop of Rosse, Throgmorton and Leicester (for they were sent to and fro in bottles) being examined touching the marriage of the Queen of Scots, and certain secret conferences with the Bishop of Rosse, confessed most of the Objections, and was thereupon committed to the Tower, under the custody of Sir Henry Nevill; within two days after the Bishop of Rosse likewise is examined, and together with the Florentine Robert Ridolph is delivered to the custody of Sir Francis Walsingham; the Earl of Pembroke is confined to his house, and examined privately; but his confession was not committed to writing: It being his Request, because he could not write himself. At this time, the rumour of Insurrection in the North begun in Autumn before, grew very strong, by reason of some frequent meetings of the Earls of Northumberland, Westmerland, and others, who thereupon being upon their Allegiance, sent for to repair presently to the Queen, make delays (for they stayed waiting for supplies, both from the Scots, and from the Duke D'Alva) when the Earl of Northumberland doubting what to do, was frightened of purpose by his servants, telling him, that men in Arms were near at hand to apprehend him; Who thereupon in a tempestuous night, riseth out of his Bed, and in great fear gets into his Park at Topcliffe, and the night following to Branspeth, to the Earl of Westmerlands House, where a great many were met that were acquainted with the Enterprize: Here they brake forth in an open Rebellion, being pressed forward by one Nicholas Morton a Romish Priest, sent by the Pope to pronounce Queen Elizabeth an Heretick; and therefore to have utterly lost all Right of Sovereignty: By and by they send forth a Writing, wherein they declare that they had taken Arms for no other end, but that the Religion of their fore-Fathers might be restored, wicked Counsellors removed from the Queen, the Duke of Norfolk and others of the loyal Nobility relieved, who were now in disgrace; but towards the Queen, professing themselves most dutiful Subjects; withal they send Letters to the Papists all the Kingdom over, requiring them to come to their assistance; but they were so far from joyning with them, that many sent both the Letters and the Bearers of them to the Queen, and afforded their aids and purses against them, no less then the best Protestants; even the Duke of Norfolk himself was not backward in it.

These Rebels go first to Durham, where they tear in pieces all the Bibles and Books of Common Prayer they could find in Churches of the English Tongue: when they had been twelve days in Rebellion, they numbred their Army, and could not reckon above six hundred Horse, and four thousand Foot: whereupon being certainly informed, that the Earl of Suffex with seven thousand, and the Earl of Warwick with twelve, were setting out against them, they betook themselves to Rabie, the chief House of the Earl of Westmerland; going from thence, they besieged Bernards Castle, which for lack of Provision, was yielded to them. At which time being proclaimed Traytors, and hearing a-fresh of the great Forces that were coming against them, the two Earls with a small Company get presently into Scotland, hard by where the Earl of Northumberland hid himself at Harclow in a poor Cottage, amongst the Grayhams (famous Robbers) who afterwards betrayed him to the Earl of Murray: Westmerland made a shift to get into the Low-Countries, where he had a slender Pension from the King of Spain, & there lived even to old age. Of the rest, for terror and examples sake, there were hanged at Durham threescore and six of the chief; amongst whom, Plomtree a noted Priest. At York were executed, Simon Digby, John Fulthorp, Thomas Bishop, Robert Penyman; and at London a few months after, Christopher and Thomas; and some other in other places. After this, the Heads of the Rebels being convicted of High-Treason, were proscribed; namely Charles Earl of Westmerland, Thomas Earl of Northumberland, Anne Countess of Northumberland, Edward Dacres of Morton, John Nevill of Leversege, John Swinborn, Thomas Markensfield, Egremond Ratcliff, Brother to the Earl of Suffex, Christopher Nevill, Richard Norton, Christopher Marmaduke, Robert and Michael Tempest, George Stafford, and forty others of good account. Out of the ashes of this Rebellion, a new fire was kindled at Naworth in Cum-berland by Leonard Dacres, second Son to the Lord Dacres of Gyllisland; He was a Party with the Earls in their Rebellion; but they breaking forth sooner than he expected, & he at that time being at the Court, and there admitted to kiss the Queens hand, tendred his service to go against them; and to that purpose, was sent home; but in his Journey (branding himself with a double disloyalty) he consulted with the Rebels, and encouraged encouraged them to go on; & by vertue of Letters of Credence from the Queen, he surprised the Castle of Greystock, and other Houses of the Dacres, and gathered together an Army of three thousand men: But being encountred by the Baron of Hunsdon, after a great fight, wherein, though he were crook-backt, he behaved himself valiantly, he was put to flight, and fled into Scotland, from whence soon after he passed over to the Low-Countries, and in great misery and poverty died at Louvayn.

But though the Queen were thus intangled with Rebellions at home, yet she was not careless of the afflicted Protestants in France: for she stirred up the Protestant Princes to defend the common Cause; supplied them with money, taking in pawn the Queen of Navarr's Jewels; and gave leave to Hen. Champernon to lead into France a Troop of a hundred Horse, Gentlemen all, and Voluntaries; amongst whom were Philip Butshed, Francis Barkley, and Walter Raleigh, a very young man, who now began to look into the World. But as the Queen of England assisted the French, so in revenge thereof, the King of France meant to assist the Scots, but that he was taken away by death.

There was at that time a Rebellion in Ireland also, raised by Edmund and Peter, Brothers to Boteler Earl of Ormond, but after many outrages by them committed, the Earl of Ormond first by perswasions, obtained of them to submit themselves; and when notwithstanding they were committed to prison, he then obtained of the Queen they should not be called to the Bar, being exceedingly grieved that any of his Blood should be attainted of Rebellion. The rest of the Rebels were pursued by Sir Humphrey Gilbert, and soon dispersed.

And now the Earl of Murray, Regent of Scotland, when he had brought all things to his hearts desire, and thought himself secure, at Lithquo, riding along the Streets, was shot into the belly with a Bullet, beneath the Navil, and there fell down dead. The Actor was a Hamilton, who did it upon a private revenge, for that Murray had forced him to part with a piece of Land which he had by his Wife; who thereupon falling Lunatick, he in a great rage committed this slaughter.

After Murray's death, the Country being without a Regent, was cause of many disorders. Thomas Carre and Walter Scot, two principal men amongst the Scottish Borders, and devoted to the Queen of Scots, made Inrodes into England, wasting all places with Fire and Sword, till by Forces sent out of England, under the Command of the Earl of Suffex, and the Lord Hunsdon, they were defeated: In whose pursuit, three hundred Villages were fired, and above fifty Holds were overturned. For which service the Earl made many Knights, as Sir William Drury, Sir Thomas Mannors, Sir George Carie, Sir Robert Constable, and others, and then returned. And now to prevent further disorders, the Lords of Scotland being ready to assemble about the election of a new Regent, they asked Counsel of Queen Elizabeth in the matter; but she making answer she would not meddle in it, because she would not be thought to work any thing prejudicial to the Queen of Scots, whose case was not yet tried, they created Matthew Earl of Lenox Regent; which Queen Elizabeth did the better like, as conceiving he could not choose out of natural affection, but have a special care of the young King, being his Grand-child.

But while Qu. Elizabeth favoured the Kings Party in Scotland, the Earl of Huntley, the Duke of Castle-Herald, and the Earl of Argyle, (the Queen of Scots Lieutenants) imploy the Lord Seton to the Duke D' Alva, requiring him for many great Reasons, to vindicate the Queen of Scots liberty, alledging how acceptable a Work it would be to all Christian Princes, and to the whole Catholick Church: Whereunto the Duke made Answer, They should find him ready to the uttermost of his power to satisfie their request. At which time also the French King dealt earnestly with Queen Elizabeth to the same purpose; and the Spanish Embassadour in his Masters name urged it no less extreamly: but Queen Elizabeth assaulted with all these Importunities, made answer, That as she would omit nothing that might serve for the Reconciling of the Queen of Scots and her Subjects, so she must have leave to provide for her own and her Subjects safety; a thing which Nature, Reason, and her own Honour required at her hands. And now when these Princes prevailed not with Queen Elizabeth to set the Queen of Scots at liberty, out comes Pope Pius Quintus with his Bull Declaratory, which he caused to be fastned in the night-time upon the Gate of the Bishop of London's Palace, wherein all her Subjects are absolved from their Oath of Allegiance, or any other duty; and all that obey her, accursed with Anathema. He that fastned up the Bull was one John Felton, who never fled for the matter, but as affecting Martyrdom, suffered himself to be apprehended, confessed and justified the Fact, and thereupon arraigned, was condemned and hanged near the place where he had fastned the Writing.

The same day that Felton was arraigned, the Duke of Norfolk seeming now extream penitent for his fault, and utterly to abhor the Marriage, was delivered out of the Tower, and suffered to go to his own House, but yet to be in the custody of Sir Henry Nevill still. Indeed Cecil being a good Friend to the Duke, had told the Queen, That the law of 25 of Edward the Third could not take hold upon him: and now being in a kind of liberty, Cecil deals earnestly with him to marry speedily some other, thereby to take away all suspicion in that behalf; yet some again thought that this liberty of the Dukes was granted him on purpose to bring him into greater danger.

Many Conspiracies were at this time to set the Queen of Scots at liberty; amongst others, there Conspired Thomas and Edward Stanley, younger Sons of the Earl of Derby, with others; but the matter discovered, they were soon suppressed, and some of them executed. And now the Lords Lords of the Queen of Scots Party continuing to protect the English Rebels, the Earl of Suffex, once again, accompanied with the Lord Scroop, entred Scotland, burneth the Villages all along the Valley of Anandale, and compelleth the Duke of Castle-Herald, and the Earls of Huntley and Argyle, under a Writing signed with their own Hands and Seals, to forsake the English Rebels. Whereupon the Earl of Suffex returning home, made these Knights, Edward Hastings, Francis Russel, Valentine Brown, William Hilton, Robert Stapleton, Henry Carwen, and Simon Musgrave.

Queen Elizabeths mind being now in great suspension, by reason of that Bull from Rome, and the late conspiracy in Norfolk, sent Sir William Cecil and Sir Walter Mildmay to the Queen of Scots, who was then at Chattsworth in Derbyshire, to consult with her by what means the breach in Scotland might best be made up, she re-invested in her former dignity, and her Son & Queen Elizabeth might be secured. The Queen of Scots did little deplore her own afflicted condition, putting her self wholly upon the Queens clemency: when the Commissioners made unto her certain Propositions of Agreement: First, That the Treaty of Edenburgh should be confirmed: Then, that she should renounce her Right and Title to England, during Queen Elizabeths life, or any Children of her Body lawfully begotten: Then, that she should send her Son for a Hostage into England, with other six Hostages, such as the Queen should nominate: Then, that the Castles of Humes and East-castle should be held by the English for three years: with some other. To which Propositions the Queen of Scots for the present gave a provident answer; but referred the fuller Answer to the Bishop of Ross, her Ambassador in England, and some other Delegates; who afterwards allowing some of the Propositions, and not allowing others; the Treaty came to nothing, but the matter rested in the state it was before.

At this time Philip King of Spain had contracted a Marriage with Anne of Austria, Daughter to the Emperour Maximilian, his own Niece by his Sister; who was now seeing Sail from Zealand, towards Spain, when Queen Elizabeth, to testifie her love and respect to the House of Austria, sent Sir Charles Howard with the Navy-Royal, to conduct her through the British Sea.

And now was the twelfth year of Queen Elizabeths Reign finished; which certain Wizards had made Papists believe should be her last: but contrary, as if it were but her first, a new Custom began, of celebrating the seventeenth day of November (the Anniversary day of her Reign) with ringing of Bells, Tiltings and Bonfires: which Custom, as it now began, so it was never given over as long as she lived, and is not yet forborn so long after her death.

At this time in Ireland, Connagher O'Brien, Earl of Thowmond, not brooking the severe Government of Edward Fitton, President of Connaght, entred into consultation with some few, to raise a new Rebellion; which, being at the point ready to break forth, was strangely discovered: for the day before they meant to take up Arms, Fitton knowing not at all of the matter, sent the Earl word in a friendly manner, that the next day he and a few friends with him would be his Guests. The Earl convinced by his own Conscience, imagined that his Intendments were revealed; that Fitton would come as an Enemy, rather than a Guest. Out of which fear, he presently set sail into France; where repenting him seriously of his fault, he confessed the whole business to Norris the Queens Ambassador in France; and by his intercession, was afterward pardoned and restored.

In January, the thirteenth year of her Reign, Queen Elizabeth in Royal pomp entring the City of London, went to see the Burse which Sir Thomas Gresham had lately built for the use of the Merchants; and with sound of Trumpets, and the voice of a Herald, solemnly named it the Royal Exchange. A few dayes after, for his many great Services, she made Sir William Cecil Baron Burghley.

There were now about the Scottish affairs, in the name of the King of Scots, the Earl of Morton, Pernare Abbot of Dumfermelin, and James Mac-Gray; whom when Queen Elizabeth required to shew more clearly, for what causes they had deposed the Queen; they exhibited a long and tedious Commentary; wherein, with a certain insolent liberty, they endeavoured to prove, by the ancient Right of the Kingdom of Scotl. that the people of Scotland were above the King: and urged Calvins Authority also, that Popular Magistrates are constituted for the moderation of the licentiousness of Princes: and that it is lawful for them, both to imprison Kings, and upon just causes, to depose them. This Writing the Queen could not read without indignation; but to the Delegates, she gave this Answer; She saw no just cause yet, why they should handle the Queen in such manner; and therefore willed them to think upon some course out of hand, how to allay the dissensions in Scotland. Hereupon in Sir Nicholas Bacons house, Keeper of the Great-Seal, a Proposition was made to the Bishop of Ross, the Bishop of Galloway, and Baron Levingston, Delegates for the Queen of Scots, that for the security of the Kingdom, and the Queen of England, it were requisite, that before the Queen of Scots should be set at liberty, the Duke of Castle-Herald, the Earls of Huntley and Argyle, the Lords Humes, Heris, and another of the Barons should be delivered for Hostages, and the Castles of Dumbrition and Humes, yielded up into the hands of the English for three years. But they made answer, that to yield up great Personages, and such Fortifications as were demanded, were nothing else, but to leave the miserable Queen utterly destitute of faithful friends, and naked of all places fit for guard and defence: yet they offered, to give two Earls and two Barons for Hostages, till two years were expired: which not being accepted, they straightway gathered, and spoke it openly; That now they plainly perceived the English meant to keep the Queen of Scots perpetually prisoner, and likewise to break off the Treaty; seeing they rigorously demanded such security as Scotland was not able to make good. And now Queen Elizabeth seeing that nothing could be done for her own, the King and Queen of Scots safety, unless both Factions in Scotland consented; she held it fit that the Lords of Scotland should themselves appoint some chosen persons to compound the matter.

While matters in England proceeded in this sort, the Queens Party in Scotland was hardly used. Dumbrison Fryth, the strongest Castle in Scotland was taken: and J. Hamilton Archbishop of Saint Andrews, the Duke of Castle-Heralds Brother, as an accessory to the murder of Darley, was hanged without being arraigned according to Law. In England, the Queen of Scots had all her Servants taken from her, except ten only, and a Priest to say Mass: with which indignities the Queen of Scots provoked, causeth a large Commentary of her Counsels, with certain love-Letters to the Duke of Norfolk, to be carried to the Pope, and the King of Spain, by Ridolphus; wch being brought first to the Duke; Higford (one that waited on the Duke in his Bed-chamber) had copied out: but being commanded to burn them, he hid them under a mat in the Dukes Bed-chamber; and that (it should seem) purposely. Ridolphus to draw on the Duke to be Head of the discontented Party in England, aggravated to him the wrongs he had suffered: how against all Law he had been kept a long time in Prison, and now to his great disgrace was not summoned to the Parliament: he exhibited to him a Catalogue of such of the Nobility, who had vowed to assist him: he shewed how the Pope (so the Catholick Religion might be promoted) would himself undergo all the charge of the War, & had already laid down an hundred thousand Crowns; whereof himself had distributed twelve thousand among the English that were fled: he promised, that the K. of Spain would send four thousand Horse, and six thousand Foot to his Assistance; to these Reasons the Bishop of Ross added, that it was an easie matter for him to surprize the Queen; whom when he had in hands, he might set the Q. of Scots at liberty, and might easily obtain of Queen Elizabeth, a toleration of Religion. The former Reasons took somewhat with the Duke, but this point of surprizing the Queen, he abhorred, as an impious Fact, and therefore rejected as pernicious and dangerous.

In France, a little before this, was the Marriage solemnized between Charles the Ninth King of France, and Elizabeth of Austria, Daughter to the Emperour Maximilian; in gratulation whereof, Queen Elizabeth sent into France, Thomas Lord Buckhurst, who with great magnificence was received, and perhaps the more, in regard of a motion now intended to be made: for the Lord Buckhurst having in his retinue, one Guydo Cavalcanti, a Noble man of Florence; the Queen-Mother of France, as being a Florentine her self, had often conference with him, when she would many times say, What a happiness it would be to both the Kingdoms, if a Match were made between the Queen of England, & her Son Henry Duke of Anjou; and at last desired him to commend the motion to the Queen of England, both from her, and from her Son the King of France, as a thing they both exceedingly desired. The Lord Buckhurst returned, having for a present from the King of France a Chain weighing a thousand French Crowns; and Cavalcanti at his return made the motion to the Queen, who seemed not unwilling to harken to it; for by this Match, there should be added to the Kingdom of England the wealthy Dukedoms of Anjou, Burbon, Averne, and in possibility, the Kingdom of France it self. Hereupon a Treaty was held, in which the French propounded three Articles, one concerning the Coronation of the Duke; another, concerning the Joynt Administration of the Kingdom; a third, concerning a Toleration of his Religion: to which it was answered, That the two first Articles might in some sort be composed, but the third, scarce possibly; for though a contrary Religion might be tolerated between Subjects of the same Kingdom; yet between a wife and her Husband it seemed very incongruous and inconvenient: Yet the matter at last came to this conclusion, That if the Duke would afford his presence with the Queen at Divine Service, and not refuse to hear and learn the Doctrine of the Church of England, he should not be compelled to use the English Rites, but at his pleasure use the Roman; not being expressly against the Word of God. But upon these Punctilios they could not accord: and so the Treaty, after it had continued almost a year, brake utterly off. It was indeed generally thought, that the Match was never really intended on either side, but that they both pretended it, only for their own ends; for the Earl of Leicester (who knew more of the Queens mind than any man) wrote at this time to Sir Francis Walsingham, the Queens Ambassador in France, that he found the Queens inclination so cold in the matter, that though the point of Religion were fully accorded; yet she would find one point or other to break it off.

At this time the Continuance of the Duke of *Norfolk*s affection towards the Queen of Scots, came to be discovered by a Packet of Letters, sent by Ridolphus to the Bishop of Ross, and by *Bayliff*s confession (who brought the Letters) being set upon the Rack: so as the Bishop of Ross was confined to the Isle of Ely; Thomas Stanley, Sir Thomas Gerrard, and Rolston, were cast into the Tower; and Henry Howard, who had an aspiring mind to be Archbishop, was committed to the Archbishop of *Canterbury*s keeping. At the same time the Queen of Scots sent money to her Confederates in Scotland, which being by Higford delivered to one Brown to carry, and told it was Silver, when he found by the weight that it was Gold, he began to suspect something; and therefore went and delivered both the money and Letters to the Lords of the Council. Upon this Higford being examined, confessed the whole matter; and withal gave notice of that Commentary also of the Queen of Scots, which is mentioned before; two daies after, the Duke himself being examined, and knowing nothing what his Servants had confessed, denied every particular; and thereupon was brought again to the Tower, by Ralph Sadler Thomas Smith, Henry Nevil, and Doctor Wilson: And after him Bannester, who was the Dukes Counsel at Law: The Earls of Arundell and Southampton; the Lord Lumly, the Lord Cobham, Henry Percy, Lowder, Powel, Goodyer, and others, are committed to Prison, who upon hope of Pardon, confessed all they knew concerning the matter: when these things & especially the Commentary, which the Duke thought had been burnt, were shewed shewed him, he then cryed out, I am betrayed by my own Servants; not having learned to be distrustful, which is the very sinew of Wisdome. And then with all submission, he besought the Lords to mediate for him to the Queen; towards whom, he protested he never had the least thought of doing any hurt.

And now seeing it appeared, that the Bishop of Ross had been the whole contriver of the business, it was deliberated what to do to him, because he was an Ambassador. Hereupon divers Civilians are called; as David Lewis, Valentine Dale, William Drury, William Aubrey, and Henry Jones; of whom these questions were asked:

First, Whether an Ambassador who raiseth Rebellion against the Prince to whom he is an Ambassador, may enjoy the Priviledges of an Ambassador, and is not liable to punishment?

They answered, That such an Ambassador hath forfeited the Priviledges of an Ambassador, and is liable to punishment.

Secondly, Whether the Minister or Proctor of a Prince, who is deposed by publick Authority, and in whose room another is Inaugurated, may enjoy the Priviledges of an Ambassador?

They answered, That if such a Prince be lawfully deposed, his Proctor cannot challenge the Priviledges of an Ambassador, forasmuch as none but absolute Princes, and such as have Right of Majesty, can appoint Ambassadors.

Thirdly, Whether a Prince who is come into another Princes Country, and held in Custody, may have his Proctor; and if he shall be held an Ambassador?

They answered, If such a Prince have not lost his Sovereignty, he may have his Proctor; but whether that Proctor shall be reputed as an Ambassador or no, this dependeth on the Authority of his Delegation.

Fourthly, Whether if a Prince gave warning to such a Proctor, and to his Prince who is under Custody that this Proctor shall not from henceforth be accounted for an Ambassador; whether that Proctor may by Law challenge the Priviledge of an Ambassador.

They answered, A Prince may forbid an Ambassador to enter into his Kingdom, and may command him to depart the Kingdom, if he contain not himself within his due limits; yet in the mean while he is to enjoy the Priviledges of an Ambassador.

Upon these Answers, the Bishop of Ross is warned by the Lords of the Council, That he shall no longer be esteemed an Ambassador, but be punished as his fault shall deserve. The Bishop alledged for himself, That he had not violated the Right of an Ambassador Via Juris, but Via Facti (to use his own words) and therefore advised them, not to use harder measure to him than was used to the English Ambassadors, Throgmorton in Fance, Randol and Tamworth in Scotland; who had raised Rebellions there, and were open Abettors of the same; and yet had no greater punishment, then to be gone at a time limited. When they began to urge him what the English had testified against him, he lovingly requested them to give no credit to it; forasmuch as by a received custom, which hath the force of a Law, the Testimony of an English man against a Scot, or of a Scot against an English man is not to be admitted: But after some altercations, the Bishop is led away to the Tower, and kept close Prisoner.

At this very season, Matthew Earl of Lenox, Regent of Scotland, the Kings Grandfather, was by the adverse party set upon at unawares; who having yielded himself to David Spense, of Worcester, (that was then careful to defend him) together with him, was slain by Bell and Caulder; when with great Industry he had governed the Kingdom for his Grand-Child about fourteen months. In whose room, John Ereskin Earl of Marre, by common consent of the Kings Faction, was chosen Regent of Scotland; who being a man of a quiet disposition, through extreme grief of the many troubles he sustained in the place, departed this life, when he had governed thirteen months.

And now a Parliament was held at Westminster; wherein, besides a Law for preventing of the treacherous endeavors of seditious Subjects, another Law was made, That if any one during the Queens life, by Books written or printed, shall expressly affirm, That any is, or ought to be the Heir or Successor of the Queen, (besides the natural Off-spring of her Body) or shall to that purpose publish, print, or disperse any Book or Schedules; he, and his favourers, shall for the first offence suffer a years Imprisonment, and the loss of one half of his Goods: and if they offend again, they shall be in a Framunire. A Law also was made, by which to be reconciled to the See of Rome, was made Treason; and it was pronounced against the Queen of Scots, That if she offended again against the Laws of England, it might be lawful to question her, as the Wife of a Peer of the Kingdom of England. But here the Queen interposed her Authority, and would not suffer it to be enacted. About this time, in May, a solemn Tilting was performed at Westminster; where the Challengers were Edward Earl of Oxford, Charles Howard, Sir Henry Lee, and Christopher Hatton Esquire; who all did very valiantly, but the Earl of Oxford best.

As soon as the Parliament was dissolved, a Consultation was held, Whether John Story, Doctor of the Laws, the Duke D'Alva's Searcher (who some time before, was by a wile brought into England) being an English man born; and having in Brabant consulted with a forain Prince about the invading of England, were to be held guilty of High-Treason? It was resolved affirmatively: Whereupon he his called to the Bar, and indicted of Treason; That he had consulted with one Preshall a Conjurer, to make away the Queen; That he cursed her daily, when he said Grace at Table: That he shewed a way to the Secretary of Duke D'Alva, how to invade England, &c. Where he affirming, that the Judges had no power to meddle with him, for that he Ireland at this time was indifferent quiet; for John Perrot President of Munster, had brought James Fitz Morris to submit himself, and crave pardon. Sidney, the Lord Deputy, returned into England, and Sir William Fitz Williams, who had married his Sister, succeeded in his room.

1573. It was now the fifteenth year of Queen Elizabeths Reign; when Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, on the sixteenth day of January, was brought to his Tryal at Westminster-Hall, where sate as Commissioners, George Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury (made high Steward of England for that day) Renold Gray Earl of Kent, Thomas Ratcliff Earl of Sussex, Henry Hastings Earl of Huntington, Francis Russel Earl of Bedford, Henry Herbert Earl of Pembroke, Edward Seymour Earl of Hartford, Ambrose Dudley Earl of Warwick, Robert Dudley Earl of Leicester; Walter Devereux Viscount of Hereford, Edward Lord Clinton, Admiral; William Lord Howard of Effingham, Chamberlain; William Cecill Lord Burley, Secretary; Arthur Lord Gray of Wilton, James Blunt Lord Mountjoy, William Lord Sands, Thomas Lord Wentworth, William Lord Borough, Lewis Lord Mordant, John Paulet Lord St. John of Basing, Robert Lord Rich, Roger Lord North, Edmond Bruges Lord Chandos, Olinier Lord St. John of Bletsho, Thomas Sackvyle Lord Buckhurst, and William West Lord de la Ware. After silence bidden, Sir Owen Hopton, Lieutenant of the Tower, was commanded to bring the Duke to the Bar; and then the Clark of the Crown said, Thomas Duke of Norfolk, late of Keningale, in the County of Norfolk, Hold up thy hand; which done, the Clark with a loud Voice readeth the Crimes laid to his Charge: That in the eleventh year of the Queens Reign, he had trayterously consulted to make her away, and to bring in foreign Forces for invading the Kingdom: Also that he dealt with the Queen of Scots concerning Marriage, contrary to his promise made to the Queen under his hand-writing: Also, that he relieved with money the Earls of Northumberland and Westmerland, that had stirred up Rebellion against the Queen: also, That in the 13th year of the Queens Reign, he implored Auxiliary Forces of Pope Pius the Fifth, the Queens professed Enemy, of the King of Spain, and the Duke D'Alva, for the freeing of the Queen of Scots, and restoring of the Popish Religion: And lastly, that he sent supply to the Lord Heris, and other the Queens Enemies in Scotland.

No Coun-

Treason.
These Indictments being read, the Clark demanded of the Duke, if he were guilty of these Crimes, or not? Here the Duke requested he might be allowed to have Counsel. But Catiline chief Justice, made answer, That it was not lawful. Yet (said the Duke) I have heard that Humphry Stafford, in the Reign of King Henry the Seventh, in a Case of Treason, had one assigned to plead for him. To which Dyer chief Justice of the Common pleas, made answer, That

Stafford had Counsel assigned him concerning the Right of Sanctuary from whence he was taken by force; but in the Indictment of Treason, he pleaded his own cause. After this, the Duke yielded to be tryed by the Peers; first Barham, Serjeant at Law, then Gerrard the Queens Attorney, and lastly, Bromely, the Queens Solicitor, enforced the Crimes objected against him: to all which, the Duke made colourable answers; but most of them being proved by sufficient testimony, he asked upon occasion, Whether the Subjects of another Prince, who is confederate and in league with the Queen, are to be accounted Enemies? to which Catiline answered, They were; and that the Queen of England might wage War with any Duke of France, and yet hold firm peace with the French King. When it grew towards night, the Lord High Steward demanded of the Duke, if he had any more to say for himself: who answer'd, I rely upon the equity of the Laws. After this, the Lords withdrawing a while, and then returning, the Lord Steward beginning at the lowermost, asked them, My Lord de la Ware, Is Thomas Duke of Norfolk guilty of these Crimes of High Treason, for which he is called in question? he rising up and laying his hand upon his breast answered, Guilty: in like manner they answered all. After this, the Lord Steward with tears in his eyes, pronounced sentence in form as is used. A few days after were Barnes and Mather executed, who conspired with one Herle, to make away certain of the Counsellors, and to free the Duke; but Herle revealed the business presently, to whom Barnes (when he saw his Accuser brought forth) smilingly said, Herle, thou wert but one hour before me, else I had been in thy place for the Accuser, and thou in my room to be hanged: At the same time with them was hanged also Henry Rolf, for counterfeiting the Queens hand. But though the Duke was now condemned, yet the Queen was so tender of his case, that it was four months after before he was executed; at last, on the second of June, at eight of the clock in the Morning he was brought to the Scaffold upon Tower Hill, and there beheaded.

At this time, and upon this occasion, a Parliament was Assembled, wherein, amongst other Laws, it was Enacted; That if any man should go about to free any person imprisoned by the Queens Commandment, for Treason or suspicion of Treason, and not yet arraigned, he shall lose all his Goods for his life-time, and be imprisoned during the Queens pleasure; if the said person having been arraigned, the Rescuer shall forfeit his life; if condemned, he shall be guilty of Rebellion.

In the time of this Parliament, the Queen created Walter Devereux E. of Essex, being before but Viscount Hereford; because he was descended by his Great-grand-mother, from the Bourchiers, and made the Lord Clinton (who had large Revenues in Lincoln-shire) Earl of Lincoln; Also she called forth John Pawlet of Basing, the Marquess of Winchesters Son, Henry Compton, Henry Cheyney, and Henry Norris, for Barons by Summons.

Within ten days after the Dukes death, William Lord de la Ware, Sir Ralph Sadler, Thomas Wilson, Doctor of the Laws, and Thomas Bromley

Qu. Eliz. sends the Lord de la Ware and others to the Qu. to charge her with many Crimes; & what she answer'd.

ley the Queens Solicitor, were sent to the Queen of Scots, to expostulate with her, That she had usurped the Title and Arms of the Kingdom of England, and had not renounced the same, according to the agreement of the Treaty at Edenburgh; That she had endeavoured the marriage of the Duke of Norfolk, without acquainting the Queen, and had used all forcible means to free him out of Prison, had raised the Rebellion in the North, had relieved the Rebels both in Scotland and in the Low-Countries; had implored Aids from the Pope, the King of Spain, & others; had conspired with certain of the English, to free her out of Prison, and declare her Queen of England: Lastly, That she had procured the Popes Bull against the Queen, and suffered herself to be publicly named the Queen of England in Foreign Countries: All which Accusations she either absolutely denied, or else fairly extenuated: and though (as she said) she were a free Queen, and not subject to any Creature; yet she was contented, and requested, that she might make her personal answer at the next Parliament.

How the Dutch got possession of their Sea-Towns.

About this time, the King of Spain by his Embassadour here, complained to the Queen, that the Rebels of the Netherlands were harboured and entertained in England, contrary to the Articles of the League; whereupon the Queen set forth a severe Proclamation, That all the Dutch, who could any ways be suspected of Rebellion, should presently depart the Realm, which yet turned little to D'Alva's or the King of Spain's benefit: For hereupon, Count Vander-Mark, and other Dutch going out of England; surpris'd the Brill first, then Flushing, and afterwards drew other Towns to revolt, and in a short time excluded the Duke D'Alva in a manner from the Sea. And this error, to suffer the Protestant Party to get possession of the Sea-Towns, hath been the cause they have been able to hold out, even all this long time, against the King of Spain. And now many Military men having little to do at home, got them into the Netherlands, some to Duke D'Alva; but the far greater number to the Prince of Orange: The first of whom was Thomas Morgan, who carried three hundred English, to Flushing; then followed by his procurement nine Companies more under the conduct of Humphry Gilbert; and afterward it became the Nursery of all our English Souldiers.

A League concluded between Qu. Eliz. and the K. of France.

At this time Charles the French King setting his mind wholly (at least seeming so) upon the Low-Country War, concluding a Peace, entred into a League with Queen Elizabeth; which was to remain firm, not only during their two lives, but between their Successors also, if the Successor signifie to the Survivor within a year, that he accepteth it, otherwise to be at liberty. It was likewise agreed, that aid by Sea or Land they should each of them afford to other upon occasion. And for ratification of this League, Edward Clinton Earl of Lincoln and Admiral of England, was sent into France, with whom went the Lords Dacres, Rich, Talbot, Sands, and others. The French King likewise sent the Duke of Memorancy and Paul Foix into England, with a great Train; that the Queen in presence of them, and the Embassadour in Ordinary, might swear to the League, which she did at Westminster the seventeenth of May, in the year 1572. The day after she made Memorancy Knight of the Garter.

Memorancy whilst he tarried in England, made intercession in his Kings name, that what favour could be without danger, might be shewed to the Queen of Scots; and then made much ado again about the marriage with the Duke of Anjou; but being hopeles to make conclusion thereof, by reason of the diversity of Religion, he return'd into France; for now was great provision making ready for the marriage between Henry K. of Navarre, and the Lady Margaret the French Kings Sister; to which Solemnity, with notable dissimulation, the Queen of Navarre, & the chief of all the Protestants were allured, being born in hand, that there should be a renovation of love, and a perpetual Peace established. The Earl of Leicester likewise and the Lord Burleigh were invited out of England, and out of Germany, the Sons of the Prince Elector Palatine, under colour of honour, but indeed that they might be intrapped, and they, and together with them the Protestant Religion, at one blow, if not clean cut off, yet receive a deadly wound: For the marriage being celebrated, there presently followed that cruel Massacre at Paris, and the terrible slaughter of the Protestants throughout all the Cities of France; but to set a shew of equity upon the Fact, Edicts and Proclamations were presently set forth, that the Protestants had plotted a wicked conspiracy against the King, the Queen-Mother, the Brethren, the King of Navarre, and the Princess of the Blood-Royal; and to keep the thing in memory, Coyn was presently stamped, upon one side whereof was the Kings Picture with this Inscription, Virtus in Rebelles, on the other side Pietas excitavit justitiam; But the King of France, notwithstanding all the shew he made of Piety, escaped not the Divine revenge; for before the year came about, he fell sick of a Bloody-Flux, and afterwards with long and grievous torments ended his life.

Great preparation for the marriage of Henry King of Navarre with the French K. Sister. At which Marriage was the cruel massacre of the Protestants at Paris, and throughout all the Cities of France.

The K. of France for this shedding of blood, falls himself into a bloody Flux, & in grievous torments ends his life.

A little before this, Mota Fenell, Embassadour to the King of France, being in England, by virtue of an order from the Queen-Mother of France, propounded to Queen Elizabeth at Kenel-worth (two days before the Massacre in that Kingdom) the marriage of her youngest Son Francis Duke of Alanson (for the Queen-Mother had been told by some cunning-men, that all her Sons should be Kings, and she knew no way for it but this.) But Queen Elizabeth, by reason of the disparity of age, modestly excused her self, (for he was scarce seventeen years old, and she was now past eight and thirty) yet she promised to consider of it, and Alanson did not leave to prosecute the Suit.

A motion is now made to Qu. Eliz. to marry Francis D. of Alanson, and her Answer.

At this time, Thomas Piercy Earl of Northumberland, who first rebelled, and afterwards fled into Scotland, was for a sum of money delivered by the Earl of Morton to the Lord Hunsdon Governour of Berwick; and a while after was beheaded at York. And now as these two great Personages the Duke of Norfolk and the Earl of Northumberland were taken away by violent death; so three other great Personages were at this time taken away by a natural death: First, William Paulet, who from a private man came by degrees

Thomas Piercy E. of Northumberland is beheaded.

And now Queen Elizabeth having formerly borrowed money of her Subjects, she thankfully repaid it, which won her no less love, than if she had given it; and more love she gained also at this time by two Proclamations, by one of which she commanded Noble men to observe the Law of keeping retainers; by the other, she restrained Informers, who under colour of spying out Crown-Land, concealed by private persons, sacrilegiously seized upon the Lands of Parish-Churches & Alms-houses, piously endow'd by the Queens Ancestors. And more Love and Honour also she gained at this time by two Acts of Justice; the one, that she satisfied the English Merchants out of the goods which were detain'd belonging to the Dutch, and restored the rest to Duke D' Alva, and made a full transaction with the Merchants of Genova for the money intercepted; the other, that she freed England at this time, of the debts which her Father and her Brother had run into in foreign parts and were increased by yearly interest, and caused the obligations of the City of London, which had so often been renewed, to be given in, to the great rejoicing of the Citizens.

The Spanish affairs growing now very turbulent in the Netherlands, Flushing lost, the Towns of Holland revolted, and the Spanish Navy vanquished by the Zealanders, Duke D' Alva against his will began to shew more kindness towards the English, so as in the month of January, the Trade which in Anno 1568. had been forbidden, was now allowed again between the Dutch and the English, for two years; but those two years expired, the English removed their Trading to the Confederate States.

The Earl

the Queen,

the King of France's Daughter.

The last year in the month of November, a Daughter was born to the French King, to whom he requested Queen Elizabeth to be God-mother, who thereupon sent William Somerset Earl of Worcester into France, with a Font of massy Gold to stand as her Deputy at the Christning. Hereupon, and for that the Queen promised to observe the League strictly, the French King and Queen-Mother began to affect her more and more, and the Duke D' Alanson wrote sundry Love-letters to her, and the French King and his Mother interceded for the marriage with all earnestness. It is true the Queen conceived divers Reasons why it was fit for her to marry; but the Courtiers for their own ends dissuaded her as much from it: at last the Queen-Mother of France was wonderfully importunate, that her Son Alanson might have leave to come to see her: whereupon being wearied with continual Letters & Messages, she gave her consent; but upon condition that he should not take it for any disgrace to him, if he returned without obtaining his Suit: But as soon as Qu. Elizabeth had notice, that his Brother Henry was elected King of Poland, and that the King of France was very sick, she gave intimation to Alanson by Edward Horsey Governour of the Isle of Wight, that he should not make too much haste into England; but should first procure a Peace by some means or other in France, and declare by some notable Argument, his good will towards the Protestants, thereby to be the more welcome Guest into England. Hereupon a Peace was concluded in France, and in certain places the Protestants were allowed to exercise their Religion: and then again the French King and the Queen Mother used all their endeavour to have the Marriage go forward (for they were very desirous that Alanson who was of a crooked and perverse disposition, and prone to raise tumults) might be removed out of France; and withal they requested of Queen Elizabeth, that if the Duke of Anjou took his Voyage into Poland by Sea, he might have publick caution to sail through the British Ocean. To this last Request, she not only consented with all alacrity, but also made offer of a Fleet to conduct him thither. In the mean while, Alanson fell sick of the Meazels, which his Mother signified to Queen Elizabeth by Count Rhets, excusing him thereupon for not coming into England as he had determined. The Count found the Queen at Canterbury, where she gave him Royal entertainment: and Matthew Parker Archbishop of Canterbury, Royal entertainment to them both.

All this while, since the death of the Earl of Marre, there had been no Regent in Scotland, but now by the procurement of Qu. Elizabeth chiefly, James Douglas Earl of Morton is made Regent; who when is Authority in a Parliamentary Assembly was established, Enacted many profitable Laws for the defence of Religion against Papists and Hereticks, in the name of the King. But the protection and keeping of the Kings Person, he confirmed to Alexander Ereskin Earl of Marre (to whom the custody of the Kings in their tenders years, by especial priviledg belongeth) though he were himself in his Minority: upon these Conditions, That no Papists, nor factious persons should be admitted to his presence: An Earl should come with only two Servants attending him: A Baron, with only one: All other, single: and every one unarmed. The French King in the mean time, sent his Embassadour Monsieur Vyrriar to corrupt the Earls of Atholl and Huntley, with large Promises, to oppose the Regent: Queen Elizabeth as much laboured to defend him; but though by the Ministry of Killigrew, she had drawn James Hamilton Duke of Castle-Herald and George Gourdon Earl of Huntley, and the most eminent of that Faction, upon indifferent conditions, to acknowledge the Regent, yet William Rircald, Lord Granange (whom Murray when he was Regent had made Governour of Edinburgh Castle) the Lord Humes, Lydington, the Bishop of Dunkeld, Dunkeld, and others, would by no means admit of the Regents Government, but held that Castle, and fortified it in the Queen of Scots name, having Lyddington for their Counsellour herein, and trusting to the natural strength of the place, and to the Duke D'Alva's and the French King's promises, to send them supplies both of men and money. Now when these persons could by no means be drawn to accept of Conditions of Peace, and to deliver up the Castle to the Regent, Queen Elizabeth (who could in no case indure the French in Scotland) suffered her self at length to be intreated by the Regent, to send Forces, Guns and Ammunition, for assaulting the Castle, upon certain Conditions, whereof one was, that ten Hostages should be sent into England, to be security for returning the Men and Ammunition, unless by the common hazard of War they should chance to miscarry. The Conditions being agreed on; William Drury Marshal of the Garrison at Barwick, with some great Ordnance, and fifteen hundred Souldiers (amongst whom were some Noble Volunteers, George Carie, Henry Carie, Thomas Cecil, Henry Lee, William Knowls, Sutton, Cotton, Kelway, Will. Killebrew, and others) entred into Scotland, and besieged the Castle, which after three and thirty dayes siege, was delivered up to the Regent for the Kings use, with all the persons that were in it; amongst whom, Kircald Lord Grange & James his Brother, Musman and Cook Goldsmiths (who had counterfeited Coyn in the Castle) were hanged; although to redeem Granges life, an hundred of the Family of the Kircalds offered themselves to be in perpetual Servitude to the Regent, besides an annual Pension of 3 thousand marks, and twenty thousand pounds of Scottish money in present; and to put in caution, that from thenceforth he should continue in duty and homage to the King; but it would not be accepted. Humes and the rest were spared, through Qu. Elizab. merciful intercession; Lyddington was sent to Leith, where he died, & was suspected to be poisoned: A man of the greatest understanding in the Scottish Nation, and of an excellent wit, but very variable; for which George Buchanan called him the Chamælion.

And now from this time Scotland began to breathe, after long Civil Wars, and as well the Captains of both Parties, as the Souldiers, betook themselves into Sweedland, France, and the Low-Countries, where they valorously behaved themselves, and won great commendation. As for John Lesley Bishop of Rosse, he was now set at liberty, but commanded to depart presently out of England, and being beyond the Sea, he continued still to sollicite his Mistress the Queen of Scots cause, with the Emperour, the Pope, the French King, and the German Princes of the Popish Religion; who all led him on with fair promises but performed nothing: For indeed he, in whom he had greatest confidence, which was the Duke D'Alva, was at that time called away, partly out of Jealousie of State, as being thought to grow too great, and partly out of opinion that by his cruelty he made the people to revolt; and therefore in his place was sent Ludovicus Zuinga, a man of great Nobility in Spain, but of a more peaceable disposition than D'Alva; and now this man did all good Offices to win Queen Elizabeth to him, and minding his own affairs only, would not intermeddle with the Scottish or English matters.

About this time, a frantick Opinion was held by one Peter Bourchet, a Gentlem. of the Middle-Temple, that it was lawful to kill them that opposed the Truth of the Gospel; and so far was he possessed with this opinion, that he assaulted the famous Seaman Captain Hawkins, & wounded him with a dagger; taking him for Hatton, who at that time was in great favour with the Queen, and of the Privy Council, whom he had been informed to be a great Adversary to innovations. The Q. grew so angry hereat, that she commanded Martial Law should be executed upon him presently, till her Counsel advised her, that Martial Law was not to be used, but in the field, and in turbulent times; but at home, and in time of Peace, there must be legal proceedings: Hereupon Bourchet was sent to the Tower, where taking a brand out of the fire, he stuck it into the brains of one of his keepers, named Hugh Longworth, and killed him; for which fact he was condemn'd of murder, had his right hand cut off & nail'd to the gallows, & then himself hang'd.

After the violent death of this Varlet, we may speak of the natural death of two great persons: First William Lord Howard of Effingham, Son of the warlike Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, by his second Wife Agnes Tilney. This William was made a Baron by Queen Mary, and Lord High Admiral of England, and by Queen Elizabeth Lord Chamberlain, till such time that being taken with age, he yielded up that place to the Earl of Suffex, and was then made keeper of the Privy Seal, which is the fourth degree of Honour in England. His Son Charles succeeded him in the Dignity of his Barony, who was after made Lord Chamberlain to the Queen, and then Lord High Admiral of England. A while after him died Reginald Gray Earl of Kent, whom the Queen a year before of a private man had made Earl of Kent, when as that Title, from the death of Richard Gray Earl of Kent, who had wasted his Patrimony, and was Elder Brother to this mans Grand-Father, had lien asleep for fifty years together.

At this time many particular Rebellions were in Ireland; The O-Conors and O-Moors took Arms, and committed many outrages: in Munster James Fitz-Morris, and Fitz-Edmund did the like; but by the industry of Sir John Perrot President of Munster were suppressed. In Ulster, Bryan Mac Philym burnt Knockfergus, and many others joyned in Rebellion with him. Against these Walter Devereux (whom the Queen had lately created Earl of Essex) desired leave to go; which Sir William Fitz-Williams Deputy of Ireland opposed, as fearing that the glory of so great an Earl would eclipse his light. But for this, the Queen finds a remedy, by appointing Essex to take a Patent of the Deputy, whereby to be made Governour of Ulster. But this remedy for Fitz-Williams might have made a fore in the mind of Essex (to receive his Authority from his inferiour) but that the Nobleness of his mind made him more to regard the Vertue, than the Glory. And so, in the end of August, he landed at Knockfergus, having with him the Lords Darcy and Rich, and Sir Henry Knowles & his

After this revolt, the Earl of Essex finding many difficulties in the business, & himself not well provided of skilful Souldiers, makes suit to the Queen for leave to come home ; which the Earl of Leicester ( who liked his room better than his Company ) opposed ; still after expence of a years time and much treasure, he at last obtained leave, and returned home.

A. Reg. 17.
The Duke of Alanfon continues his Suit to Qu. Eliz.

The next Year, being 1574, and the 17th year of Queen Elizabeths Reign, the Duke Alanfon grew more importunate in his Suit, than at any time before ; so he obtained of the Queen to come into England, any time before the 20th of May ; and this she the rather did, because she perceived him now to be really bent against the Guises her sworn Enemies. But before this Answer was brought him, Valentine Dale Doctor of the Civil Law, the Qu. Embassador in France, gave intimation to the Queen, That Alanfon and Navarre were in restraint, and committed to Keepers : for the Guises had suggested that Alanfon held intimate friendship with Admiral Colen, the chief Leader of the Protestants in France ; and indeed, Alanfon being examined, freely confess'd, that he had now for a good while desired the marriage of the Queen of England, and conceiving that good correspondence with Colen might be useful to him to that end, he had thereupon had conference with him thereabout, and concerning the Low-Countrie War. In the mean time Thomas Wilkes, Dales Secretary, got cunningly to Alanfon, and in the Queens name made promise both to him, and to Navarre, that she would omit no opportunity of procuring their inlaregment. For which the subtil Queen-Mother so complained of him to Queen Elizabeth, that he was fain to go into France, and there crave pardon for his fault. But Navarre, not un mindful of this kindness in Wilkes, when above five & twenty years after, being King of France, he saw him in Normandy, he Knighted him. Hereupon the Queen sent Thomas Randol into France, to the Queen-Mother, that if it were possible, he might gain Reconciliation for Alanfon her Son, and for the King of Navarre. But before he was landed in France, Charles the then French King dyed, whose Funeral Rites were solemnly performed in St. Pauls Church in London.

As soon as Henry the Third King of France, was come from Poland, Roger Lord North was sent into France, to congratulate his return and happy Inauguration into the Kingdom ; who thereupon together with the Queen-Mother, did forthwith send their joynt Letters into England, strongly soliciting the business of Marriage between Alanfon and the Queen. In the mean time notwithstanding, they used all possible devices (& left no means unsought) to get the young King of Scotland to be sent into France, and to deprive Morton who was the Regent, of his Authority, whereof the Queen of Scots also was desirous ; she being perswaded, that if her Son were once gotten safely into France, she and the Catholics in England should be more mildly used. At which time, an aspersion was cast upon the Queen of Scots, as if she had made the match between Charles Uncle to the Qu. of Scots ( who had lately the Earldom of Lenox confirmed to him by Parliament ) and Elizabeth Cavendish the Countess of Shrewsburies Daughter by a former Husband ; upon which ground, both their Mothers, and some others also were kept in prison for a time, and being doubted whereunto this Marriage should tend, Henry Earl of Huntington, President of the Council in the North, is authorized with secret Instructions to examine it. It will be fit here to say something of this place of Government in the North ; which from small beginnings is now become so eminent as it is at this day ; whereof this was the Original. When as in the Reign of Henry the 8, after that the Rebellion in the Northern parts, about the subversion of Abbies was quieted, the Duke of Norfolk tarried in those quarters, and many complaints of injuries done were tendred unto him, whereof some he composed himself, and others he commended under his Seal to men of wisdom to determine : Hereof when K. Henry heard he sent down a peculiar Seal to be used in these cases, & calling home the Duke, committed the same to Tunstall Bishop of Durham, and constituted Assistants with Authority to hear and determine the complaints of the Poor, and he was the first that was called President ; and from that time, the authority of his successors grew in credit.

It was now the year One thousand five hundred seventy five, and the 18th year of Queen Elizabeths Reign, when Henry the third King of France being returned from Poland, and crown'd at Rheimes, was careful to have the League of Blois confirmed : which in the year 1572. had been concluded between his Brother Charles & the most illustrious Qu. Elizabeth ; Now therefore he confirmed it with his own Subscription, and delivered it to Dale the Queens Legier, as the Queen likewise ratified it at S. James's near Westminster : But a little after he demanded by Letters, whether the mutal defence against all persons mentioned in the League was intended to comprehend the case of Religion also ? where- unto she answered, that it did comprehend it : he thereupon hearing this from the Queen, began presently to prepare War against the Protestants, and Alanfon being drawn to the Adverse party, there was no speech of the Marriage for a long time.

In the Netherlands at this time, Lodovick Zuinga, who was successor unto Duke D'Alva, was wholly bent to recover the Command of the Seas, which D'Alva had neglected ; but not being sufficiently provided of a Navy, he sent Boischoit into England, that with the Queens leave, he might take up Ships and Mariners to go against the Hollanders & Zealanders, but this he would not grant : Then he made suit that the Queen would please not to take it in evil part, if the banished persons of the Engli. in the Low-countrie served the King of Spain in a Sea-fight against the Hollanders ; and that they might have free access to the Ports of England, to buy provision for ready money ; but this she would not grant neither : Then he made request, that the Dutch, who were Rebels against the K. of Spain, might be put out of England, but neither would she grant this, as being an Action void of Humanity, & against the the Laws of Hospitality; yet because she would not be thought to violate the old Burgundian law, she commanded by Proclamation, that the Ships of the Dutch which were made ready, should not go forth of the Haven; nor yet the Dutch, who had taken up Arms against the K. of Spain, enter into the Ports of England, & by Name, the Prince of Orange, & so other the prime of that Faction: & this she did the more willingly, because Zuinga at the intercession of Wilson the English Ambassador, had removed the E. of Westmerland, & other English Fugitives out of the Dominions of the K. of Spain, and had also dissolved the English Seminary at Doway; though instead thereof, the Gui- ses through the procurement of Pope Gregory the thirteenth, set up another Seminary at Rhemes.

The Eng- lish Semi- nary at Doway is dissolved, and ano- ther set up at Rhemes.

The States of the Low Coun- tries make choice of Qu. Eliz. to be their Protector, and why.

And at this time the Prince of Orange perceiv- ing his Forces but small, and thinking himself too weak for the King of Spain, and little hope of aid from England, he entred into Consultation with the Confederate States, to whose protecti- on they were best and in the most security to betake themselves: The Princes of Germany they knew were not all of one mind, parted from money very hardly, and did not every way, nor would not by any means possible accord and concur with them in their Religion; and there- fore they were not so fit. Then the French they saw, were intangled in a Civil War, and so had enough of their own to do; besides the old grudges and heart-burnings that were between the French and Dutch; and therefore neither were they so fit. There remained then the Eng- lish, as fittest of any (if it might be obtained) see- ing they were Neighbours; of the same Religi- on, and of a Language not much different, strong in shipping, and rich in Merchandize. Hereupon (considering the commodiousness of the English Nation) they sent into England Philip Marnize of Saint Aldegond, Janus Dowsa, William Nyvell, and Doctor Melsen; who in an honourable Ambassage, offer the Countries of Holland and Zealand to be possessed and prote- cted by the Queen, for as much as she was descen- ded from the Princes of Holland, by Philippa wife of Edward the third, Daughter of William of Ba- varia, Count of Hanonia and Holland: by whose other Sister, the hereditary Right of those Pro- vinces came to the King of Spain. To this offer, the Queen takes time to answer; and at last, ha- ving maturely advised of the matter, her Answer was this; That as yet she conceived not how with the safety of her Honour, and an upright Conscience, she could receive those Provinces in- to her Protection, much less assume them into her possession; but promised she would deal ear- nestly with the K. of Spain, that a well condition- ed Peace might be concluded. Presently upon this Zuinga Governour of the Low-Countries died; after whose death, the States of Brabant, Flanders, and the other Provinces, took upon them the ancient Administration and Authori- ty in the Commonwealth; which the King of Spain was fain to confirm to them, till such time as John of Austria were come, whom he deter- mined to make Governour there. In the mean time, Queen Elizabeth, in behalf of the King of Spain, sent William Davison in Ambassage to those Princes, to exhort them to be peaceable & quiet, which yet by reason of the Spanish Soul-diers were so outrageous little prevailed.

In England all was calm and quiet for all this year, only a difference fell out between Sir John Foster Governour of Berwick, and John Cormickill Keeper of Liddisdale in Scotland: In compos- ing whereof, the Regent of Scotland, having given Queen Elizabeth some discontentment, was fain to come unarmed before the Earl of Huntington, appointed the Legate for England at Bonderod, and so the matter was taken up, & the Regent ever after continued constant in observ- ing the Queen; and to his great commendation, restrained the Free-booters of the Borders, to the great good of both Kingdoms.

This year there dyed in Scotland, James Ham- iltion Duke of Castle-Herald, and Earl of Arran, who was great Grand-child of James the Se- cond, King of Scots, by his Daughter, appoint- ed Tutor to Mary, Queen of Scots, and design- ed Heir and Governour of the Kingdom, during her minority.

At this time the Earl of Essex is come into Ire- land again, where having done good Services, & being in the midst of Victory, he was on a sud- den commanded to resign his Authority in Ul- ster: and as though he were an ordinary Com- mander, is set over three-hundred Souldiers: which disgrace was wrought by his Adversaries at Court, to the continual perplexing of his mild spirit. And now is Sir Hen. Sidney the third time sent Deputy into Ireland; who going into Ul- ster, there came to him & submitted themselves Mac Mahon, Mac Gnyre, Torlogh Leynigh, the O-Conors and O-Moors, the E. of Desmond, & the rebellious Sons of the E. of Clanriccard, all whom he recieved into favour, and with great com- dation administered the Province.

The Earl of Essex going into Ireland a- gain, is dis- graced with being made an ordinary Comman- der.

At this time the Spaniard in the Low-Countries began to deal roughly with the people, & harried the Inhabitants with all manner of spoil and in- jury: Antwerp the most famous town of Traffick in all Europe, was miserably pillaged, the English Merchants houses rifled, insomuch that the States were enforced to take up Arms, and Messengers were sent to all neighbouring Princes; and to Queen Elizabeth was sent Monsieur Aubigny, both to shew her upon how necessary and just causes they had taken up Arms, and also to bor- row of her a great sum of Money, the better to enable them to resist the Spaniard. But she be- ing certainly informed, That they first sued to the French-King for help, denied the Request, yet promised to intercede earnestly with the K. of Spain for Peace. And in that imployment, she addressed into Spain, John Smith, cousin german to King Edward the sixth, a man of Spanish be- haviour, and well known to the King of Spain, who was liberally received by the King, & with such wisdom retorted the contumelious speech of Gasper Quirago Archbishop of Toledo and the Spanish Inquisitors, who would not admit in the Queens Title the Attribute of Defender of the Faith; that he gained great thanks from the King of Spain himself who requested him not to speak of it to the Queen, and gave severe com- mand, that the Title should be admitted.

And now by this time was John of Austria, come into the Low-Countries with a large Com- mission: for he was the Natural Son of the Em- perour Charles the fifth, to whom the Queen sent Edward Horsey, Governour of the Isle of Wight, to congratulate his coming thither, and to offer help if the States called the French into the Netherlands; yet at the same time, Smevingham being exceeding importunate on the States behalf, she sent them twenty thousand pounds of English money, (so well she could play her game of both hands) upon condition they should neither change their Prince nor their Religion, nor take the French into the Low-Countries, nor refuse a peace, if John of Austria should condescend to indifferent conditions; but if he embraced a peace, then the money should be paid back to the Spanish Souldiers, who were ready to mutiny for lack of pay. So careful she was to retain these declining Provinces in Obedience to the King of Spain.

Martin Forbisher sent to discover the North-part of America.

At this time a Voyage was undertaken, to try if there could be found any Sea upon the North part of America, leading to the wealthy coast of Cathaia, whereby in one commerce might be joyned the riches of both the East & West parts of the world, in which voyage was employed Martyn Forbisher, who set sail from Harwich the eighteenth of June, and the ninth of August, entered into that Bay, or Sea, but could pass no further for Snow and Ice. The like expedition was taken in hand, two years after with no better success.

About this time dyed the Emperour Maximilian, a Prince that deserved well of Queen Elizabeth, and the English, who thereupon sent Sir Philip Sidney to his Son Rodolphus King of the Romans to condole his Fathers death, and congratulate his succession: as likewise to do the like, for the decease of the Count Elector Palatine, named Frederick the third, with his surviving Son.

Walter Devereux E. of Essex out of discontentment dieth in Ireland.

And now Walter Devereux Earl of Essex, who out of Leicesters envy, had been recalled out of Ireland, was out of Leicesters fear, (as being threatened by him) sent back again into Ireland, but with the empty title of Earl Marshal of Ireland; with the grief whereof, he fell into a bloody Flux; and in most grievous torments ended his life: When he had first desired the standers by to admonish his Son (scarce ten years old at that time) to have alwaies before his eyes the six and thirtieth year of his age, as the utmost term of his life, which neither himself, nor his Father before him could out-go, and the Son indeed attained not to it, as shall hereafter be declared. He was suspected to be poysoned, but Sir Henry Sidney Deputy of Ireland, after diligent search made, wrote to the Lords of the Council, That the Earl often said, It was familiar to him upon any great discontentment to fall into a Flux, and for his part he had no suspicion of his being poysoned: yet was this suspicion encreased, for that presently after his death, the E. of Leicester with a great sum of Money and large promises, putting away Dowglas Sheffield, by whom he had a Son, openly married Essex his widow. For although it was given out, that he was privately married to her, yet Sir Francis Knolles her Father, who was well acquainted with Leicesters roving loves, would not believe it, unless he himself were present at the marriage, & had it testified by a publick Notary. At this time also dyed Sir Anth. Cook of Gyddy-Hall in Essex, who had been School-master to King Edward the sixth, and was no less School-master to his own Daughters, whom he made skilful in the Greek and Latin Tongues; married all to men of great Honour; one to Sir William Cecill, Lord Treasurer of England; a second to Sir Nicholas Bacon, L. Keeper of the Great Seal; a third to Sir Thomas Hobby, who dyed Ambassador in France; a fourth to Sir Ralph Lowlet; and the fifth to Sir Henry Killigrew.

Sir Anthony Cook dies, and how his learned Daughters were bestowed.

At this time, the Sons of the Earl of Clanriccard, who scarce two months before had obtained pardon for their Rebellion, fell into Rebellion again; but were by the Deputy soon suppressed; and William Drury newly made President of Munster, reduced the whole Province to good Order, except only the County of Kerry, whither a number of Vagabonds were gotten, trusting to the Immunities of the place. For K. Edward the third made Kerry a County Palatine, & granted to the Earls of Desmond all the Royal Liberties which the K. of England had in that County, excepting four Pleas, viz. of Burning, Rape, Forestall, and Treasure Trove. The Governour notwithstanding wisely judging that these Liberties were granted for the better preservation of Justice, & not for maintenance of outrageous malefactors, entered into it, and violently put to flight and vanquished the mischievous Crew, which the E. of Desmond had placed there in ambush. The E. in the mean while made great complaints of Drury to the Deputy; and particularly, of the Tax which they call Ceasse, which is an exacti-on of Provision of Victuals at a certain rate for the Deputies Family; and the Souldiers in Garrison. This Tax not he only, but in Lemster also many Lords refused to pay, alledging that it was not to be exacted but by Parliament; but the matter being examined in England, it appeared by the Records of the Kingdom, That this Tax was anciently imposed; and that by a certain Right of Majesty, a Prerogative Royal, which is not subjected to Laws, yet not contrary to them neither, as the wise Civilians have observed. Yet the Queen commanded to use a moderation in exactions of this nature, saying, She would have her Subjects shorn, but not devoured.

It was now the year 1577, and the twentieth of Queen Elizabeths Reign, when John of Austria, pretending to Queen Elizabeth nothing but Peace, yet is found to deal secretly with the Pope, to deprive her of her Kingdom, and himself to marry the Queen of Scots, and invade England: of wch his practices the Prince of Orange gives Queen Elizabeth the first Intelligence. Whereupon (finding his deep dissembling) she enters into a League with the States, for mutual defence both at Sea and Land, upon certain Conditions; but having concluded it (because she would not have it wrongfully interpreted, as though she meant to foster a Rebellion in the Netherlands) she sent Thomas Wilkes to the King of Spain with these Informations, That she had alwaies endeavoured to keep the Low-Countries in Obedience to the King of Spain; had perswaded (even with threatnings) the Prince of Orange to accept of Peace; but withall, if the King of Spain would have his Subjects obedient to him, she then requests him to restore their Priviledges, and to remove Jo. of Austria from the Government, who not not only was her deadly enemy, but labored by all means to bring the Netherlands into utter servitude. If this be granted by the K. of Spain, she then faithfully promiseth, That if the States perform not their Allegiance to him; as by their Promise to her they are engaged to do, she will utterly forsake them, and bend her self with all her Forces to compel them. While Wilkes in Spain unfoldeth these matters, John of Austria sendeth to Queen Elizabeth, in most grievous manner accusing the States for disobedience, & making a large Declaration of the Causes for which he had taken up Arms again. Thus Qu. Elizabeth (like a fortunate Princess) sate as an Honourable Arbitress between the Spanish, the French, and the States; insomuch that it was not untrue which one wrote, that France and Spain were Ballances in the Scale of Europe; and England the Beam to turn them either way; for they still got the better, to whom she adhered.

An. Reg. 19. A sudden Mortality at the Assizes at Oxford. About this time, when the Judges sate at the Assizes in Oxford, and one Kowland Jenkes a Book-seller was questioned for speaking opprobrious words against the Queen, suddenly they were surprised with a pestilent savour; whether rising from the noysome smell of the prisoners, or from the damp of the ground, is uncertain, but all that were there present, almost every one, within forty hours dyed, except Women and children; and the Contagion went no further. There dyed Robert Bell, Lord chief Baron, Robert D' Oylie, Sir William Babington, D' Oyle Sheriff of Oxfordshire, Harcourt, Weyman, Phetiplace, the most of them men in this Tract; Barham the famous Lawyer; almost all the Jurors, and three hundred other more or less.

The Lord Latimers Family in Issue Male extinct, & how his 4 Daughters were bellowed. This year the title of the Lord Latimer, (which had flourished in the Family of the Nevills, even since the days of King Henry the sixth) was extinct in John Nevill, who dyed without issue male, and left a fair estate to four Daughters, whereof the Eldest married Henry Earl of Northumberland, the second Thomas Cecil, who was afterward Earl of Exeter; the Third Sir William Cornwallis; and the fourth, Sir John Davers.

In Ireland the O-Moors and O-Conors, and others, whose Ancestors the Earl of Suffex in Queen Maries dayes, had for their Rebellion deprived of their Patrimony in Leyse and Ophalie, did now break forth into a new Rebellion, under the Conduct of Rorie Oge; that is, Roderick the younger; set on fire the Village of Naasse, assault Locklins, from whence being driven back by the valour of George Carew the Governour, he was afterward slain.

English Volunteers go into the Low Countries, and do valiantly. Out of England at this time there went into the Low-Countries, John North the Lord Norths Eldest Son, John Norris second Son to the Lord Norris, Henry Cavendish, and Thomas Morgan Colonels, with many Volunteers to learn Military Experience. Thither also come Casimire the Elector Palatines Son, with an Army of German Horse and Foot, at the Queens Charges; upon these Don John, assisted by the Prince of Parma, Mondragon, and other the best Commanders of Spain, confident of Victory, flyeth furiously, before they expected him, yet after a long fight, was forced to retreat; but then turning again, and thinking to break through the Hed-es and Brakes where the English and Scottish Volunteers had placed themselves, was again repulsed; for the English and Scottish were so hot upon the matter, that casting away their garments, by reason of the hot weather, they fought in their shirts, which they made fast about them. In this Battel Norris fought most valiantly, and had three Horses slain under him, as also Steward the Scot, Bingham, and William Markham.

Now for comfort to the afflicted Provinces, there came at that time into the Netherlands, the Count Swarzemberg from the Emperour; Monsieur Bellieure from the French King; and from the Queen of England, the Lord Cobham and Walsingham, with Commission to procure conditions of Peace, but returned without doing any thing, for that Don John refused to admit the Protestant Religion, and the Prince of Orange refused to return into Holland.

About this time Egremond Ratcliffe, Son to Henry E. of Suffex, by his second Wife, who had been a prime man in the Rebellion of the North, and served now under Don John, was accused by the English fugitives, that he was sent underhand to kill Don John; which whether true or false, he was thereupon taken and put to death. The Spaniards had affirmed, That Ratcliffe at his last end confessed voluntarily, That he was freed out of the Tower of London, and moved by Walsinghams large promises to do this Fact; but the English that were present at his death, deny that he confessed any such thing, though the English Rebels did all they could to wrest this confession from him.

At this very time, Don John, in the flower of his Age, died of the Pestilence, or (as some say) of grief, as being neglected by the King of Spain his Brother; a man of an insatiable Ambition, who aimed first at the Kingdom of Tunis, and after of England; and who, without the privity of the French King, or King of Spain, had made a league with the Guises, for the defence of both Crowns.

Alarson although very busie about the Belgick War, yet now began again to pursue the Marriage with Queen Elizabeth; for renewing of which suit, first was Bacherville sent to the Queen, and soon after Ramboulet, from the French King; and within a month after that, Simier, a neat Courtier, and exquisitely learned in the Art of Love, accompanied with a great number of the French Nobility; whom the Queen at Richmond entertained in such loving manner, that Leicester began to rage, as if his hopes were now quite blasted. Certainly, a little before, when Ashley, a Lady of the Queens Bed-chamber, mentioned the E. of Leicester to her for a Husband, she with an angry countenance replied; Dost thou think me so unlike my self, and so forgetful of Majesty, as to prefer my Servant, whom I my self have advanced, before the greatest Princes of the Christian World?

But it is now time to return to the Scottish Affairs. The Earl of Morton, Regent of Scotland, though a man of great wisdom & valor, yet was now so overcome with covetousness, that he grew universally hated; and thereupon with the joynt consent of the Nobility, the administration of the Common-wealth was translated to the King, though he was yet but twelve years old, and twelve

Alarson solicites his suit with the Queen afresh.

The Earl of Morton Regent of Scotland, is removed, and the King though but twelve years old is admitted to govern.

twelve of the chief Lords were appointed to attend him in Council, three of them by course for three months; amongst whom, the Earl of Morton for one, that they might not seem to cast him quite off. The King having taken upon him the Administration, sent presently the Earl of Dumferlin to Queen Elizabeth, acknowledging her great deserts towards him, and requesting to have the Treaty of Edenburgh, agreed on in the year 1559, to be confirmed, for the more happy restraining the Robbers about the borders; and withal that his ancient Patrimony in England, namely, the Lands granted to his Grand-father Matthew, Earl of Lenox, and the Countess his Grand-mother, might be delivered into his hands who was the next Heir. The Queen really promised the former demands, but stuck a little at the last, concerning the Patrimony; For she would not grant, That Arbella, the Daughter of Charles the King of Scots Uncle, born in England, was the next Heir to the Lands in England; neither would she grant the Ambassadors proof out of History, That the King of Scots, born in Scotland, did antiently (without question) hold the Earldom of Huntington by Right of Inheritance. Yet she commanded a Sequestration to be made of the Revenues of those Lands, by Burleigh Master of the Wards; and willeth the King, That out of the goods of the Earl of Lenox in Scotland, satisfaction might be made to his Grand-mothers Creditors here. For she took it in ill part, that the King had recalled the Enfeoffment of the Earldom of Lenox (made to his Uncle Charles and his Heirs) after the death of Charles, to the prejudice (as was suggested to her) of Arbella; although indeed it be a Privilege of the Kings of Scotland, That they may recal Donations made in their minority.

The Earl of Morton in the mean while, not enduring the disgrace to be outed of his Regency, regarded not the Prescript form of Government lately set down, but drew the Administration of all matters to himself, and kept the King in his own power at the Castle of Sterling, admitting none to his presence, but whom he pleased. At this presumption the Lords growing angry, made the E. of Arbol their Capt. & in the Kings Name levied a great Army, and were ready to encounter Morton; but by the Intercession of Robert Bowes, the English Ambassadour, they were stayed from fighting; and Morton presently betook himself home; and the Earl of Arbol soon after dyed, not without suspicion of being poysoned.

At this time the King of Spain, and Pope Gregory the Thirteenth held secret Consultation, to invade at once both England and Ireland, and to work the absolute ruine of Queen Elizabeth; The Pope to gain the Kingdom of Ireland for his Son James Buon of Campagno, whom he had made Marquess of Vincola; The King of Spain secretly to relieve the Irish Rebels, as Queen Elizabeth did the Dutch, while Friendship in Words was upheld on both sides: and it being known, that the greatest strength of England consisted in the Navy Royal, and Merchants Ships, it was advised, that the Italian and Dutch Merchants should hire these Ships for long Voyages; to the end, that while they were absent, the Queens Navy might be surprized with a greater Fleet: and at that time Thomas Stukeley, an English Fugitive, should joyn himself to the Irish Rebels with new Forces. For he making great boast, and promising the Kingdom of Ireland to the Popes Bastard Son, had so insinuated himself into grace with the ambitious old man, that he adorned him with the Titles of Marquess of Lemster, Earl of Wexford and Caterlogh, Viscount Morogh, and Baron of Rosse, (the principal Dignities of Ireland) and made him Commander over Eight hundred Italian Souldiers, to be employ'd in the Irish war. With which Forces Stukeley setting sail from Civita Vecchia, arrived at length in Portugal, where he and his Forces were by the Divine Providence diverted another way. For Sebastian King of Portugal (to whom the chief Command in this Expedition against Engl. was assigned) being first to dispatch a War in Africa, in aid of Mahomet Abdall, Son to the King of Fesse, perswaded Stukely to go along with him into Mauritania, together with his Italian Souldiers, and then afterwards they would go together against Ireland. To this motion Stukely soon agreed, and therein agreed with his destiny; for in that memorable Battel where three Kings were slain, both he and Sebastian lost their lives.

At this time Sir Henry Sidney (who had been Deputy of Ireland at several times eleven years) delivered up his Deputyship to Sir William Drury, President of Munster; Such a Deputy, for good Government, that if any have equalled him, none have exceeded him.

It was now the year 1579, and the two and twentieth year of Queen Elizabeths Reign, when John Casimire, Son of Frederick the third, Count Palatine of the Rhyne, came into England; where after he had been entertained with Tiltings & Jests, made Knight of the Garter (the Queen tying the Garter about his leg) and rewarded with a yearly Pension, he returned. And now was Alexander Farnese, Prince of Parma, made Governour of the Netherlands by the King of Spain, and Queen Elizabeth supplies the States with a great sum of mony, for which William Davison brought into England the ancient pretious Habilliments of the Family of Burgundy, and their Costly Vessels, laid to pawn by Matthew of Austria, and the States.

Simier in the mean time here in England ceaseth not by all amorous devices to perswade the Queen to marry Alanson; wherein he drew her so far, that the Earl of Leicester gave out, he crept into the Queens affection by Love-Potions and unlawful Arts: and Simier on the other side endeavoured by all means to cast down Leicester, discovering his marriage with the Earl of Essex his Widow: whereat the Queen grew so angry, that she confined him to the Castle at Greenwich, & meant to have him committed to the Tower, but that the Earl of Suffex (though his greatest Adversary) dissuaded her: telling her, That none ought to be molested for contracting lawful Matrimony. But Leicester notwithstanding was so provoked for his Confining, that he was bent to revenge it; and if it be true, as some said, he had suborned one Tinder a Yeoman of the Guard to murder Simier. Sure it is, the Queen by Proclamation commanded, That no person should offer injury to the Ambassadour or any of his Servants. At which time it fell out, that as the Queen,

Thomas Stukeley is by the Pope honoured with the greatest dignities, and sent into Ireland. But diverted by the K. of Portugal, is slain in Africa.

Alexander Farnese Prince of Parma is made Governour of the Netherlands.

Queen, together with Simier, the Earl of Lincoln, and Hatton Vice-Chamberlain, were rowed in a Barge to Greenwich, a young man shooting off a Harquebus out of a Boat, shot one of the Rowers in the Queens Barge through the Arm with a Bullet, who was presently taken and led to the Gallows; but upon solemn Protestation that he did it unwillingly, and out of no malicious intent, he was let go and pardoned. Some would have perswaded the Queen, that he was purposely suborn'd to shoot either her or the French Ambassador: but she was so far from suspecting her Subjects, that she would often say, She would not believe any thing against them, which a mother would not believe against her Children.

Alanson comes privately into England, and hath secret Conference with the Queen. Burleigh and others are enjoined to consult the Marriage Covenants

After a few daies Alanson himself came privately into England with only one or two attendants, and came to the Queen at Greenwich at a time when she thought not of it; they had secret conference together, all parties being sent away: after which, being seen of very few, he returned home; but within a month or two after the Queen enjoined the Lord Burleigh Treasurer, the Earl of Suffex, Leicester, Hatton and Walsingham, seriously to weigh both the dangers, and the Commodities likely to arise from the marriage with him, and to consult with Simier concerning the marriage Covenants.

The Title of Lord D' Aubigny, from whence it came.

As in England there was some fear of this French-man; so in Scotland at this time of another French-man, called Esme Steward, Lord of Aubigny, who came now into Scotland to visit the King his Cousin. He was the Son of John Steward Brother to Matthew Steward E. of Lenox the Kings Grand-father, and had denomination from Aubigny in France, which Title Charles the Seventh King of France had antiently conferred upon John Steward of the Family of Lenox, who being Constable of the Scottish Army in France, vanquished the English in one Battle, & was slain by them in another: and from that time the Title belonged to the younger descent of that House. This Esme Steward, the King embraced with exceeding great love, made him Lord Chamberlain of Scotland, and Captain of the Castle of Dumbarton, and created him first Earl and then Duke of Lenox. The fear from this man was, Because he was devoted to the Guises and the Popish Religion; and that which increased the fear from this man, because he applied himself to Morrison Adversaries: and mediated to have Thomas Carre Lord of Fernishurst called home, who of all men was most addicted to the Queen of Scots.

Esme Steward made first Duke of Lenox.

The Turkey Merchants when set up.

About this time Queen Elizabeth, at the request of William Harbouzne an English-man, procured a Grant from the Turkish Emperour, for the English Merchants to exercise free Traffick in all places of his Dominions, as well as Venetians, Polanders, and other neighbouring Nations; whereupon they set up first the Company of Turkey Merchants; managing a most gainful Trade at Constantinople, Alexandria, Egypt, Aleppo, Cyprus, and other parts of Asia, bringing home Spices, Perfumes, unwrought Silks, Tapestry, Indico, Currants, and the like.

This year died Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal; but who by vertue of an Act of Parliament, alwaies exercised the Jurisdiction of Lord Chancellor: a very fat man, but singularly wise, and a chief prop of the Queens Privy Council: In whose place succeeded Sir Thomas Bromely the Queens Solicitor, with the Title of Lord Chancellor of England.

In Ireland at this time, in the Province of Munster, James Fitz-Morris kindled a new fire of Rebellion; for after his former submission upon his knees, vowing all obedience to the Qu. he stole away into France, and promised the French King if he would lend him assistance, to make him King of Ireland. But being by him slighted he went into Spain, and made the like offer to the King there. The King of Spain sent him to the Pope, from whom by means of Nicholas Sanders, an English Priest, and Alan an Irish man, (both Doctors in Divinity) he obtained a little money, a Legates Authority for Sanders, a consecrated Banner, and Letters of Commendation to the Catholick King. And returning from Spain with those Divines, three Ships, & a few men, he landed at Smerwick Kerry, a demy Island in the West-part of Ireland, about the first day of July, where (the place being first of all consecrated by the Priests) he built a Fort, and brought the ships close under it, but these were presently set upon and carried away by Thomas Courtney, and thereby the Spaniards deprived of their opportunity of coming thither by Sea. But now John and James, brothers to the Earl of Desmond, gathering together a small number of Irish, joyn themselves presently with their Kinsman Fitz-Morris. Yet the Spaniards seeing that but a very few Irish, and those unarmed, came unto them, began to distrust the state they were in, and to cry out, That they were undone; whom Fitz-Morris heartned the best he could, telling them that Supplies were presently to come. And going himself to get more company, he passed through the Land of his Cousin William a Burgh, who though he had been a Rebel before, yet was now grown Loyal, so as there fell out a Skirmish between them; in which Fitz-Morris being stricken through with a Pike, and shot into the head with a Leaden bullet, died in the place, and most of his Company with him; but withal, two of William Burghs Sons were in that skirmish slain also; when the Queen to comfort him for the loss of his Sons, adorned him with the Dignity of Baron of Castle Conell; and rewarded him with a yearly Pension besides: which Favour so overwhelm'd him with joy, that he lived but a short while after. And now Sir William Drury the Deputy growing very sick, appointed Sir Nicholas Malby, then Governour of Connaught, to be President of Munster, and General of the Army; at which time the Earl of Desmond, who had all this while made a shew of Loyalty, breaks openly out into Rebellion; when now Drury the Deputy dying at Waterford, by his death Malbyes Authority ceasing, Sir William Pelham is by the Council chosen Justice of Ireland, with the Authority of Vice-Roy, until such time as a Deputy were appointed, and the Earl of Ormond is made President of Munster. Pelham goeth into Munster, and sendeth for the Earl of Desmond, who refusing to come is thereupon proclaimed Traytor, and an enemy to the State; and this being published, the Justice committed the following the War to the Earl of Ormond, who slaying most of the Spaniards and adherents rents to Desmond, compelleth him to send his wife to the Justice, to beg his pardon.

The Lord Gray is made Deputy of Ireland.

The Lord Justice Pelham now certified, That Arthur Lord Gray was landed with authority to be Deputy of Ireland, at Munster delivereth the Army to Geor. Bourchier the Son of John, second Earl of Bath of that name, and himself returneth to Dublin, to deliver up the Province to his Successor. The Lord Gray at his landing, before he received the Sword, hearing where the Rebels had their Rendezvous, marched towards them, who presently betake themselves to Grandilough, a grassy Valley, and beset thick with trees, where they who dwell near, scarce know the winding out; yet the Deputy (taking one Cosby an old man, well acquainted with the place, to be his leader) entred into it, where he lost divers of his men, namely, Peter Carew the younger, George Moore, Andely, and Cosby himself, that was his Leader.

San Joseph an Italian with seven hundred Souldiers landeth in Ireland.

A short time after, there landed at Smerwick in Kerry, under the command of San Joseph an Italian, about seven hundred Italian Souldiers, who fortified the place, and named it Fort del Or. Whereupon the Deputy sent a Trumpeter to the Fort to demand who they were, what they had to do in Ireland, and who sent them; withal commanding them to depart immediately. But they replied, That some of them were sent from his Holiness, others from the Catholick King, upon whom the Pope had bestowed the Kingdom of Ireland, for that Queen Elizabeth (by reason of Herelie) hath forfeited the Right due unto her; and therefore what they had gotten, they would maintain. Upon this the Deputy prepares for battery, lets fly his Ordnance four days together; in which time the Spaniards once or twice make Sallies out, to their own loss much, but not an English man slain, but only John Cheek, a courageous young Gentleman, Son to Sir John Cheek, a learned Knight. And now San Joseph, who commanded the Fort, a white-liver'd Souldier, terrified with the continual Battery, and having no hope of relief, either from the King of Spain or Desmond (contrary to the will of all his Souldiers) set up a white Flag, and desired Parlee; but Parlee was denied, because he had combined with Rebels, with whom it is not lawful to hold Parlee. Then he demanded that his Company might pass away with their Baggage, but neither would this be granted. Then he required that some of the chieffer sort might have leave to depart; but neither could this be obtained. At last when they could prevail in nothing, they hanged out the White Flag again, and submitted themselves absolutely, without any condition, to the Deputies mercy, who presently consulted how to deal with them; and this was the Case; Their number was well near as great as the English; there was present fear of danger from the Rebels; and the English were so destitute of meat and apparel, that they were ready to mutiny, unless they might have the spoil granted them; and besides, there were no ships to send them away if they were spared: For these Reasons it was concluded, the Deputy gainfaying, and letting tears fall, That only the Leaders should be saved, the rest slain, and all the Irish hanged up; which was presently put in execution, to the great disliking of the Queen, who detested the slaughter of such as yield themselves, and would not accept of any excuses or allegations.

No Parlee to be allowed to Rebels.

San Joseph yields himself to the Deputy without condition.

His men are all slain, and why.

And yet more cruelty than this was at that time committed in the Netherlands; for John Norris, and Oliver Temple English Commanders, together with some Companies of Dutch, setting out early one morning, took Mechlyn a wealthy Town of Brabant, at an assault with Ladders; where they promiscuously murdered both Citizens and Religious persons, offering violence even upon the dead, taking away grave-stones, which were sent into England to be sold.

About this time certain English Priests, who were fled into the Netherlands, in the year 1568, by the procurement of William Allen an Oxford Scholar, joyned themselves to study at Doway, where they entred into a Collegiat Form of Government; to whom the Pope allowed a yearly Pension. But Tumults arising in the Low Countries, and the English Fugitives being commanded by the King of *Spain*s Deputy to depart from thence, other the like Colledges, for the training up of the English Youth, were erected; one at Rheims by the Guises, and another at Rome by Pope Gregory the Thirteenth, which alwaies afforded new supplies of Priests for England, when the old fail'd, who should spread abroad the seeds of the Romish Religion here amongst us; from whence those Colleges had the name of Seminaries, and they called Seminary Priests who were trained up in them. In these Seminaries, amongst other Disputations, it was concluded, That the Pope hath such fulness of Power, by Divine Right, over the whole Christian World, both in Ecclesiastical and Secular matters, that by vertue thereof it is lawful for him to excommunicate Kings, absolve their Subjects from their Oath of Allegiance, and deprive them of their Kingdoms. From these Seminaries at this time, there came two into England, Robert Parsons, and Edmund Campian, both of them English-men, and Jesuits. Parsons was born in Somersetshire, a fierce and rough conditioned fellow: Campian was a Londoner, of a milder disposition. They had been both brought up in Oxford; Campian a Fellow of St. Johns College, & had been Professor in the year 1569. and when he was made Deacon, counterfeited himself to be a Protestant, till such time as he slipped out of England. Parsons was of Bayliol Colledge, where he made open profession of the Protestant Religion, till for dishonest carriage, he was expelled the House, and then fled to the Popish Party. Both these came privily into England, in the disguise onewhile of Souldiers, another while of Noble-men; sometimes like English Ministers, and sometime in the habit of Apparators. Parsons who was made the Superiour, brake forth in such open words amongst the Papists, about deposing the Queen, that some of themselves had a purpose to complain of them to the Magistrates. Campian, though something more moderate, yet in a writing provoked the Engl. Ministers to a dispute; and published in Latine an elegant Book of his Ten Reasons, in maintenance of the Doctrine of the Romish Church; as Parsons in like manner, set forth another violent Pamphlet against Clark, who had written modestly against Campians Provocation.

What Colledges were called Seminaries, and why.

Parsons & Campian Jesuits come into England in disguise, & of their education.

vocation. But Doctor Whitaker foundly confuted Champion, who being after a year apprehended, and put upon the Rack, was afterward brought out to a disputation; where he scarcely made good the great fame that went of him.

Captain Drake's return from his Voyage about the World.

His Parentage and education.

The Passages of his Voyage.

Doughty beheaded by Drake.

In this year was the return of Captain Drake from his incredible Voyage round about the World (which Magellan had before attempted, but dyed in the Voyage) whereof to relate all particular Accidents, would require a large Volume: It may suffice in this place, to deliver some special passages. He was born of mean Parentage in Devonshire, yet had a great man (Francis Russel, after Earl of Bedford) to be his God-father. His Father, in King Henry the Eighth's time, being persecuted for a Protestant, chang'd his Soyl, and lived close in Kent. King Henry being dead, he got a place among the Mariners of the Queens Navy, to read Prayers, and afterward bound his Son Francis to a Ship-master, who in a Ship which went to and fro upon the Coast with Commodities, one while to Zealand, another while to France, training him up to pains and skill at Sea, took such a liking to him, that afterwards dying, he bequeathed his Barque to him by his Will: This Barque Drake sold, & then in the year 1567, went with Sir John Hawkins into America; in wch Voyage he unfortunately lost all he had. Five years after having gotten again a good sum of money, by Trading and Piracy, (wch the Preacher of his ship told him was lawful) he bought a Ship of War, and two small Vessels, with which he set sail again for America, where his first Prize was great store of Gold & Silver, carried over the Mountains upon Mules; whereof the Gold he brought to his Ships, but left the Silver, hiding it under ground: after this he fired a great place of Traffick, called, The Cross, at the River Chiruge; when roaming to & fro upon the Mountains, he espied the South Sea; where falling upon his knees, he craved assistance of Almighty God, to find out that passage, which he reserveth for another Voyage; and for the present, having gotten much riches, he return'd home. Afterwards in the year 1577, the thirteenth day of November, with five Ships, & Seamen to the number of 163, he set sail from Plymouth, for the Southern Sea; and within five and twenty daies came to Cantyne, a Cape in Barbary, and then sailed along the Isle of Fago which sends forth flames of Sulphur; and being now under the Line, he let every one in his Ship blood. The sixteenth of April, entring into the mouth of the Plate, they espied a world of Sealves; in which place John Doughty, the next to Drake in Authority, was called in question for railing Sedition in the Navy, who being found guilty, was beheaded. Some report, That Drake had charge given him from the Earl of Leicester, to make away Doughty upon some pretence or other, for that he had said, That the E. of Essex was craftily made away by Leicester. The twentieth of August, two of his Ships he turneth off, & with the other three came to the Sea which they call the Strait of Magellan. The sixth of September, entring into the wide Southern Ocean, which they call, The Pacifique Sea, he found it out of measure troublous, so that his Ships were here by Tempests disperfed; in one of which

John Winter was Master, who returned back into England; Drake himself with only one Ship, coasted along the shore, till he came to the Isle Moucha, from whence loosing, he lighted upon a fellow fishing in a little Boat, who shewed him where a Spanish ship laden with Treasure lay; Drake making towards it, the Spaniards thought him to be their own Countryman, and thereupon invited him to come on; but he getting aboard, presently shut the Spaniards (being not above eight persons) under hatches, and took the Ship, in which was four hundred pound weight of Gold. At Taurapsa, going again to shore, he found a Spaniard sleeping by the Sea-side, who had lying by him twenty bars of massie Silver, to the value of four thousand Ducats, which he bid his followers take amongst them, the Spaniard still sleeping. After this going into the port of Africa, he found there three Vessels without any Mariners in them; wherein besides other wares, were seven & fifty silver bricks, each of wch weighed twenty pound: From whence tiding it to Lime, he found twelve ships in one Road, and in them great store of Silks, and a Chest full of money coined, but not so much as a Ship-boy aboard; (such security there was in that Coast:) Then putting to Sea with those Ships, he followed the rich Ship called the Cacofogo; & by the way met with a small Ship without Ordnance or other Arms, out of which he took fourscore pound weight of Gold, a golden Crucifix, and some Emeraulds of a fingers length. The first day of March, he overtook the Cacofogo, set upon her and took her; and in her besides Jewels, fourscore pound weight of Gold; thirteen Chests of Silver ready coyned, and as much Silver as would ballast a Ship. And now thinking he had gained wealth enough, he resolved to return home; and so on the 3 of Nov. 1580. he landed at Plymouth, having sailed round about the World; in the space of three years; to the great admiration of all that know what Camps the World is of.

The Queen welcomed him home, but made a sequestration of the Goods, that they might be ready if the King of Spain required them; and commanded the Ship to be drawn on shore near Debitford for a Monument (where the Carcass of it is yet to be seen) and her self feasted in it; at which time she Knighted Captain Drake. But Bernardine Mendoza, the King of Spain's Ambassadour in England, began to rage; and earnestly demanded Restitution of the Goods, and complained, that the English sailed upon the Indian Sea. To whom it was answered, That the Goods were sequestred, and ready to make the King of Spain satisfaction, although the Queen had expended against the Rebels, whom the Spaniard had excited in England and Ireland, more Money than that which Drake brought home. And as for sailing on the Indian Sea, That it was as lawful for the Queens Subjects as his, seeing the Sea and the Air are common for all to use. Notwithstanding, to Pedro Sebura, the King of Spain's Agent in this business, a great sum of Money was repaid; which was not restored to them to whom it belonged, but employed to the Spaniards wars in the Low-Countries, as was known after, when it was too late.

But

But at this time, when Jackman and Pett, two skilful Pilots were sent forth with two ships by the Londoners, to find out a shorter cut to the East-Indies, by the North-West passage, they had not the like success; for a few Leagues beyond the Iles of Vaygato, they met with such uncertain Tydes, so many Shallows, and such Mountains of Ice, that they could go no farther, and had much ado to return home.

Henry Fitz Alan Earl of Arundel dies, in whom ended the Sirname of that Noble Family. The possession of Arundel Castle gives the Title of that Honour.

About this time, Henry Fitz Alan, Earl of Arundel died, in whom the Sir-name of a most Noble Family ended, which had flourished in this Honour for above three hundred years, from Richard Fitz-Alan; who being descended from the *D'Albeney*s (antient Earls of Arundel & Sussex, in the Reign of King Edward the first) obtained the Title of Earl, by reason of the possession of Arundel Castle, without Creation. He had three Children by his Wife Katharine, Daughter to Thomas Gray, Marquess of Dorset, all whom he out-lived; Henry a young man of great hope, who died at Brussels; Joan, wife to the Lord Lumley; and Mary, who being married to Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, brought forth Philip, in her right, Earl of Arundel.

In Ireland, Arthur Lord Gray the Deputy going against the O-Conors, who raised stirrs in Ophalie, putteth to death Hugh O Moley, quieteth all that Quarter, even the Families of the Mogobigans and O Charles, and in the very beginning suppresseth a Conspiracy which was breaking forth, by putting to death the Lord Nogent; who being confident in his own innocency, when the Deputy promised to save his life, if he would but confess himself guilty, chose rather to die & be held guiltless, than to live in infamy, by betraying his own innocency. With whose death the Queen was extremely displeased, as by which she was made a Patroness of Cruelty to her great dishonor. But the Deputy knew with what kind of people he dealt, and by this example of Severity, brought Turlough Leynigh to accept conditions of Peace, and the O Brians and Cavenaghs (rebellious Families in Leinster) humbly to crave leave also, and to offer Hostages.

The Earl of Morton is beheaded as accessory to the murder of the Kings Father.

General Norris raised the siege at Stenwick. But is afterward vanquished, wounded, and a great number of his men slain.

In Scotland, at this time great jealousy was had of Lenox, L. of Aubigny, left being in so great favour with the King, he should allure him to marry into France, and bring into Scotland the Popish Religion. Whereupon (although he purged himself by Letters to Queen Elizabeth, and proffered himself to be a Protestant) yet many courses were taken to sequester him from the King, but so far from taking effect, that on the contrary, the Earl of Morton (who among all other was most addicted to the English) was soon after accused of Treason by the Earl of Arran, and cast into Prison; and not long after (notwithstanding all the means the Queen could use to save him) was beheaded, as convicted to be accessory to the murder of the Kings Father. Whereupon the Earl of Angus, and others who labored for Morton, fled straightwayes into England.

In the Low-Countries about this time, the Count Rheinberg proceeded victoriously for the King of Spain, and beleaguer'd Stenwick in Freezland; against whom the States sent Norris General of the Field, who put the Rheinbergs Company to the worst, and raised the Sieges but afterward joyning Battle with Verdugo the Spaniard at Northbone, even when the Victory was almost gotten (Roger Williams having put the Enemies to flight) the fortune of the war turn'd, Norris is vanquished, wounded, and a great number of his men slain; amongst whom were Cotton, Fitz-Williams and Bishop, stout Commanders. Here it must not be omitted, That the English (who of all the dwellers in the Northern parts of the World, were hitherto the least Drinkers, and deserved praise for their Sobriety) in these Dutch wars learned to be Drunkards; & brought the Vice so far to overspread the Kingdom, that Laws were said to be enacted for repressing it.

But now whilst the States and the King of Spain contend about a few Towns in the Low-Countries, he seizeth upon the whole Kingdom of Portugal. For the last year Henry King of Portugal dying, many Competitors challenge the Kingdom; as the Duke of Savoy, the Prince of Parma's Son, Katharine Bracant, and the Queen of France. But Philip King of Spain, the Son of Henries eldest Sister, putting the Case to his Divines and Lawyers, and adjuring them to pronounce to whom of right it belonged, they pronounced for him; whereupon he sent Duke D'Alva, who put to flight Antonio, whom the people had elected King, and within seventy dayes subdued all Portugal. The Queen of France angry hereat, and enviously beholding the King of Spain's Dominions thus enlarged (being now Master of Portugal, the East-Indies, and many Islands besides) adviseth amongst other Princes, Queen Elizabeth, to bethink themselves in time of restraining his so excessive Dominions: whereupon the Queen received Don Antonio, and lovingly relieved him, which she thought might be done without any breach of the League with Spain, seeing Don Antonio was descended of English blood, and of the House of Lancaster, and that no Caution was in the League, That the Portuguez should not be admitted into England.

And now the Queen-Mother of France, and the King her Son, more eagerly then ever, pursue the Match with Alanson now Duke of Anjou, for the transacting whereof, they sent in Ambassage into England, Francis Bourbon, Prince of Dauphine, Arthur Cofferer Marshal of France, and many other honourable Personages, who were entertained with great respect (a House being purposely built at Westminster for that use, royally furnished;) Tilting and Jests proclaimed, by Philip Earl of Arundel, Frederick, Baron of Windsor, Sir Philip Sidney, and Sir Fulk Grevil, against all Coners. The Delegates that were to confer with the French concerning the marriage, were Sir William Cecil, Lord Treasurer, Edward Earl of Lincoln Lord Admiral, Robert Dudley Earl of Leicester, Sir Christopher Hatton, and Sir Francis Walsingham Secretary; By whom Covenants of Marriage were at length agreed on; First, That the Duke of Anjou, and the Queen of England, within six weeks after the ratification of the Articles, should contract Matrimony, and the rest, most of them such as were before agreed on in the Marriage between Queen Mary and King Philip, chiefly consisting in conferring Honour upon the Duke, but Power upon the Queen. It was also agreed, That all particulars should be ratified within two Months, by the faithful Promise and Oath of the French King,

The Match with Alanson, now Duke of Anjou is pursued afresh.

And Articles of the Marriage are agreed on.

But the K. of France disclaimeth the Articles.

King, for him and his Heirs, and a Reservation was also added apart, with the Hands and Seals of every one of the Delegats, That Queen Elizabeth is not bound to finish the Marriage, until she and the Duke have given each other satisfaction in some particulars, and have certified the French King of the same within six weeks. Before those six weeks were expired, Simier, Secretary to the Council, is sent into France, to require the King of France his Confirmation: The King will not hear him, but presseth to have the Marriage accomplished, as it was contracted, & that nothing else was to be done. Simier on the other side sheweth by the Articles, that a League offensive and defensive must first be concluded. This the French King disclaimeth: Whereupon Walsingham is presently sent to compose this difference, who joyntly with Henry Cobham, the Ambassadour in ordinary, and Simier, alledged to the French King these Particulars, That Queen Elizabeth for no other Reason was willing to marry, but for the satisfaction of her people; and seeing many Impediments were come in the way since the first Treaty, namely the Civil War in France, and the Dukes engagements in a War with Spain, which makes the wisest of her Subjects now to be against the Match; This hath made her to defer the accomplishment of it, although her affection be still constant toward the Duke. For this cause the Queen would have no further Treaty to be held, till the French Duke be freed from the Spanish War, & a League of mutual offence and defence be agreed on. The French King willingly accepted of the League defensive, but of the offensive he would hear no speech, till the marriage were finished.

The D. of Anjou comes himself into England. And in a private Conference with the Queen she draws a Ring from off her finger and puts it upon his. The English Lords and Ladies imagining the Marriage to be confirmed, fret exceedingly. The next day she calleth the French D. to her, and after a long discourse, made him exclaim on the inconstancy of Women

Not long after, the French Duke himself came into England, having with good success raised the Siege of Cambray: he was here received with as great humanity as he could wish, and nothing omitted whereby he might judge himself to be truly welcome: Infomuch that in November, when the Anniversary of the Queens Inauguration came to be solemnized, the Queen (while they were in Love-conference) drew a Ring off from her finger, and put it upon his, upon some private conditions. The standers by imagined, that by this Ceremony the Marriage was confirmed between them; and Aldegond Governour of Antwerp being there, presently dispatched messengers into the Low-Countries, to give notice of it; and thereupon Bonfires were made, and all shews of rejoycing. But the Earl of Leicester (who privately plotted to cross the Match) Hutton the Vice-Chamberlain, and Secretary Walsingham, fret and are enraged, as if the Kingdom, the Queen and Religion, were now utterly overthrown. The Maids of Honour, and Ladies that were familiar with the Queen, made grievous lamentation, and so terrified and daunted her, that she could take no rest that night. The next day, she called to her the French Duke, and causing all company to go aside, they privately entertain a long discourse. At length the Duke returning to his lodging cast the Ring away from him, and after a while takes it up again, terribly exclaiming against the levity and inconstancy of Women.

The Queen at this time was much troubled at a book lately put forth, with this Title The Gulph wherein England will be swallowed, by the French Marriage: whereof conceiving that some Puritan was the Author, it made her highly displeased with the Puritans: Whereupon, within a few dayes John Stubbs of Lincolns-Inne, a Zealous Professor, and the Author of this Book, (whose Sister, Thomas Cartwright the father of the Puritans had married) William Page that dispersed the Copies, and Singleton the Printer were apprehended, against whom Sentence was pronounced, That their Right hand should be cut off, by vertue of a Law made in the Reign of Philip & Mary against the Authors & Dispersers of seditious Writings, (though the chief Lawyers and Judges of the Kingdom could not agree concerning the force of that Statute.) Hereupon Stubbs and Page were brought to the Scaffold, made of purpose; in the Market-place at Westminster, and their right hands with a Butchers knife & a mallet cut off by the wrist; the Printer was pardoned. At that time Stubbs when his right hand was cut off, uncovered his head with the left, and cried out God save the Queen, to the great amazement of all the Beholders.

Stubbs & Page have their right Hands cut off for writing a seditious Book against the Marriage.

At this time the Queen, upon importunate suit of her Council, gave way, that Edmund Campian, Ralph Sherwin, and Alexander Bryant, Priests, should be called to the Bar, who being accused by vertue of a Law made in the five and twentieth year of K. Edward the third, to have plotted the ruine of the Queen and Kingdom; to be adhering to the Pope, the Queens Enemy, and coming into England to raise Forces against the State, were then condemned of High-Treason, and accordingly executed. Campian after he was convicted, being demanded; First, whether Queen Elizabeth were a lawful Queen? would make no answer; afterward whether he would stand for the Queen, or the Pope, if he should send an Army against the Queen; he plainly professed, that he would be of the Popes side, and witnessed so much under his hand. After this some other Papists upon the like occasion were also put to Death, which the Queen rather necessarily, than willingly assented to, as being unwilling to force the Conscience of any. These, and the like exorbitances of Papists were cause that new and strict Laws were enacted, against them the Parliament following, which began the next January.

Campian, Sherwin & Bryant Priests are executed.

The French Duke after three months abode in England, took his Journey in February into the Low-Countries, whom the Qu. her self brought on his way as far as Canterbury; and then commanded the Earl of Leicester, the Lords Charles Howard, Hunsdon, Willoughby Windsor, Sheffield, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir Fr. Russel, Sir Gorge Bourchier, and some other prime Knights to accompany him to Antwerp, where he is made Duke of Brabant, Limbourg and Lorrain; for the Dutch had long before removed the King of Spains Government, and quitted the people from their Oath of Allegiance, that it might be in their own power to choose any other Prince. Here the Duke of Anjou gave free leave to exercise the Roman Religion, to as many as would swear Fealty to him, & abjure the King of Spains authority: but after all, having sent a great mass of money, with which he was supplied from England, and observing that only vain and empty titles were conferred upon him, while the States held all the Dominion in their own hands, he rashly enterprized an assault upon Antwerp, and some other Towns, and shortly departed without any great matter performed.

The D. of Anjou goes out of England, whom the Queen brought on his way as far as Canterbury.

Sir Peregrine Bertey made Lord Willoughby of Eresby.

At this time Queen Elizabeth, as well to get her some friends, as she had procured herself many enemies; received into the Order of the Garter, Frederick the second King of Denmark; to whom she employed Sir Peregrine Bertey (whom she had lately made Lord Willoughby of Eresby) to invest him.

The Earl Gowry and other Lords take the King, and keep him a Prisoner.

But now to prevent the Duke of Guyse design in Scotland, which was to make use of the Duke of Lenox favour with the King, to withdraw his affection from the English: William Reuthen, whom the King had lately made Earl of Gowry, endeavoured with others, by all means to remove Lenox and the Earl of Arran from the King; and so, while Lenox was gone from Perth, (where the King at this time was) to Edinburgh, and Arran was also absent on a journey; the Earls Gowry, Marre, Lindsey and others, taking the opportunity, invited the King to the Castle of Ruthen, and there detained him, not permitting him to walk abroad: all his trusty Servants they removed from about him; Arran they cast in Prison, enforced the King to call home the Earl of Angus, and to send away Lenox into France, who being a man of a soft and gentle disposition, for the Kings safety readily consented; and not content with all this, they compelled the King by his Letters to Qu. Elizabeth to approve and allow of this his thralldom. The Queen of Scots in the mean while, bewailing her own hard fortune, and the distress of the King her Son, laith open the same in a large Letter, written to the Qu. in French: With which Letter Queen Elizabeth being somewhat affected, sent unto her Robert Beal Clark of the Council, to expostulate with her concerning the querulous writing, and joyntly with the Earl of Shrewsbury, to treat of the setting her at liberty. And indeed serious consultations were held at the Council Table about it, and the most were of opinion that upon certain conditions she should have her liberty; but the Scottish of the English faction opposing it, nothing was effected.

The King of Scots frees himself from those that had surprized him.

Soon after this, the King sent Colonel William Steward and John Colvill to Queen Elizabeth, proffering all manner of respect and observance, & requesting her advice for quieting the tumults in Scotland, and also for his contracting of marriage. At which time, news was brought, that the Duke of Lenox was dead in France, who departing this life at Paris, & even at the very point of death, as oftentimes before, made open profession of the Protestant Religion; thereby confuting those who had maliciously traduced him for a Papist. After whose death, when the surprisers of the K. were lift up in their own conceits, as thinking they had him safe enough; He on a sudden (though scarce eighteen years of age) with some few others, conveyed himself to the Castle of S. Andrews, to whom the Nobility presently repaired, bringing Armed Bands with them, as fearing some danger might befall him. Afterwards, in fair words he advised some of his surprizers to go from the Court, for avoiding of tumult, and promising them pardon, if they would crave it. But Gowry only asked pardon, and submitted himself, using this distinction, That he had not offended in matter, but in form only; & then the King sent for the Earl of Arran to the Court, and respected him as his intimate friend, imploying him to compose the Differences amongst the Nobility, & to purge the Kingdom and his own Court from civil dissensions.

Whiles he is sedulous in these cares, comes Sir Francis Walsingham from Queen Elizabeth, to advise him not to be led away by evil Counsellors, to the destruction of both Kingdoms. He findeth the King accompanied with the flower of the Nobility, and beholdeth another manner of Majesty than he looked for in Scotland: Having Audience given him, he put the King in mind of what the Queen out of Isocrates, in private Letters had formerly admonished him, That a Prince must be such a lover of Truth, That more credit may be given to his bare word, than to anothers Oath; and in many words advised him, to beware now in his Youth of evil Counsellors, and alwaies to be like himself. The King answered that he was an absolute Prince, and would not that others should appoint him Counsellors whom he liked not; but that he had long since devoted the first-fruits of his amity to the Queen of England his dear Sister, and doth now willingly make proffer of the same. Walsingham now dealt with him further, not to lay to the Queens charge what broyls had lately fallen out in Scotland; sheweth, how beneficial to him, and to both Kingdoms Amity had been hitherto, and would be in time to come also, so it were not neglected; and that the same might the better be confirmed, if the variance between the Nobility were laid asleep, by a Law of Oblivion Enacted in Parliament, & the Peers which now were removed from the Court called back again, religion looked into, & a firm League concluded between both Kingdoms. The King made answer, that he gladly embraced Amity with England, and that he would constantly defend the Religion already established: Afterward he lovingly dismissed Walsingham, though he held him no good friend to him & his Mother; and carefully looking to matters with understanding, even above his years, propos'd & proffered reconciliation to those that had surprized him, if within a limited time they asked pardon; which they were so far from doing, that they entred into new consultations to surprize him again; whereupon they are commanded within a set time to leave the Kingdom, of which number Marre, Glames, Paslet, and some others, betook themselves into Ireland; Boyle, Zester, Weeme, Lochlevin, into the Low-Countries; Dumferlin into France; the Earl of Angus, is confined to his Earldom; Gowry only to his own ruin, stayeth behind after the limited time, hatching new devices.

About this time happened a difference, and thereupon a War between the Emperour of Muscovia and the King of Sweden; when John King of Sweden, doubting himself to be no fit Match for the Emperour, sent a Royal Ambassage to Queen Elizabeth, requesting her to intercede for him to the Emperour; which she did without delay, and by her Ambassador drew the Muscovian to a Peace upon reasonable Conditions. But the Walsingham is sent to the K. of Scots, to advise him to take heed of evil Counsellors: and the Kings Answer.

the Muscovian shortly after dying, and Theodorus his Successor granting free Traffique to Merchants of all Nations that would come thither; the Queen importuned him to admit of none but English Merchants, requiring him to confirm the Priviledges which his Father had granted them: Where to by way of Answer, he commanded Free Trading for all the English, saying, it was not fit that a small Company should exercise a Monopoly, and all others be restrained: But as for Customs, he promised to take less by half of that Company then of any other, because they first opened the way thither.

1583. The next Summer, Albertus Alasco, a Palatine of Poland, of a comely Personage, and great learning, came into England to see the Queen, who was nobly entertained, both by her and the Nobility, as also by the Scholars of Oxford, with learned Orations, and other Recreations: but having tarried here four months, and run into much debt, he secretly withdrew himself and departed. This man I saw my self afterward in Cracow, very bare, though it was reported of him, That he had in a Dowry with a Wife, fifty Castles of great value: but what Mine can bear the charges of Prodigality?

A year fatal to divers great men. This year proved fatal to divers great men; for there died, first Thomas Ratcliff, the third Earl of Suffex of this Family; a man of a great spirit, and great faithfulness to his Countrey. There dyed also Henry Wryothesly Earl of Southampton, one exceedingly devoted to the Romish Religion, and a great Favourer of the Queen of Scots, which cost him Queen Elizabeths displeasure, and imprisonment besides. There died also Sir Humphry Guilbert, who was cast away at Sea, in his return from the North part of America, whither he lately sailed with five Ships, having sold his Patrimony, in hope to plant a Colony there. There dyed also Edmund Grindall Archbishop of Canterbury, being blind through age, a grave, and pious Prelate, who stood highly in the Queens favour for a long time; till he lost it at last, by favouring (as was said) the Puritans Conventicles; but the true cause indeed was, for the disallowing the Marriage of Julio an Italian Physician, with another mans wife, against the Earl of Leicesters pleasure. Grindall dying, John Whitgift succeeded in the See of Canterbury; being translated thither from the See of Worcester.

Somerville and Arden are condemned, and why. At this time, certain Popish Books written against the Queen, and Princes Excommunicate, withdrew divers from their Allegiance, and particularly so intoxicated one Somerville, an English Gentleman, that he went privately to the Court, and breathing out nothing but blood and death against all Protestants, set upon one or two by the way with his drawn Sword: Being apprehended, he stuck not to say, That he would murder the Queen with his own hands. Hereupon he, and upon his intimation, Edward Arden his father-in-law (a man of an ancient House in Warwickshire) Ardens wife, their Daughter, Somerviles wife, and Hall a Priest, were brought to the Bar, and all condemned; Somerville as principal, the rest as accessaries. Three dayes after, Somerville was found strangled in the Prison, Arden was executed and quartered; the women and Priest were spared. Many pitied the old Gentleman Arden, as misled by the Priest, and (as it was generally believed) brought to his end through the envy of Leicester, whom he used to call Whore-master, Up-start, and many such opprobrious names.

In the Netherlands, the English Garrison at Alost in Flanders being neglected, the Governour Pigot, and the other Captains, for want of pay, upon Composition, yielded up the Town to the Spaniard, and then fearing disgrace at home, joyined themselves to the Prince of Parma; at whose hands finding themselves slighted, by degrees they stole all away, and came all to unlucky ends.

In Ireland the famous Rebel Gyralt Fitz Gyralt, the eleventh Earl of Desmond of this Family, having a long time in lurking places escaped the English, was now by a common Souldier found out in a poor Cottage, and slain. His head was sent into England, and set upon London Bridge. This end had this great Lord, descended from Maurice, the Son of Gyralt of Windsor, an English man, famous among those who first set upon Ireland, in the year 1170. He possessed whole Countries, together with the County Palatine of Kerry, and had of his own Name and Race, at least five hundred Gentlemen at his Command: all whom, and his own life also, he lost within the space of three years, very few of the House being left alive. And this disaster he fell into, by proving Traiterous to his Prince at the instigation of certain Popish Priests. Of whom, the chief was one Nicholas Saunders an English man, who at the same time died miserably of Famine, being starved to death, when as being forsaken, and running mad upon his ill success, he roamed up and down the Mountains and Groves, finding nothing to sustain him. In his Scrip were found certain Orations and Letters, written to hearten the Rebels, and promising large rewards from the Pope and King of Spain. Upon the Rebels ill success, James Fitz-Eustace, Viscount Baltinglas fled into Spain, where he pined away with grief. He, out of zeal to the Roman Religion, a little before he had taken up Arms with the Rebels, and exhorting the Earl of Ormond his Neighbor to do the like, (who drew his Linage from St. Thomas of Canterbury) used these words to perswade him, That if St. Thomas of Conterbury had not died for the Church of Rome, thou hadst never been Earl of Ormond: for King Henry the Second, to expiate the murder of Thomas Becket, gave large lands in Ormond to his Predecessors.

The beginning of the next Spring, certain Scots, together with Gowry, plotted again to surprize the King, pretending only a care of Religion, and to remove ill Councillors from him: but the King having intelligence of their practice, used means by Colonell Steward, to have Gowry taken and cast into prison: whereupon Marre, Glames, Angus, and other of the Confederates fled into England, and beseech the Queen to commiserate their estate, who had incurred the Kings displeasure, to do her and the Kingdom of England service. The King on the other side, accuseth them to the Queen of heinous Crimes, and requires to have them delivered up into his hands. But Secretary Walsingham, who bore great good will to these men, sent Whether a Secretary of State may not transact without special Commission from the Prince.

The Earl Gowry is arraign'd, condemned and beheaded.

Many practices are plotted against Qu. Eliz. in behalf of the Queen of Scots.

Letters with a Command, That they should be safely admitted into Lindisferne, otherwise called, The holy Island; where Hunsdon being Governour there, and greatly addicted to the King of Scots, resisted Walsingham's Command, alledging he could not satisfy the Secretary in this point, unless the Queen gave expresse Command. Hereupon grew a Dispute, Whether a Secretary of State might not transact business of State, without special Commission from the Prince. How this Case was determined, is uncertain; but sure it is, the Scots came not thither, though some favour they had shewed them here in England. In the mean time, Gowry was tryed by his Peers at Sterlyn, where being accused of many Treasons, though he gave colourable answers to them all, yet was found guilty, condemned, and beheaded; whose head his servants sewing to his body, committed to the Grave.

About this time were practices plotted against Queen Elizabeth, in behalf of the Queen of Scots, chiefly by Francis Throgmorton, eldest Son of John Throgmorton Justice of Chester, who came to be suspected, by reason of Letters sent to the Queen of Scots, which were intercepted. Upon his apprehension, Thomas Lord Paget and Charles Arundel, privately stole away into France, grievously complaining against Leicester and Walsingham, for alienating the Queen from them, and using such wiles, as scarce any man was able to live in safety. Henry Earl of Northumberland, and Philip Earl of Arundel, were confined to their Houses, his Wife committed to the custody of Sir Thomas Shirly, William Howard, the Earls Brother and Henry Howard their Uncle, Brother to the Duke of Norfolk, were examined about Letters from the Queen of Scots, and many Strategems were set on foot, dangerous to some particular persons, but necessary (as should seem) for the Queens security. Certain it is, That now the Malice of the Papists against the Queen, brake forth more violently than ever before; for in printed Books, they stirred up the Queens own servants to attempt the like upon her, that Judith did on Olophernes. The Author of these Books could not be found, but the suspicion lay upon one Gregory Martin sometime of Oxford: and Carter a Stationer, who printed the Books, suffered for it. And whereas the Papists every where traduced the Queen for cruelty, she desirous alwayes to leave a blessed remembrance behind her, grew extremely offended with the Commissioners for Popish causes, taxing them of too much cruelty: insomuch that they were fain, in a printed Declaration, to clear themselves, protesting; That they questioned no man for his Religion, but only for dangerous attempts against the Queen and State; and that Campion himself was never so racked, but that he could presently walk up and down. But all this gave not the Queen satisfaction, but she Commanded the Commissioners to forbear Tortures, and the Judges other Punishments; and not long after, when seventy Priests were taken, and some of them condemned, and the rest in danger of the Law, she caused them all to be shipped away, and sent out of England: The chief of whom were Gasper Heywood, the great Epigrammatist's Son, the first Jesuite that ever set Foot in England; James Bosgrave, John Hart, and Edmund Rishston.

At this time Mendoza the Spanish Ambassador, was thrust out of England, for joyning with Throgmorton in his Treason against the Queen; whereupon Sir William Wade was sent to the King of Spain, to satisfy him how ill Mendoza had discharged the Office of an Ambassadour here in England; who when the King admitted him not to his Presence, but in a slighting manner, putting him off to his Counsellors; Wade taking it in great disdain, boldly said, That it was a declared Custom amongst Princes (though in heat of War) to give Ambassadors audience, and thereupon stoutly refused to declare his Ambassage, and so returned into England, unheard. The greatest matters laid to Mendoza's charge, were gotten out of Throgmorton's Confession; for when he was in danger to be apprehended, he sent to Mendoza a box of Writings; and when his Chests were searched, there were found two Scrowls, one with the names of the Ports of England, and in the other, the Names of the Nobility and Gentry in England, that favoured the Romish Religion. These, when Throgmorton saw brought forth, he said they were counterfeited, and stood to it upon the very Rack, but being brought to the Rack the second time, he then confessed all; That Morgan, by Letters out of France, had given him information, that the Catholick Princes had decreed to invade England, and with the help of the Duke of Guyse, to free the Queen of Scots; and that nothing was now wanting, but money and aid in England; and that for procuring of this, Charles Paget, under the counterfeit name of Mope, was sent into Sussex, where the Duke of Guyse intended to land; and that he had imparted all this matter to Mendoza, and intimated the names of the Ports, and of the Noblemen that should assist. But being arraign'd at the Guild-Hall, he denied all this again, saying, he had spoken so, because he would not be Racked again. Yet being condemned to die, he flying to the Queens mercy, confessed in a manner all he had before related; and then at the Gallows went about to deny it again. So false to it self is the mind of man, when it is divided between hope and fear, and lies under the burden of a guilty Conscience.

Sir William Wade being returned from Spain, was employed to the Queen of Scots about the Treaty begun two years before: to whom the distressed Queen sincerely professed, That she devoted her service and her self to the Queen of England: and made solemn Promise, That if the former Treaty might go on, she would mediate with the King her Son, to receive into favour the Earl of Angus, & the other Scottish Lords, and would charge the Bishops of Rosse and Glasco, her Agents in France, to have no further to do with the English Fugitives. These things Queen Elizabeth heard gladly, and thereupon sent Beal to the Queen of Scots, who joyntly with the Earl of Shrewsbury should signify unto her, That if she continued still in the same mind as she had delivered to Wade; Sir Walter Mildmay should come out of hand to her, and treat concerning her liberty; but withal, she commanded Mildmay and Beal to dive into her as well as they could, to know what practices the Duke of Guyse had on Foot. To that which she had spoken to Sir William Wade, the Queen of Scots made a wary wary answer; but to that concerning the Duke of Guyse, she plainly confesseth; That being sickly her self, and weak of body, she had committed her self and her Son to the Protection of the D. of Guyse, her dear Cousin, of whose intendments she knoweth nothing; nor if she did, would she disclose them, unless she might be sure of her own liberty. Lastly, she requesteth, that being a free and absolute Prince, she may not be worse handled, than Queen Elizabeth her self was, when she was a Subject, and kept in prison by her Sister. These things had a hearing, but no feeling, and the rather by a strange accident; for Creighton a Scottish Jesuit, sailing from the Low-Countries, and taken by Dutch Pirates, had certain papers which he tore, and threw away, which thrown over-board, and by the wind blown back unto the Ship, miraculously (as Creighton himself said) they were brought to Sir William Wade, who patching them together with much labour & cunning, discovered by them some new intendments of the Pope, the K. of Spain, and the D. of Guyse, about the invading of England: whereupon, and upon divers other rumours, the better to provide for the safety of the Queen, a number of her Subjects (the Earl of Leicester being the foremost) men of all ranks and conditions, bound themselves mutually to each other by their Oaths and Subscriptions, to persecute all those to the very death, that should attempt any thing against the Queen; which League of theirs they called the Association.

An Association of Lords and others in defence of Qu Eliz.

The Qu. of Scots offers to enter into the Association, if she may have her liberty.

To which Qu Eliz. is inclining.

But is made averse from it by Scots and English of the adverse party, and especially by Scottish Ministers.

The Queen of Scots who presently apprehended that this Association was entered into for her destruction; making this proposition by Nave her Secretary, to the Queen and the Council; That if she might have her liberty granted, and be assured of the Queens love, she would enter a strict League and Amity with her, and passing by all matters of offence, esteem and honour her above all the Princes of the Christian world: yea, and (saving the antient League betwixt France and Scotland) she would her self be comprehended in the Association, and a League defensive, against all that should go about to injure the Queen. Herewith Queen Elizabeth was wonderfully pleased, and at that time certainly had an inclination to grant her freedom. But see what malice can do; for many in England, but especially the Scots of the adverse party, endeavoured by all means to hinder it: exclaiming, That the Queen should be no longer in safety, if the Queen of Scots were set at liberty; That both Kingdoms were utterly undone, if she were admitted into the joynt Government of the Kingdom of Scotland, and that the reformed Religion lay a bleeding, if Papists were admitted within the Court-walls; nor was this all, but the Scottish Ministers in their Pulpits, loaded the Queen of Scots with all manner of contumelies, slandering the King himself, and his Council in the most bitter manner; and being cited to appear before him, refused, saying, That the Pulpits were exempted from all Regal Authority, & that Ecclesiastical persons were not to be censured by the Prince, but by their own Consistory (directly against the Laws made the year before in Parliament) whereby the Kings Authority over all persons, whether Ecclesiastical or Secular, was confirmed; and namely, That the King and his Council were Supreme Judges in all Causes; and that whosoever refused to be tried by them, should be holden guilty of High-Treason; all Presbyters and Lay-conventicles forbidden, Parity of the Clergy taken away, and the Authority of Bishops restored, whose Calling the Presbyteries had condemned as wicked and Antichristian: and lastly, all scurrilous Libels against the King and his mother prohibited; namely, the Scottish History of George Buchanan, and his Dialogue, De Jure Regni apud Scotos.

At this time, upon her Adversaries suggestion the Queen of Scots is taken from the Earl of Shrewsbury, and committed to the custody of Sir Amias Pawlet and Sir Drue Drury, and that on set purpose (as some were persuaded) to drive her into abrupt and desperate attempts; and indeed upon this she grew more importunate with the Pope and King of Spain, to hasten their intendment, whatsoever became of her, as ill indeed was like to become of her, if it be true (as some said) that Leicester sent out assassins to make her away, but that Drury detested the villainy, and would grant them no access.

The Q. of Scots is taken from the E. of Shrewsbury, and committed to the custody of Sir Amias Pawlet.

And now to alienate Queen Elizabeth utterly from her; it is suggested to her, that Allen for the Catholics of the Clergy, Inglefield for the Laity, and the Bishop of Rosse for the Queen of Scots, with consent of the Pope and King of Spain, had joyntly combined to depose her, and to bar the King of Scotland from his hereditary Right to the Crown of England, and to marry the Queen of Scots to an English Nobleman of the Romish Religion, and him the English Catholics should choose King of England, and the Pope confirm the Election: and all this upon the credit of Hart the Priest: but who this English Nobleman should be that should marry the Queen of Scots, could not be found, though Walsingham were busie to search it out: the same went upon Henry Howard the Duke of Norfolk's Brother, who was a single man, a great Papist, and of High estimation among the Catholics.

A Combination in the Catholics, to marry the Q. of Scots to some English Nobleman of the Romish Religion; and who he was thought to be.

This year died in exile and misery Charles Nevil, who was in the Rebellion in the North, the last E. of Westmerland of this Family; a house from whence descended many Noble Personages, six Earls of Westmerland, two Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, an Earl of Kent, a Marquess Mountacute, a Duke of Bedford, Baron Ferrers of Ousley, the Lord Latimer, the Lord of Abergaveny, one Queen and five Dutcheesses (to let pass Countesses & Baroneesses) an Archbishop of York, & a numerous company of other Lords. In England died none of reckoning this year, but only Plowden the famous Lawyer; but in France the Duke of Anjou died of grief: and in Holland, William Prince of Orange, shot into the body with three bullets, by one Balthasar Gerard, a Burgundian.

Charles Nevil the last E. of Westmerland of this Family, dies in Exile; and of the many Noble Personages descended from that House. Plowden the great Lawyer dies. The Prince of Orange is shot and slain by a Burgundian.

It was now the year 1585. and the 28th of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when to tie the French King more nearly to her, whom the year before she had received into the number of the Knights of the Garter, she sent the Earl of Derby into France, to invest him with the Robes and Ornaments, according to the due solemnity; which he kindly accepted, and at Evening Prayer was invested with them.

At this time a Parliament was assembled at Westminster, wherein William Parry a Welsh-man, a Doctor of the Laws, when in the lower House a Bill was read against the Jesuits, he alone stood up, and exclaimed that it was a cruel and bloody Law: and being asked his reason, he stoutly refused unless he were required by the Lords of the Council: Hereupon he was sent to the Gatehouse, but upon submission, was received into the House again. Soon after he was accused by Edward Nevil, for holding secret consultations about making the Queen away; who thereupon apprehended, upon his examination, confessed in effect thus much, That out of discontent he went beyond the Sea, where, by the encouragement of Campegio, the Popes Nuntio at Venice, and grant of a plenary Indulgence from the Pope, he undertook to kill the Queen; but coming into England to that intent, he altered his mind, and disclosed to the Queen the whole matter. After this, he received a Letter from the Cardinal of Como, perswading him to go forward with the Enterprize; and this Letter also he shewed the Queen. After this, he chanced to see a Book of Dr. Allens, written contra Justitiam Britannicam, wherein was declared, That Princes who were for Heresie excommunicated, might lawfully be deprived of their life and Kingdom. This Book wonderfully confirm'd him, and he read it to Nevill; who, though he took an Oath of Secrecy, yet now upon a hope of the Earldom of Westmerland, betrayed him. This was his confession before Baron Hunsdon, Sir Christopher Hatton, and Sir Francis Walsingham: as likewise in his Letters to the Queen, to the L. Burleigh, and the E. of Leicester, acknowledging his fault, and craving mercy. A few days after, he was called to the Bar in Westminster-Hall, where he confessed himself guilty, and thereupon was condemned. After the sentence of death pronounced, he furiously cited the Queen to Gods Tribunal: five dayes after he was laid upon a Hurdle, and dragg'd through the City to Westm. where at the Gibbet he made a vain-glorious boasting of his faithfulness to the Queen, but not so much as in a word commended himself to God; and in the great palace at Westminster, was executed as a Traytor, the Nobility and Commons sitting then in Parliament.

of the Qu.

The E. of Arundel committed to the Tower, and why.

In this Parliament the Association before spoken of, was universally approved and enacted in this Form; That 24, or more, of the Queens Privy Council, and Peers of the Realm, should be selected and authorized under the Great Seal of England, To make enquiry of all such persons as shall attempt to invade the Kingdom, or raise Rebellion, or shall attempt any evil against the Queens Person, for whomsoever, & by whomsoever that layeth any claim to the Crown of England; and that person for whom or by whom they shall attempt any such thing, shall be altogether incapable of the Crown; and more to this purpose. Laws also for the Queens safety, were enacted against Jesuits, and Popish Priests, and against all that shall receive or relieve them. These Laws terrified many, and particularly out of fear of them, Phil. E. of Arundel, the D. of Norfolk's eldest Son, purposed with himself to travel beyond Sea; for having been once or twice cited before the Lords of the Council, and confined to his House, and after six months set at liberty, he thereupon wrote a Letter to the Queen, That for the service of God, and his Soules health, he purposed to leave his Country, but not his loyal affection towards her; but as he was taking Shipping, by his own servants treachery he was discovered, apprehended, and laid in the Tower.

At the same time lay in the Tower Henry Percy Earl of Northumberland, a man of a lofty spirit, being suspected by reason of secret consultation with Throgmorton, the Lord Paget and the Guises, about the invading of England, and freeing of the Queen of Scots (whose cause he ever highly favoured) but in the month of June he was found dead in his bed, shot into the body with three bullets, under his right Pap, and the door bolted on the inside. The Coroners Inquest examining the matter, found and pronounced that he had kill'd himself. Three dayes after, the Lords meeting in the Star-chamber, Brumley Lord Chancellor, declared this fact of the Earls, and then commanded the Attorney-General to shew the cause of his imprisonment, and the manner of his death; whereupon, Popham first, and then Egerton the Queens Solicitor, in long Orations, laid open all his Treasons, and how for fear of the Law, he had laid violent hands upon himself.

And now the Queen knowing that the seeds of these Treasons proceeded from the Duke of Guise, and his adherents, she sought for the strengthening of her self, to enter into the League with the Princes of Germany; and to this end, she sent Sir Thomas Bodley to the King of Denmark, to the Count Elector Palatine of the Rhine, to the Duke of Saxony, Wittenberg, Brunswick, Lonceburgh; the Marquess of Brandenburg, and the Landgrave of Hesse; and into Scotland, she sent Sir Edward Wotton, to let the King understand how sincerely she was affected towards him, and withal to draw the King (if he could) into a League of mutual defence and offence, and to commend to him the Match of the King of Denmarks Daughter. The King was very inclinable to the matter of the League, but for the present, the business was interrupted by the death of Francis Russel, Son to the Earl of Bedford, slain at a meeting to compound a difference between the Borderers, by a sudden tumult of the Scots, but who it was that slew him, was not known. The English laid it upon the Earl of Arran, and the Lord Fernihurst Governour of the middle Borders; Whereupon, at the Queens complaint, the Earl of Arran was confined, and Fernihurst committed to prison at Dundee, where he died; a man of great valor and resolution, and one that was alwaies firm for the Queen of Scots. But Queen Elizabeth not thus satisfied, gave leave by way of connivance to the Scottish Lords that were fled into England, namely, the Earl of Angus, the Hamiltons, and John Cladius, the E. of Marre, Glames, and other, that they should steal away into Scotland, (she supplying them with money) there to master and subdue the Earl of Arran. For Maxwell, who was lately made Earl of Bothwell, Baron Humes, Goldingholls, and others in Scotland, had already promised them their assistance; even in the very Court, Sir Patrick Gray (Arrans great Rival for the King favour) Belenden, and Secretary Maitland (by Wottons craft) were made against Arran. These men upon their first entry into Scotland, commanded all persons in the Kings name, to aid them for conserving the truth of the Gospel, for freeing the King from corrupt Counsellors, and for maintaining of Amity with the English, so as there presently joyned joyned with them about eight thousand men. The E. of Arran hearing thereof, makes halt to the King, and accuseth Patrick Gray as Author of this commotion; but whiles Arran was making provision for defence of the Town, the enemies were ready to scale the Walls: whereupon Arran being advised, that only his life was fought, gets secretly away with only one Servant, the rest betook themselves to the King in the Castle. The Rebels get into the Market-place, and display their Banners against the Castle: the King sends Gray to know the reason of their coming; they answer, to submit themselves, and in humble manner to kiss the Kings hands: the King offereth restitution of all their Goods, if they would depart; They desire to be admitted to his presence, which upon these conditions the King granted, That they should not attempt any thing against his life, or those whom he should nominate, nor make any innovation in the Government. They protest, They are ready to sacrifice their lives for the Kings safety; and of any Innovation they had not so much as a thought: only, they request to have their Adversaries, and the Fortifications of Scotland delivered up into their hands. Hereupon after a daies Consultation, they are admitted into the Kings Presence, and forthwith the Earls of Mount-Rosse, Crawford and Rothsay; Colonel Steward, Downs, Arrans Brothers, and others, were delivered to them: The Earl of Arran, who was fled into the Western Islands, is called home: the Assaulters were pardoned, and pronounced good Subjects. Hamilton is set over Dumbarton Castle; Goldingknoller over Edinburgh; the Earl of Angus over Tantallon; the Earl of Marre over Sterlin; and Glames is made Captain of the Guard. Upon this, all Proscriptions and Out-lawries against all Persons, since the Kings Inauguration (saving some few proscribed for the murder of the Kings Father) are called in, and with an unanimous consent of all Parties, the Treaty of a League with the Queen of England is agreed upon, and Delegates nominated to that purpose.

A combustion in Ireland, how caused, and how pacified.

In Ireland likewise was a Combustion this year, first the Burkes (descended of the antient Family of the Burroughs in England) provoked by the severe Government of Richard Bingham Governour of Connaught, raise Rebellion; but this was soon suppressed, for Thomas Burk, dyed fighting; Meyler and Theobald Burk, were taken and hanged. After this the Clan Gibbons, Clan Donells and Joyes, combined together in great numbers, and say plainly, They will have a Mac William of their own, one of the Burkes to rule over them, or some other Lord out of Spain; they will admit of no Sheriff into their Country, nor appear before the English Courts of Justice; and thereupon harried all the Country with Fire and Sword, and neither by the persuasions of the Archbishop Tuan, nor by the Intreaties of the Earl of Clan-riccard (the chief of the House of the Burkes) would be quieted, till John Bingham the Presidents Brother, following them into the Woods drave away five thousand head of their Cattel, so as after forty dayes, half starved, they came forth and submitted themselves. But this was not yet an end; for now the President understood, That two thousand Scottish Islanders were landed, and ready to break into Connaught; whereupon he musters his men to give them battell; but they flying to Bogs and Woods, he retires back, as though in fear, thereby to draw them from the Bogs to firm ground, and then with his whole Forces set upon them, slew three thousand of them (indeed all but fourscore) amongst whom were Donell Garmy & Alexander Garmy, the Sons of James Mac-Conel, who had long disquieted this part, and those Burkes who were the first Authors of this Rebellion. This was a famous Victory, for the good of the present and future times; for hereby the name of the Mac-Williams in Connaught was utterly extinct, and the insolent attempts of the Scottish Islanders absolutely crushed.

The name of Mac-Williams in Connaught is utterly extinct. The States of the Low-Countries fly to Qu. Eliz. for protection, which she refuseth:

In the Low-Countries at this time the States were very hard beset, so as they held a Consultation, whither to flee for Protection, whether to the French King, or to the Queen of England. Monsieur Pruine the French Ambassador shewed many advantages, and gave many reasons why they should fly rather to the French King; the English on the other side, alledged many reasons why they should fly rather to the Queen of England; but in conclusion, they have first recourse to the King of France, and afterward being by him neglected, to the Queen of England. But then in England it was consulted, Whether it were meet to protect them; wherein the Council was divided; some were of Opinion, That it were good to receive and aid them, lest the Spaniard first conquering them, might have the better way to annoy England; others again thought, They were to be held no better than Rebels to their lawful Sovereign, and therefore unworthy of assistance. After long debating the matter, the Queen refuseth to take them into Protection, much less to exercise Sovereignty over them. Nevertheless to raise the Siege of Antwerp, which was beleagured by the Prince of Parma, she was content to supply them with four thousand Soldiers, so as the Town of Sluce, and the Ordnance belonging to it, were given up into their hands: but while this matter was discussing, the Town of Antwerp was fain to yield it self.

But at last she undertakes it.

But the Queen better bethinking her self, partly as fearing the growth of the King of Spains Power, and partly, as commiserating the afflicted of her own Religion, at last resolves to undertake their Protection, upon condition of her part, to supply them with five thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse, under a sufficient General, paying them during the war; and afterward the expences to be payed back, upon condition on their part, by way of Pledge, to deliver Flushing and the Fort of Ramekin, the Town of Brill, with the two neighbouring Forts: and for the justifying of this her action, she set forth a large Declaration. And knowing that herein she incensed the King of Spain, she thought best to turn his anger further from home, and thereupon sent out Sir Francis Drake and Christopher Carlile, with a Navy of one and twenty Ships (wherein were two thousand Volunteers and Mariners) toward the West-Indies; who first surprized the Town of St. Jago, afterward St. Dominick (where five and twenty thousand Crowns were given them to spare the town from burning) afterward

The States commit to him the absolute command over the United Provinces, which the Queen is angry at.

And the States excuse it.

What was done by the Earl of Leicester at his being in Holland.

Cartagena, which they held seven weeks, till the Spaniards redeemed it for a hundred and ten thousand Crowns. After this the Calenture waxing hot, and diminishing their Forces, they returned homewards, passing by Virginia, a Colony which Sir Walter Rawleigh had there planted; from whence Drake brings home with him Ralph Lane, who was the first that brought Tobacco into England, which the Indians take against crudities of the Stomach. At this expedition were lost about seven hundred men, who for the most part died of Calentures: their Booty amounted to the value of threescore thousand pounds Sterling, besides two hundred and forty Brasses and Iron Pieces. These things were done under the Torrid Zone in America: when in the mean while, Captain John Davis, with two Ships (at the charges of William Sanderson, and other Citizens of London) found out a way to the East-Indies, by the higher part of America, under the Frigid Zone.

At the end of this year, the Earl of Leicester is sent General of the Qu. Forces into Holland, accompanied with the Earl of Essex, the Lords Audley & North, Sir William Russel, Sir Tho. Sherly, Sir Arthur Bassett, Sir Walter Waller, Sir Gervase Clifton, & divers other Knights, besides five hundred Gentlemen. Landing at Flushing, he was first by Sir Philip Sidney the Governor his Nephew, after by the Towns of Zealand and Holland, entertained in most magnificent manner; and coming to the Hague in January, the States by Patent committed to him the command & absolute Authority over the united Provinces, with the Titles of Governor & Capt. General of Holland, Zealand, and the Confederate Provinces: so as being now saluted with the title of his Excellency, he began to assume unto him Princely spirits. But the Queen took him soon off from further aspiring, writing unto him in most peremptory manner; That she wondred how a man whom she had raised out of the dust, could so contemptuously violate her commands, & therefore charged him upon his Allegiance, to put in execution the Injunctions she sent him by Hennage her Vice-Chamberlain; Withall, in Letters apart, she expostulateth with the States, that to her great disparagement, they had cast upon the Earl of Leicester her Subject, the absolute command over the united Provinces, without her privity, which she herself had utterly refused; and therefore willeth them to devest him of that absolute authority, to whom she had set bounds, which he should not pass. The States return Answer, that they are heartily sorry they should incur her displeasure by conferring upon the E. that absolute Authority, not having first made her acquainted, but they beseeched her to consider the necessity of it; seeing, that for avoiding of confusion, that Authority, must needs be cast upon some one or other; Neither was there any great matter in the word absolute, seeing the Rule & Dominion resided still in the people. By these Letters & Leicester's own submissive writing, the Qu. was soon satisfied: Leicester all this while receiveth Contributions & Rewards from all Provinces, maketh Martial Laws, and endeavouring likewise to raise new Customs upon Merchandizes, incurred great dislike amongst the common people. His first service was to relieve Grave a Town in Brabant, which the Prince of Parma, by Count Mansfield had besieged: hither he sent the Count Hohenlo a German, & Norris General of the Eng. Foot, but notwithstanding all the great Service they did there, the Town in the end was taken; but Hemart the Governor, for his cowardly yielding it up, lost his head. From hence the Prince of Parma marched into Gelderland, and pitched his Tents before Venlow, where Skenkic a Friezlander, and Roger Williams a Welchman performed great service, yet that Town in a short time was taken also. But in the mean while the L. Willoughby Governour of Burgen ap Zome, cut off the enemies Convoyes, & took away their Victuals; and Sir Philip Sidney and Maurice the Prince of Oranges Son, upon a sudden onset, took Axale, a Town in Flanders. From Venlow the Prince of Parma goes to Berke, where there were 12000. English under the command of Colonel Morgan; he notwithstanding laid Siege to the Town, which the E. of Leicester came to raise, but finding his Forces too weak to raise it, he seeks to divert it by beleaguering Duisburgh; which before the Prince of Parma could come to relieve, he took. And now the Prince of Parma, fearing lest Zutphen should come in danger, commandeth Victuals to be carried thither, which the Spaniards carrying along in a fogge, the English by chance lighted on them, vanquished a Troop of their Horse, slew Hannibal Gonzaga, and divers others, but then on the English side was one slain, more worth than all the English and Spaniards put together. Sir Philip Sidney, who having his Horse slain under him, and getting upon another, was shot into the thigh, and 25 days after, in the flower of his age, dyed: A man of so many excellent parts of Art and Nature, of Valor and Learning, of Wit and Magnanimity; that as he had equalled all those of former Ages, so future Ages will hardly be able to equal him. His Funerals were in sumptuous manner solemnized at St. Pauls Church in London. James King of Scotland made his Epitaph, and both Universities celebrated his death with Funeral Verses.

After this Leicester assaulted Zutphen, where setting upon a Fort he takes it in this manner: Edw. Stanley (of the Stanlies of Elford) catching hold of a Spaniards Launce, which was brandished at him, held it so fast, that by it he was drawn into the very Fort; whereupon the Spaniards being affrighted (as thinking all the enemies were coming up) forsook the place; Leicester knighted Stanley for this act, gave him forty Pounds in present money, and a yearly Pension of an hundred marks during his life. And now though in this forwardness to win the Town, yet Winter being already come on, he thought it unseasonable to besiege it any longer (especially so many English Garisons lying round about it, which were in the nature of a Siege) but return'd to the Hague, where the States entertained him with complaints, that their money was not carefully husbanded, that the number of the English supplies were not full, that foreign Souldiers were levied without their consent, that the Priviledges of the United Provinces were set at nought, and new devices for contribution invented; for all which evils, they intreated him to provide some present remedy. To which complaints (having a purpose to go for England) he gave a friendly answer; answer; but upon the very day in which he was to depart, he committeth the Government of the Province, to the deliberation of the States; & the same day made another private Instrument of Writing, where he reserved to himself the whole authority over the Governours of the several Provinces, Cities, & Forts; & more than this, taketh away the wonted Jurisdiction from the States Council, & Presidents of the Provinces; and came into England the third day of December. And thus passed the Affairs of the Netherlands for this year.

Philip Earl of Arundel, who had lyen in prison a whole year, was at last brought to the Star-chamber; & being charged with fostering of Priests, & having correspondence with Allen and Parsons the Jesuite, and offering to depart the Kingdom without licence, was fined ten thousand pounds, and imprisonment during the Queens pleasure.

A league of strict Amity is concluded with the K. of Scots.

At this time, the Queen, by Sir Horatio Palavicino, supplied with a large sum of money the King of Navarre; through whose side the Guyses opposed the reformed Religion in Scotland, but her most intente care was how to unite England & Scotland in a solid friendship: To which end she sent Thomas Randall into Scotland, who making Propositions to the King, touching a League offensive & defensive, though the King at first required some additions, and though the French Ambassadour infinitely opposed it, yet at last he consented to it; & in July following, there met at Barwick, Edward Earl of Rutland, William Lord Ewer, and Thomas Randall for the Queen of England: Francis Earl of Bothwell, Robert Lord Boyde, and Humes for the King of Scots, and there the League (which was called the League of strict amity; for that the word Offensive, liked not the Scots) was upon certain points concluded; First, for the maintenance of the Reformed Religion, and then other such Articles, as commonly in Leagues are usual.

A dangerous conspiracy is at this time discovered, begun by J. Savage, but prosecuted by Anthony Babington and divers others.

The very same month that this League was agreed on, a most dangerous Conspiracy against the Queen was discovered. For first, one John Savage was by the perswasion of Gifford, Doctor of Divinity, induced to believe, that it was a meritorious work, to take away the lives of Princes Excommunicate, who thereupon vowed to kill Queen Elizabeth: but to make the Queen and her Council secure, at the same time they wrote a Book, exhorting the Papists in England to attempt nothing against their Prince, and to use only the Christian weapons of Tears, Prayers, Watching, and Fasting. About Whitsuntide one Ballard a Seminary Priest of Rheims, acquainted with the vow of Savage, (having dealt in France with Mendoza and Charles Paget, about invading of England) arrived here in a Souldiers habit, and by a counterfeit name called Captain Foscu; with these matters he acquainted one Anthony Babington, a Gentleman of Derbyshire, who by the Bishop of Glasco, the Queen of Scots Ambassador in France, had been commended to her as one worthy of her love; so as between them there passed often Letters in unknown Characters. In short time, Babington had drawn into the Plot, other Gentlemen as zealous of the Romish Religion as himself; namely Edward Windsor, Brother to the Lord Windsor, Thomas Salisbury of a good Family in Devonshire, Charles Tilney one of the Queens Pensioners, Chydieck Tichburn of Hampshire, Edward Abington (whose Father was Cofferer to the Queen) Robert Gage of Surrey, John Travers, and John Charnock of Lancashire, John Jones, Savage formerly spoken of, Barnwell of a noble Family in Ireland, and Henry Dunne a Clark in the Office of First-Fruits and Tenths; one Pollie also scrued himself into their company, a fellow thoroughly acquainted with the affairs of the Queen of Scots, who was thought to have revealed all their Consultations to Walsingham day by day. To these Gentlemen, Babington communicateth his affairs, but not every particular to every one, but to Ballard, Tichburn, and Dunne, he sheweth the Letters which passed between him & the Queen of Scots: with Tilney and the rest, he dealeth to be assistants; of whom, some at first loth, at last consented, and in a foolish vain-gloriousness, a Picture of the Assassins was made to the life, and Babington in the midst, with these words, Quorsum hæc alio properantibus? This Picture (they say) was gotten and privately shewed to the Queen, who knew none of them by face, but only Barnwell (who had oftentimes come to her in the causes of the E. of Kildare, whose servant he was.) Certain it is, that the Queen one day walking abroad, spied this Barnwell, and turning to Hatton, said, Am not I well Guarded, that have not so much as one man in the company with a Sword by his side? Thus much Barnwell himself told the rest of his Confederacy, and how easie a matter it had been to have dispatched her at that time, if the rest had been present. The chief discoverer of the Plot, was the aforesaid Gifford: This was a Gentleman of a good House at Chellington in Staffordshire, not far from Chartley, where the Queen of Scots was kept prisoner, and was now sent by the English Fugitives in France, under the counterfeit name of Luson, to put Savage in mind of the Vow he had made, and to convey Letters between them and the Queen of Scots. But he, whether pricked in Conscience, or disinayed in mind, came to Walsingham privately, revealing who he was, & for what end, and by whom sent into England. Walsingham courteously entertained him, & sent him down into Staffordshire, to do the work he had undertaken. Here Gifford bribing the Brewer of the house, where the Queen of Scots lay, contrived the matter in such sort with him, that by a hole in the Wall, in which a loose stone was put, he should give in, and receive forth Letters, the which by messengers purposely laid by the way, came evermore to Walsingham's hands; who broke them open, copied them out, and by the rare cunning of one Thomas Philips, found out the meaning of the Private Characters, and by the singular Art of Arthur Gregory, sealed them again so curiously, that no man would imagine them to have been opened, & ever sent them to the parties, to whom the superscription directed them. In like manner were the former Letters from the Queen of Scots to Babington intercepted; as also other Letters written at the same time to Mendoza the Spanish Ambassador, Charles Paget, the Lord Paget, the Arch-Bishop of Glasco, and Francis Englefield. The Queen as soon as she understood by these Letters of the storm hanging over her head, both at home and abroad, commanded Ballard to be apprehended, who on a suddain is taken in Babingtons house. Babington hereupon goeth to Walsingham, with whom he had long been a suiter, for licence to go into France, promising to do great matters in discovering the practices of the Fugitives. Walsingham with fair promises drives him off from day to day; and now perswades him, that for a small space till he could get his licence sealed, he would lodge at his house in London, where they might have secret Conference without suspicion. This web Walsingham himself had spun hitherto, and no other of the Queens Counsel were made acquainted; and longer yet he would have drawn the thread, out but that the Queen was unwilling; left (as she said) by not avoiding danger when she might, she should seem rather to tempt God, than to trust in him. Whereupon, Walsingham sent a Note to his man Scudamore from the Court, to look carefully to Babington: This Note was delivered in such manner, that Babington sitting by a Table when Scudamore read it, overlooked him, and read it likewise: Hereupon suspecting that all was discovered, the next Night he and Scudamore, and one or two more of Walsinghams servants supping at a Tavern, and being very merry, he made an excuse that he must needs step aside, and rose up, leaving his Cloak and his Sword, and so made hast through the dark to Westminster where Gage and he changed apparel, and then together withdrew themselves into St. Johns Wood near the City, whither Barnwell and Dun betook themselves. In the mean space they were proclaimed Traytors all England over. Hereupon they lay lurking in Woods & by-places; they shave Babingtons face, disfigure the beauty of his Countenance (for he was of an extraordinary beauty) with the husks of green Walnuts; and when they were half starved, went to the houses of the Bellamies, near Harrow on the Hill, who were great Papists; There they were hid in Barns, and put into a countrey habit: But notwithstanding all their shifting, within ten days after they were discovered and brought to London. The other Complices were soon after taken, most of them in the Suburbs of the City, Salisbury and Traverser in Cheshire, and Jones in Wales, who harboured them in his house, after he knew they were proclaimed Traytors; Windsor only was never heard of. Many days were spent in the examination of them, who cut one the others Throats, with their own Confessions. All this while, the Queen of Scots and her servants are so narrowly looked to by Pawlet, that she knew nothing of all these passages; As soon as they were apprehended, Thomas George was sent to acquaint her with the whole matter, which yet he did not do, till she was got on Horse-back to ride a hunting, & was not then suffered to return, but in shew of Courtesie was carried up and down, to see the houses of the Gentry thereabouts. In which mean while John Manners, Edward Aiton, Richard Bagot, and Sir William Wade, took Nave and Curle the Queen of Scots Secretaries, and the rest of her servants, and delivered them to Keepers apart, that they might have no speech between themselves, nor with their Lady the Queen of Scots. Then they broke open all dores, and such Desks & Boxes as they found with any Papers in them, they set their seals upon, and sent them to the Court. In which being broken open before the Queen were found a number of Letters from Foreign parts, the Copies likewise of Letters sent to several persons, and threescore Alphabets at least of private Characters; as also, Letters to her from some of the English Nobility, containing great proffers of love and service, which the Queen notwithstanding took no notice of, but passed over in silence, according to her Motto, Video & Taceo, I see and say nothing. Gifford now, who had all this while served their turn, is sent into France; but ere he went hence, left an Indenture with the French Ambassadour here in England, with Instructions that he should deliver no Letters to the Queen of Scots, or the fugitives in France, but to him that exhibited an Indenture matching with that, the which he sent under-hand to Sir Francis Walsingham.

The twentieth of September, seven of the forenamed Conspirators were Arraigned, and pleading guilty, were condemned of High Treason. Two days after, seven other were called to the Bar, who pleaded not guilty, but notwithstanding were found guilty by their own confessions, & condemned; Pollie only, though he were privy to all passages, yet because he had disclosed many things to Walsingham, was not called in question. The twentieth day of the month, the first seven in St. Giles Fields, where they were wont to meet, were hanged, cut down instantly, their privy members cut off, and themselves yet living and beholding it, were in cruel manner bowelled & quartered; namely, Ballard, Babington, Savage, (who, the roap breaking, fell down from the Gibbet, and was presently taken by the hangman, his privy members cut off, and bowelled while he was perfectly living) Barnwell, Tichburn, Tilney, and Abington. The next day, the other seven were drawn to the same place, and executed in the same fashion, but in a more gentle manner, by the Queens special charge who detested the former cruelty, for they were to hang till they were quite dead, Salisbury first, then Dun, then Jones, Chernock, Traverser, Gage, and with them Hierome Bellamy, who had concealed Babington after he was proclaimed Traytor (whose Brother being guilty of the same fact, had strangled himself in prison.)

When these men were executed, Nave a French man, and Curle a Scotch man, Secretaries to the Queen of Scots, were examined concerning the Letters, the copies of Letters, and private Characters found in the Queen of Scots Closet; who under their own voluntary subscriptions acknowledged, that they were their own handwritings, dictated in French by the Queen herself, taken by Nave, turned into English by Curle and copied out in secret Characters. Hereupon Sir Edward Wotton was sent out of hand into France, to make known to the King, the order of the Treason, and to shew him the copies of the Queen of Scots Letters, confirmed by the testimony of sundry of the English Nobility, that the French King might see what dangerous plots were by Charles Paget, and the English Fugitives contrived against the Queen of England.

And now, what should be done with the Qu. of Scots, was a great consultation; wherein the Counsel-Consultation is held what should be done with the Qu. of Scots, and the resolution.

Commissioners are sent to the Queen of Scots to acquaint her with the resolution.

But she stood up on her innocency, & upon her exemption from answering as being an absolute Prince.

Yet at last she was brought to consent.

Hereupon she appears before the Commissioners,

Counsellours were not all of one mind: some conceived; That it were not good to take any rigorous course against her, but only to hold her in fast Custody; both for that she was not Author of the Treason, but only conscious to it, and because she was crazie, and not likely to live long. Others, out of a care of Religion, were of opinion, to have her forthwith arraigned and put to death according to Law; Leicester thought it better to have her poysoned, and sent a Divine to Walsingham to prove it lawful, but Walsingham protested against that course. A difference then arose amongst them, by what law to proceed against her; Whether by the Law of the 25 of Edward the Third; (in which they are pronounced guilty of Treason, who plot the destruction of the King or Queen, raise War in his Dominions or adhere to his Adversaries) Or else by the 27 of the Queen Enacted a year since: Their opinion at last prevail'd who thought best to proceed against her by this latter Law, as being indeed in this case provided. Whereupon, divers of the Lords of the privy Council, & others of the Nobility, are Authorized by the Queens Letters, to enquire by vertue of that Law, and pass sentence against all such as raised Rebellion, invaded the Kingdom, or attempted any violence against the Queen. These Commissioners therefore upon the eleventh day of October repaired to Fotheringay Castle in Northamptonshire, where the Q. of Scots was then held prisoner; and the next day, sent unto her Walter Mildmay, Paulet and Edward Barker, publick Notary; who delivered her the Queens Letters; which having with a settled countenance read, she said, It seems to me strange that the Q. should lay her Command upon me, to hold up my hand at the Bar, as though I were a Subject, seeing I am an absolute Queen, no less than her self; but howsoever, I will never do any thing prejudicial to Princes of my degree, nor to my Son the King of Scotland. After many meetings, she standing still upon her Innocency, and upon her exemption from answering, as being an absolute Prince, and specially for yielding to be tryed by the English Laws, of which, One (she said) had lately been made of purpose for her destruction: It was at last told her plainly, by the Chancellour and Treasurer, that if she refused to answer to such Crimes as should be objected, they would then proceed against her, though she were absent. Being brought at last with much ado to consent, the Commissioners came together in the Presence Chamber; a Chair of Estate was set for the Queen of England, in the upper end of the Chamber under a Canopy; beneath over against which was placed a Chair for the Queen of Scots; on both sides of the Cloth of Estate stools were set, upon which on the one side sate the Lord Chancellour, the Lord Treasurer, the Earls of Oxford, Kent, Derby, Worcester, Rutland, Cumberland, Warwick, Pembroke, Lincoln, & Viscount Montacute: On the other side sate the Lords Aburgavenny, Zouch, Morley, St. John of Bletsho, Compton, and Cheyney; Next to these sate the Knights that were Privy Counsellors, Sir James Crofts, Sir Christopher Hatton, Sir Francis Walsingham, Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Walter Mildmay, and Sir Amias Pawlet; Forward before the Earls, sate the two Chief Justices, and the Lord Chief Baron; on the other side, the two

Barons, and the other Justices; Dale and Foord Drs. of the Civil Law: at a Table in the midst, Popham the Queens Attorney General, Egerton her Solicitor, Gawdy her Serjeant at Law, the Clark of the Crown, and two Notaries. When the Qu. of Scots was come, and had placed herself, silence being made, Bromley Lord Chancellor turning towards her, said, That the Queen had appointed these Commissioners, to hear what she could answer to Crimes laid to her charge, assuring her, That nothing would be cause of more joy to the Queen, than to hear that she had proved her self innocent. Upon this, she rising up said, That although, being an absolute Prince, she could not be compelled to appear before the Delegates, yet to manifest her innocency, she was now content to appear. Then Gawdy opened every specialty of the Law lately made (against which she had taken Exception) shewing by Babingtons Confession, by Letters passed between them, by the Confessions of Ballard and Savage, by the Confessions of her Secretaries Nive and Curle, that she was privy to their Treasons, and consented to the Invasion of England, and destruction of the Queen. To which she answered, That Letters might be counterfeited, her Secretaries might be corrupted; the rest in hope of life might be drawn to confess that which was not true: In this she stood peremptorily, That she never consented to any attempt against the Queens Person; though for her own delivery, she confessed she did. After many other charges by the Commissioners, and replies by the Queen of Scots; at last, she requested, that she might be heard in a full Parliament, or before the Queen her self, and her Council. But this request prevailed not; for on the 25th day of October following at the Star-Chamber in Westmin. the Commissioners met again, & there pronounced sentence against her; Ratifying by their Seals and Subscriptions, that after the first day of June, in the Seven and twentieth year of our Sovereign Lady Queen Elizabeth, divers matters were compassed and imagined in this Kingdom, by Anthony Babington & others, with the privy of Mary Queen of Scots, pretending Title to the Crown of England, tending to the hurt, death, and destruction of the Royal Person of our said Sovereign Lady the Queen.

After a few dayes, a Parliament was holden at Westminster, the which was begun by Authority from the Queen derived to the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Treasurer, and the Earl of Derby; and the same, not without some Presidents. At this Parliament, the Proscription of the Lord Paget, Charles Paget, Francis Inglefield, Francis Throgmorton, Anthony Babington, Thomas Salisbury, Edward Jones, Chydiock, Tichburn, Charles Tilney, and other the Complices was confirmed, and their goods and possessions adjudged confiscate. Also the Peers of the Kingdom with an unanimous consent, exhibit a Petition to the Queen by the Lord Chancellor, That for the preservation of the true Religion, & safety of the Queen, of themselves, and their Posterity, the Sentence passed against Mary Queen of Scots, might according to Law be presently promulged: They put the Queen in mind of the fearful Examples of Gods Judgments extant in Scripture, upon King Saul, for sparing of Agag

And the Qu. Council open the Crimes with which she was charged.

Upon which afterward, in the Star-chamber, Sentence was pronounced against her.

And in a Parliament presently following, the Lords petition the Queen that the Sentence passed against her might presently be promulged.

and upon Abab; for not putting Benhadad to death. But the Queen answereth them to this effect: First, acknowledging Gods miraculous preservation of her, and then their constant affection towards her, for whose sakes only she desires to live: Otherwise, when she calls to mind things past, beholds the present, and expects what may happen in time to come, that she accounts them most happy, who go soonest hence. That the Law lately made, by which the Queen of Scots is condemned, was not made (as some maliciously have imagined) to ensnare her, but contrariwise, to forewarn and deter her from attempting any thing against it, which though it had not been made, yet were there other antient Laws enough to condemn her. Nothing could have bin more grievous to me, than that a Prince, and one so near allied unto me, should deserve the sentence pronounced against her; and seeing the matter is of rare example, and of a very weighty consequence, I hope you will not expect, that I should at this present determine any thing; yet that there may be no danger in delay, I will in due time signifie my mind unto you; and in the mean time, would have you expect from me, whatsoever good Subjects look for from a Gracious Prince.

A while after the Qu. entreats the Lords to think of some way by which the Qu. of Scots's life may be saved, and her own not endangered. The Lords return answer, That there can be no way of her safety but the Queen of Scots's death.

Twelve dayes after, having deeply weighed the matter in her mind, she sent the Lord Chancellor to the Peers, and Puckering to the Lower-House, entreating them to advise more diligently concerning so weighty a matter, and to bethink themselves of some wholesome remedy, by which the life of the Queen of Scots might be spared, and their security also provided for. They, when they had a long time in a most serious manner deliberated hereof, return at last this Verdict, That the Queens life could not be in safety, while the Queen of Scots lived, unless she either repented and acknowledged her Crimes, or were kept in strait custody, or bound by her Oath and Obligations, or gave Hostages; or lastly departed the Kingdom. And seeing none of these were likely to be remedies, it remained, that only her death would be a remedy. Repentance in her they could little hope for, who would not so much as acknowledge her self faulty: Close imprisonment, Obligations, Oath, and Hostages, they accounted as nothing, which all vanished, if the Queens life were once taken away; and if she departed the Kingdom, they feared she would straightway go about to invade it again. These things the Lord Chancellor, and Puckering the Speaker of the Lower-House, declared to the Queen at large, and urged her in their names, to have the Sentence put in execution. Hereupon the Queen after a short pause, spake at last to this effect: I protest, my chief desire hath been, that for your security, and my own safety, some other way might be devised, than that which is now propounded; but seeing it now evident and certain, that my safety without her destruction, is in a more deplorable estate, I am most grievously affected with inward sorrow; that I, who have pardoned so many Rebels, have neglected so many Treasons (either by connivence, or silence) should now at last exercise cruelty upon a Prince so nearly allied to me. As for your Petition, I beseech you to rest in an Answer, without an Answer: If I say, I will not grant your Petition,

I shall happily say what I mean not; If I should say, I will grant it, then cast I my self into destruction headlong, whose safety you so earnestly desire; and that I know, you in your wisdoms would not I should do.

After this, the Parliament was prorogued, and then were the Lord Buckhurst, and Beal sent to the Queen of Scots, to let her understand that Sentence was pronounced against her, and confirmed by Parliament, and that the execution of it was earnestly desired by the Nobility and the Commons; and therefore perswaded her, that before her death, she would make acknowledgment of her offences against God and the Queen; intimating, that if she lived, the Religion received in England, could not subsist. Hereupon she was taken with an unwonted alacrity, and seemed to triumph for joy, giving God thanks, and gratulating her own felicity, That she should be accounted an Instrument, for establishing Religion in this Island; and therewith requested, she might have some Catholick Priest to administer the Sacrament to her; but was denied, which some deemed, not inhumane only, but tyrannical and heathenish. The Bishop and the Dean, whom for this cause they commended to her, she utterly rejected, and jeered at the English Nation, saying, The English were ever and anon wont to murder their own Kings, and therefore no marvel, they should now thirst after her destruction. In December following the Sentence against her was proclaimed in London first, and after over all the Kingdom, wherein Queen Elizabeth seriously protested, that this promulgation of the Sentence was extorted from her, to her great grief, by the importunity of the whole body of the Kingdom. The Qu. of Scots being told hereof, seemed not a whit dejected with it: but writing to the Queen, never maketh intercession for her self, nor expostulateth her death, but only makes three small requests; one, That she might be buried in France by her Mother; another, That she might be put to death privately, but her servants to be present; the third, That her servants might freely depart, and enjoy such Legacies as she had given them. Of which Requests, she desired the Queen to vouchsafe her answer; but whether this Letter ever came to Queen Elizabeth, is uncertain.

This condemnation of the Queen of Scots, as a thing strange, and scarce credible, was soon spread far & near; so as intercessions came thick in her behalf to Queen Elizabeth, but especially from the King of Scots, and the King of France, who sent their several Ambassadors, using all the reasons that natural affection in the one, and likeness of condition in the other could urge, for sparing of her life; but when the necessity of the State seemed to obstruct all wayes of clemency, the French Ambassador L' Aubespine, falleth from reasons to action, and thinketh no way so effectual for saving of the Queen of Scots life, as to take away Queen Elizabeth's life; and thereupon first, he dealeth covertly with William Stafford, a young Gentlemen, and prone to embrace hopes (whose Mother was of the Bed-chamber to Qu. Elizabeth, & his Brother at that time, Ambassador Liege in France) and afterward more openly by Trappe his Secretary, to murder the Queen. Stafford, though not daring to act such a Villany him-

Upon this the Qu. of Scots is made acquainted with the Lords Petition to have the Sentence executed, at which she seemed to rejoice.

himself, yet commended one Moody to him a resolute fellow, and one that for Money would be sure to do it. Upon this Stafford brings Trappe to Moody, being then in the common Gaol, who upon Trapps offer, undertakes it: But then the consultation was, by what way it should be done. Moody propounded poison, or else to lay a bag of Gunpowder under the Queens bed, and suddenly fire it. But Trappe liked of neither of these wayes, but would rather have it done, as was done to the Prince of Orange. But while they are thus consulting about the way of doing it, Stafford discovers all to the Lords of the Council: Whereupon Trappe who was now bound for France, was apprehended, and being examined, confessed the whole matter. Upon this, the Ambassador himself was sent for to Cecils house, the twelfth of January; where met him by the Qu. appointment, Cecil Lord Treasurer, the Earl of Leicester, Sir Christopher Hatton Vice-Chamberlain, and Davyson one of her Secretaries; who declare to the Ambassadors every particular which Stafford, Moody, and Trappe his Secreatry had confessed. As soon as Stafford was brought forth, and began to speak, the Ambassador interrupted him, and reviling him, made asseveration, that Stafford first propounded it; when Stafford falling on his knees, made fearful imprecations, that the Ambassador first propounded it himself. But whosoever propounded it (saith Burleigh) in appears that you were made acquainted with the matter. To which he presently replied; that if he had known of any such thing, yet being he was an Ambassador, he ought not to give notice of it, but to his own King. After much reasoning in this manner, the Lord Burleigh admonished him to beware how he offended hereafter in this kind; and let him know, That he is not quitted from the offence, though for this time the Queen be pleased to forbear him.

Qu. Eliz. terrified with many rumors, seals a Warrant for executing her.

But upon this Treason, the Queen of Scots Adversaries put many terrours into Queen Elizabeths mind, giving out that the Spanish Navy was come to Milford Haven, That the Scots were broken into England; That the Duke of Guyse with a great Army was landed in Stafford; That the Queen of Scots was escaped out of Prison, & had gotten a Company up in Arms, and many other such feigned suggestions; Through which, at length they drew the Queen to this: That she sealed Letters for executing the Sentence against the Queen of Scots; and one of the greatest persuaders to it (as the Scots reported it) was one whom the King of Scots had sent to dissuade her from it; namely Patrick Grey, who sounded often in her ears, Mortua non mordet, when she his dead she cannot bite,

But being long in suspense about it, at last she command-

The Qu. notwithstanding, began to weigh with herself, whether it were better to rid her out of the way, or else to spare her; and many great reasons offered themselves on both sides, but where only speculative reasons presented themselves for sparing her, many practical reasons, and those pressed both by Courtiers & Preachers, were presented to her; so as long holden in suspense, she would oftentimes sit speechless, and her countenance cast down; at last, her fear prevailing, she delivered to Secretary Davyson, Letters under her hand & Seal, to get the Commission made under the great Seal of England, for the Execution of the Qu. of Scots, which might be in a readiness upon any fear of danger; charging him not to disclose the matter to any whomsoever. But the next day her mind was altered, and sent Sir William Killebrew to Davyson, to countermand the making of the Commission. Whereupon Davyson goes to her, and lets her know, That the commission was already made, and the Seal put to it; Whereat the Queen extremely angry, rebuketh him sharply for his hastiness; yet Davyson imparteth the matter to Privy-Counsellors; and persuades them, That the Queen commanded, the Commission should be put in execution. Hereupon Beale Clark of the Council is sent down with Letters, wherein authority is deputed to the Earls of Shrewsbury, Kent, Derby, Cumberland, and others, that she should be put to death according to the Law, with which proceeding the Q. was not once made acquainted; & more than this, although she had intimated to Davyson, That she would take some other order concerning the Queen of Scots, yet did not he stay Beale from going.

And now comes in the last Act of the Queen of Scots Tragedy; for as soon as the Earls were come to Fotheringay; they together with Sir Amias Paulet, and Sir Drue Drury, with whom she was then in custody, go unto her, and reading the Commission, signifie the cause of their coming; and in a few words, admonish her to prepare her self for death, for that she must dye the next day: whereto, without any change of countenance or passion of mind, she made answer; I had not thought that my Sister the Queen would have consented to my death, who am not subject to your Laws; but since it is her pleasure, death shall be to me most welcome. Then she requesteth, that she might confer with her Confessor, and Melvyn her Steward, which would not be granted: The Bishop or Dean of Peterborough they offered her, but them she refused. The Earls being departed, she gave order that Supper should be hastned, where she eat (as she used to do) soberly, and sparingly; and perceiving her men and women servants to lament and weep, she comforteth them, and bids them rather rejoyce, that she was now to depart out of a world of misery. After Supper she looketh over her Will, read the Inventory of her Goods and Jewels, and writ their names severally by them, to whom she gave any of them; at her wonted hour she went to bed, and after a few hours sleep, awaking, spent the rest of the night in her Devotion. And now the fatal day being come, which was the eighth of February, she getteth up, and makes her ready in her best Apparel, and then betook herself in her closet to Almighty God, imploring his assistance with deep sighs and groans; until Thomas Andrews Sheriff of the County gave notice that it was time to come forth, and then with a Princely Majesty, and Cheerful Countenance she came out, her head covered with a linnen Vail, and carrying an Ivory Crucifix in her hand; In the Gallery the Earls met her, and the other Gentlemen, where Melvyn her servant upon his bended knees, deplored his own fortune that he should be the messenger to carry this sad news into Scotland; whom she comforted, saying, Do not lament Melvyn, Thou shalt by and by see Mary Steward freed from all cares. Then turned Secretary Davyson to get the Commission made: but not disclose the matter to any. Yet Davyson acquaints divers of the Privy-Council with it: Hereupon Beale is sent down to give authority to the E. of Shrewsbury and others to see her executed.

The Commissioners acquaint her with it, with which she was not a whit daunted.

She makes her Will.

Her devout carriage at her death.

turning her self to the Earls, she requested that her Servants might stand by her at her death, which the Earl of Kent was very loth to grant, for fear of Superstition, to whom she said, Fear nothing, these poor wretches desire only to give me my last farewell. I know the Queen my Sister would not deny me so small a request. After this the two Earls and the Sheriff of the County leading the way, she came to the Scaffold, which was set up at the upper end of the Hall, where was a Chair, a Cushion, and a Block, all covered with Mourning. Then the Dean of Peterborough going to Prayers, she falling upon her knees, and holding up the Crucifix, in both her hands, prayed with her servants in Latine, out of the Office of the blessed Virgin. Prayers being ended, she kissed the Crucifix and signing her self with the sign of the Cross, said, As thy Arms, O Christ, were spread forth upon the Cross, so embrace me with the open arms of thy mercy, and forgive me my sins. Then the Executioner asking her pardon, she forgave him. And now her women helping off her outer Garments, and breaking forth into shrieks and cries, she kissed them, signed them with the Cross, and willed them to leave lamenting for now an end of her sorrows was at hand; and then shadowing her face with a linnen cloth, and lying down on the Block, she repeated the Psalm, In te Domini speravi ne confundar in aeternum; at which words she stretching forth her Body, her head at two blows was taken off. Her body was afterward Royally buried in the Cathedral Church at Peterborough; but since that, her Noble Son James, King of Great Britain, erected a Royal Monument for her, in King Henry the Seventh's Chapel at Westminster. This end had Mary Queen of Scots, in the Six and fortieth year of her age, and of her Imprisonment in England the eighteenth; a Lady so compleat in all excellent parts of body and mind, that it must needs have made her a happy woman, if she had not been a Queen; and perhaps a happy Queen too, if she had not been Heir to the Crown of England; For why did all her Endeavours want success, but only from the fear of that Succession? and no innocency of hers could be a Defence, where the fury of Jealousie made the Assault.

She is be-headed.

Her Age when she died.

Qu. Eliz. hearing of her death is infinitely dejected.

And soon after writes to the King of Scots to satisfy him in it, that it was done against her meaning.

Davyson is cited in the Star-chamber, & charg'd

As soon as it came to the Queens knowledge that the Queen of Scots was put to death, her Countenance grew dejected, and her speech failed her, insomuch that all in mourning weeds, she gave her self over to sorrow, commanded her Counsellors from her Presence, & caused Davyson to be cited to the Star-Chamber. And as soon as grief would suffer her, she wrote a Letter with her own hand to the King of Scots, & sent it by Sir Robert Cary, to this effect; That her mind was infinitely disquieted, in regard of this lamentable event, against her meaning and intent; entreating him to believe, That if she had commanded it, she would never have denyed it, and withal protesting her true affection towards him, and her assiduous watchfulness for the prospering of his affairs.

While Cary was on his journey, Davyson is cited to the Star-Chamber before these Delegates, Sir Christopher Wray Chief Justice of the Kings-Bench, for that time made Lord Privy Seal the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Earls of Worcester, Cumberland and Lincoln, the Lords Gray, and Lumley, Sir James Croft, Comptroller of the Queens House, Sir Walter Mildmay Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Edmund Anderson, Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and Sir Roger Manwood, Lord Chief Baron (where note, that Bromley Lord Chancellour, Burleigh Lord Treasurer, Leicesier, and Hatton, who were indeed more guilty of the fact than Davyson, were none of the number.) Before these Delegates, Popham the Queens Attorney layeth to Davysons charge, Contempt of the Queens Majesty, violating of his trust, and neglect of his duty laying open all particulars of his fact; which after Egerton the Queens Solicitor, Gamdy and Puckering, Serjeants at Law, urged also against him with great aggravation: To which Davyson mildly answered, That he would not contest with the Queen: only protests, That if he had done any thing otherwise then he ought, it was out of ignorance and mistaking, and not out of any purpose to disobey her Majesty. It seems the Queen had carried her self as one that would have it done, and yet was loth to do it, scarce knowing her own mind, and yet would have another know it; meaning to make it the work of mistaking, rather then of purpose. that so at least she might leave some place of satisfaction to her self, that it was not absolutely of her doing.

And his Answer.

The pleadings ended, the Commissioners went to censure; Manwood began, and gave his Opinion, That Davyson for the inconsiderateness of his fact, should be fined ten thousand pounds, and imprisoned during the Queens pleasure; the rest went on in that Sentence, only the Lord Gray excused Davyson so far, That he thought him worthy of reward rather than of punishment; The conclusion was, the first Sentence for his Fine and Imprisonment, was by Wray Keeper of the Privy Seal confirmed; and Davyson never after recovered the Queens favour, though she relieved him sometimes in his necessity. A man ingenious indeed, but not thoroughly acquainted with the wayes of the Court; and thought to have been raised to this place, of purpose to act this part, and for nothing else.

By this time Sir Robert Cary, Son to the Lord Hunsdon, who was sent to excuse the Queen, was come to the Borders; but being come thither, was not suffered to set foot in Scotland; The King would scarce hear him by another, and with much ado received his Letters. He called home his Ambassador out of England, and thought of nothing but revenge.

The K. of Scots will not admit the Qu. Messengers, and threatens revenge.

But the Queen still laying the fault upon Davyson, and the unadvised credulity of her Counsellors, by little and little allayeth his passion; & expecting till time had somewhat asswaged his grief, that it would indure to be toucht, at length by her Agents in Scotland; & soon after by the Lord Hunsdon Governour of Berwick, she admonished him, how dangerous it would be for him, to break out into war against England, and what little help he could justly expect from either Spain or France; but if he persisted in amity with England, he might be sure the Queen of England would most lovingly account him for her Son; & to the end that he should assure himself, that the Queen his Mother was put to death without her privy, she sent him the sentence against Davyson, Qu. Eliz. seeks to pacifie him, & by what reasons.

son, under the Seals of all the Delegates, and attested under the Great Seal of England; and another Instrument likewise signed with the hands of the Judges of England; in which they aver, That the Sentence against the Queen of Scots, could in no wise be prejudice to his right in the Succession.

Drake is sent to the Coast of Spain, and what mischiefs he did the K.
Having now by these and the like Courses somewhat asswaged the King of Scots indignation; to prevent the war which they foresaw was imminent from the King of Spain, they sent forth Drake with four of the Queens ships and others, unto the Coast of Spain, to set upon their ships in the Havens, and to intercept their Munition. Drake entering into the Port of Cales, sunk, took, and fired about an hundred Ships, wherein was great store of Munition and Victuals: Then returning to the Cape of St. Vincent, he set upon three Forts, and compelled them to yield. Thence setting sail to the Western Islands, called Azores under the great Meridian; by great good fortune he hapned upon an huge and wealthy Carrack, called St. Philip, returning from the East-Indies, and easily vanquished it; Whereupon the Mariners on both sides, from the name of Philip, portended no good luck to Philip King of Spain.

And the like also did Tho. Cavendish of Suffolk.
At the same time, Thomas Cavendish of Suffolk, in the other part of the World, who two years before had set sail from England with 3 ships, passing through the Straits of Magellan, in the Coast of Chily, Peru, and Nova Hispania, fired a great number of Spanish Towns, took and pillaged Nineteen great Ships, and amongst them a wealthy ship of the Kings nigh unto Caliphornia, in North America; and so by the Philippine Isles, the Molucces, the Cape de bone Esperance, and the Island of St. Helene, returned home the next year, being the third after Magellan, that failed about the World.

York and Stanley in the Low-Countries, perfidiously delivered up Towns to the Spaniards, and their ends.
As Drake and Cavendish at this time gained great fame and renown; so two other men in the Netherlands (Stanley and York) purchased as great infamy and disgrace: This York was a Londoner, a bold fellow, and of loose behaviour; famous for bringing first into England, the manner of turning the point upon the Adversary in single Combats, whereas the English till this time were wont to be armed with Bucklers and Swords, and to strike with edge, and it held no manhood to turn the point, or strike below the Girdle. He suffered some affront from the Earl of Leicester, fled away, and for a time, served under the Spaniards in the Netherlands, till at last being reconciled to Leicester, he was set over the Fort near Zutphen; but being bribed, he not only yielded up the place to the Enemy, but drew to the like villany one Stanley, who with great valour had served in an Irish Expedition, to yield up Daventry to the Spaniards, a Wealthy and well fortified Town. But what got they by their treachery? The Spaniards set York and Stanley at variance, they poyson York, and seize upon his goods, his Carcase was three years after digged up by the States Commandment, and hanged upon a Gibbet till it rotted away; Stanley went into Spain, where there was no credit given to him; for the Spaniards have a saying, It is lawful to give honor to a Traytor sometimes, but never to trust him.

These late Treacheries wrought the Earl of Leicester much Envy with the Confederate Netherlands, because the Traytors were very intimate with him; whereupon the States in large letters to the Queen, accuse Leicester for his ill managing of the Weal Publick, in the matter of money, Merchandize, and Military affairs; and to his credulity, they impute the harm which accrued by York and Stanly. The Queen, for the narrow lifting of the matter, and composing it; sent thither Thomas Sackville, Lord Buckhurst (lately taken into her Privy Council in Leicester's absence) Norris and Bartholomew Clerk: But when the officious diligence of Buckhurst, seemed to trench upon Leicesters Reputation; his grace with the Queen prov'd so forcible, that Buckhurst, at his return, was for certain months confined to his house.

Afterward Sluce being beleaguered by the Prince of Parma, Leicester was by the States sent for out of England, to succour it; the Town was furiously assaulted with Seventeen thousand great shot, and a mighty breach was made into it; which nevertheless Roger Williams, Francis Vere, Nicholas Baskerville, with the Garrison of the English and Walloons, valiantly defended for a while, but at last were enforced to yield it up; Leicester, that came to relieve it, finding himself too weak for the Besiegers, being gone away. And indeed, the States would not commit any great Army to his Command; who (they knew) had a determination to seize Leyden, and some other Towns into his own hands, and had a purpose to surprize the absolute Government. Whereupon the States used means, that Leicester was called home, gave up the Government to the States, and in his room succeeded Maurice of Nassaw, Son to the Prince of Orange, being now but twenty years of age. Perigrine Lord Wiloughby, was by the Queen made General of the English Forces in the Low-Countries, to whom the gave command to reduce the English Factions into the States Obedience; the which, with the help of Prince Maurice, he easily effected.

Leicester being now come home, and perceiving that an Accusation was preparing against him by Buckhurst and others, for his unfaithful managing of Affairs in Holland; privately with tears he cast himself down at the Queens feet, entreating her, that she should not receive him with disgrace at his return, whom she had sent forth in honour; and so far prevailed with her, that the next day being called to examination before the Lords, he took his place amongst them, not kneeling down at the end of the Table, as the manner of Delinquents is; and when the Secretary began to read the heads of his Accusation, he interrupted him, saying, That the Publick Instructions which he had receiv'd, were limited with private restriction; and making his appeal to the Queen eluded the whole crimination, with the secret indignation of his Adversaries.

This Year was famous for the Death of many great Personages: In the month of February, dyed Henry Nevill Lord of Aburgaveny, great Grandchild to Edward Nevill, who in the Reign of King Henry the Sixth, got his Title in right of his Wife, only Daughter and Heir to Richard Beauchamp Earl of Worcester, and Lord of Aburgaveny;

Upon the complaint of the States against the E. of Leicester, the Lord Buckhurst is sent to examine his doings.

Leicester is called home, and gives up the Government to the States.

Being called to examination before the Lords of the Council, how he eludes it.

gaveny; In which right, when as the only Daughter of this Henry, wife to Sir Thomas Fane, challenged the Title of Barones of Aburgaveny, a memorable Contention arose concerning the Title between her and the next Heir Male, to whom by Will (and the same confirmed by Authority of Parliament) the Castle of Aburgaveny was bequeath'd. This question being a long time debated; at last, in a Parliament holden in the Second year of King James, the matter was tryed by Voices; and the Heir Male carried the Lordship of Aburgaveny; and the Barony Le Dispencer, was ratified to the Female. This year also in the month of April, dyed Anne Stanhope, Dutcheffs of Somerset Ninety years old, who being the Wife of Edward Seymour Duke of Somerset, and Protector of England, contended for Precedence with Katharine Parre, Queen Dowager to King Henry the Eighth. There dyed also Sir Ralph Sadler Chancellor of the Dutchy of Lancaster, the last Banneret of England, with which Dignity he was adorned at the Battel of Musselborough in Scotland. After him dyed Thomas Bromley Lord Chancellor of England; and six dayes after, he, whom the Queen meant should have succeeded him, Edward Earl of Rutland; but he now failing, Sir Christopher Hatton was made Lord Chancellor, who though he were a Courtier, yet the Queen knowing him to be an honest man, thought him not unfit for the Place, where Conscience hath, or should have more place than Law: Although some were of Opinion, That it was not so much the Queens own choice, as that she was perswaded to it by some that wisht him not well; both thereby to be a cause of absenting him from the Court, and thinking that such a sedentary place, to a corpulent man that had been used to exercise, would be a means to shorten his life; and indeed he lived not full out three years after.

This year Sir John Perrot was called home out of Ireland, and left all in great quiet to Fitz-Williams his Successor. For hitherto the English found it no hard matter to vanquish the Irish, by reason of their unskilfulness in Arms; eight hundred Foot, and three hundred horse, was held an invincible Army: but after by Perrots command, they were exercised in Feats of Arms, and taught to discharge Muskets at a Mark, and had in the Low-Countries learned the Art of Fortification, they held the English better to it, and were not so easily overcome.

And now we are come to the one and twentieth year of Queen Elizabeths Reign, being the year 1588, long before spoken of by Astrologers, to be a wonderful year, and even the Climacterical year of the World. And yet the greatest Wonder that happened this year, was but the wonderful Fleet that Spain provided for invading of England, if the defeat of that wonderful Fleet were not a greater wonder.

It is true, there was at this time a Treaty of Peace between England and Spain; and the Earl of Derby, the Lord Cobham, Sir James Crofts, Dale and Rogers Doctors of Law, Commissioners for the Queen; for the Prince of Parma, the Count Aremberg, Champignie, Richardot, Mais, and Garvyer, Doctors, had many meetings about it near to Ostend; but it seemed on the part of Spain, rather to make the English secure, that they should not make provision for war, than that they had any purpose of real proceeding, seeing they accepted not of any reasonable Conditions that were offered, but trifled out the time, till the Spanish Navy was come upon the Coast, and the Ordnance heard from Sea, and then dismissed the English Delegates.

The Spanish Navy consisted of one hundred and thirty Ships; whereof Galeasses and Gallies seventy two, goodly ships, like to floating Towers; in which were Souldiers 19290; Mariners, 8050; Gally-slaves, 2080; Great Ordnance, 2630. For the greater holiness of their Action, twelve of their Ships were called the twelve Apostles. Chief Commander of the Fleet was Don Alphonso, Duke of Medina; and next to him, John Martin Recalde, a great Sea-man. The twentieth of May they weighed Anchor from the River Tagus, but were by tempest so miserably disperst, that it was long ere they met again: but then they sent before to the Prince of Parma, That he with his Forces, consisting of fifty thousand old Souldiers, should be ready to joyn with them, and with his Shipping conduct them into England, and to land his Army at the Thames Mouth.

The Queens Preparation in the mean time was this; The Lord Charles Howard, Lord Admiral, with all her Navy, and Sir Francis Drake Vice-Admiral, were to be ready at Plimouth; and the Lord Henry Seymour (second son to the Duke of Somerset) with forty English and Dutch ships, to keep the Coasts of the Netherlands, to hinder the Prince of Parma's coming forth. Then for Land Service, there were laid along the Southern Coast, twenty thousand Souldiers, and two Armies besides of Trained men were levied; over one of which, consisting of a thousand Horse, and two and twenty thousand Foot, the Earl of Leicester commanded, and pitched his Tents at Tilbury, near the Thames mouth: Over the other, appointed to guard the Queens Person, and consisting of four and twenty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse, the Lord Hunsdon was General. Arthur Lord Grey, Sir Francis Knolles, Sir John Norris, Sir Richard Bingham, Sir Roger Williams, and other Military men, were chosen to make a council of war, & consult how the Land Service should be ordered. These declared amongst other things, That the places which lay fittest for the Enemies landing, as Milford haven, Falmouth, Plimouth, Portland, the Isle of Wight, Portsmouth, the Downs, the Thames mouth, Harwich, Yarmouth, Hull, and such other, should be fortified with works and Garrisons; the Train'd Souldiers of those Shires, which lay near the Sea Coast, should defend those places, and be ready at the Alarm to hinder the Enemy from Landing; but if he did land, then to spoil the country round about, that he might find no Food; and by continual crying, Arm, Arm, give the Enemy no rest, but yet should not give Battle, till good store of Commanders were come together.

At this time many fearing the Papists at home no less than the Spaniards abroad, perswaded the Queen to take off the heads of some of the greatest of them; but she detesting such cruelty, took order only, That some of them should be committed to custody to Wibych Castle.

And

Anne Stanhope Dutcheffs of Somerset dies of great age.

Sir Ralph Sadler dies, the last Banneret of England.

Sir Christopher Hatton is made Lord Chancellor.

In the time of a Treaty of Peace between England & Spain, the K. of Spain sends his great Armado against England.

Of what number of Ships the Armado consisted: and who was General.

The Queens preparations both by Sea and Land to resist it.

Many Papists are committed to custody in Wibych Castle.

And now all things on both sides prepared, the Spanish Navy set forth out of the Groyne in May, but was dispersed and driven back by weather. The English Navy set forth somewhat later out of Plimouth, bearing up towards the Coast of Spain; but partly by occasion of contrary winds, partly by advertisement that the Spaniards were gone back, and upon some doubt also that they might pass by towards the Coast of England, whilst they were seeking them afar off, they returned to Plimouth: At which time, a confident (though false) advertisement came to the Admiral, That the Spaniards could not possibly come forward that year: whereupon the English Navy was upon the point of disbanding, and many of the men were gone on shore, when suddenly the invincible Armada (for so it was called in a Spanish ostentation) was discovered upon the Western Coast: whereof the Lord-Admiral being informed, had much ado to get the Queen's Navy out of the Haven (the wind being contrary) yet at length he haled it forth. The next day, the English beheld the Spanish Ships, in height like to Castles, sailing slowly along, whom they suffered peaceably to pass by, that they might have the benefit of the wind to follow after. The one and twentieth day of July, the Admiral of England sent a Pinnace before, called The Defiance, which by a great shot, challenged the Spaniards to fight, and by and by they fell to it. Then Drake, Hawkins, and Forbisher, let fly against the outmost Squadron, which Recalde commanded, making him glad to fly to their main Navy for succour. The night following, a mighty Biskayner of Oquenda's (in which the King of Spain's Treasure was) was by chance fired with Gun-powder, but was timely quenched by other Ships sent to her succour; one of which Ships, was the Galeon of Don Pedro, whom Sir Francis Drake took Prisoner, and sent him to Dartmouth. The Biskayner it self (the Treasure being taken out by the Spaniards) they left behind them, which the English brought in to the Haven at Weymouth.

The three and twentieth day of this month they had a second fight, in which most of the Spanish shot flew over the English Ships, and never hurt them; onely Cock an English man, being with his little Vessel in the midst of the Enemies, died valiantly. The four and twentieth day they rested on both sides; in which time the Lord Admiral ranked his whole Fleet into four Squadrons: The first he ruled himself, Drake the second, Hawkins the third, and Forbisher the fourth.

The five and twentieth day (which was Saint James's day) they fell to it the third time; in which Fight, the English had again the better, so as after this time, the Spaniards would no more turn upon the English, but holding on their course dispatched a Messenger to the Prince of Parma; requiring him forthwith to joyn himself to the King's Fleet, and withall to send them Bullets.

The day following, the Lord Admiral knighted Thomas Howard, the Lord Sheffield, Roger Townsend, John Hawkins, and Martin Forbisher; and holding a Council of War, they decreed not to set again upon the Enemy, till they came to the straight of Calice, where the Lord Henry

Seymor and Sir William Winter waited for their coming. And now so far were the English from being terrified with this invincible Navy, that many of the Nobility and other of special note, hired Ships at their own charges, and came to the Admiral; as the Earls of Oxford, Northumberland, Cumberland, Thomas and Robert Cecil, Henry Brook, Sir Charles Blunt, Sir Walter Rawleigh, Sir William Hatton, Sir Robert Cary, Sir Ambrose Willoughby, Sir Thomas Gerard, Sir Arthur Gorge, and others.

The seven and twentieth of July, towards the Evening, the Spaniards cast Anchor near unto Calice, and not far from them rode the English Admiral, within shot of a great Ordnance, to whom Seymor and Winter joyned themselves: so as by this time there were in the English Navy a hundred and forty Ships, nimble and serviceable for Fighting or Sailing, yet onely fifteen of them bore the stroke of the Battel. And now again the Spaniards sent post after post to the Prince of Parma to send them forty fly-boats, without which they were not able to skirmish with the English, by reason of the greatness and unweildiness of their Ships, and importune him presently to put to Sea with his Army; but he was unprepared, and his Flat-bottomed Boats were full of chinks, and leaked; and besides, the Hollanders hovered before the ports of Dunkirk and Newport, in such sort, that he durst not look forth.

The eight and twentieth day, the Lord-Admiral made ready eight of his worst Ships, on the out-side dawbed with Wild-fire, Rozin and Brimstone, within full of combustible matter, and under the Conduct of Young and Prowse, sent them down with the wind in the silent time of the night towards the Spanish Fleet; the which when the Spaniards saw approach them, and the Sea as it were all on a light fire, imagining withall, that those Fire-ships might carry in them some murdering Engine, they made a hideous noise, took up Anchors, cut Cables, spread Sails, and betook themselves to their Oars, but more to flight: One of the Spanish Galeasses having lost her Rudder, and floating up and down, was held in fight by Amias Preston, Thomas Gerard, and Harvie, who slew Captain Hugh Moncado, cast the Souldiers over board, and carried away a great deal of Gold, but the Vessel and Ordnance was wreck to the Governour of Calice.

Drake and Fenner in the mean while perceiving the Spanish Fleet to gather together again before Graveling, set upon them with great violence, to whom straightways Fenton, Southwell, Beefton, Cross, and Riman joyn themselves; and soon after the Admiral himself, Sir Thomas Howard, and the Lord Sheffield; the Galeon called Saint Matthew, was sorely battered by Seymor and Winter, driven toward Ostend, and set upon again by the Zealanders, and at last was taken by the Flushingens.

And now the Spanish Navy having want of many necessaries, and no hope of the Prince of Parma's coming, they resolved to return Northward for Spain; in which passage they lost both many Ships and men; the English Navy still following them close, till they were fain to give them over for want of Powder. Whilst these things passed at Sea, the Queen in person came to Tilbury, to view the Army and Camp there, where where she shewed such undaunted Courage and Resolution, that it wonderfully animated the spirits of them all.

And thus this Navy, which was three whole Years in preparing, in the space of a Month was often beaten, and at length put to flight, many of their men being slain, more than half of their Ships taken and sunk (of the English not above a hundred at the most missing, nor so much as a Ship, but Cock's little Vessel) and sailing about all Britain by Scotland, the *Orkeney*s and Ireland, they returned into Spain with as much dishonour as they came out with boasting, for indeed Mendoza in France by a Book in Print, triumphed before the Victory.

Queen Elizabeth comes to Paul's, and gives publick thanks to God for this Victory.

The King of Scots is reconcil'd to the Queen.

The Earl of Leicester d.es.

Philip Earl of Arundel is cited to be tried by his Peers, by whom he is condemned, but the Queen spares his life.

For the happy success of this Action, Queen Elizabeth appointed Prayers and Thanksgiving over all the Churches in England, and she (as it were in Triumph) came in Person, attended with a great Troop of Nobility into the City, and went into the Cathedral Church of St. Paul (where the Banners taken from the Enemy were placed in view) and there in most humble manner gave thanks to Almighty God. And that which increased the publick joy, was the News which Sir Robert Sidney brought out of Scotland, That the King had over-past all injuries, was lovingly affected towards the English, and desired to embrace sincere and perfect amity with the Queen. For as for the King of Spain, he wittily told the Embassadour, that he expected no other courtesie from him, but such as Polyphemus promised Ulysses, that he should be the last whom he would devour.

And now dyed the great Earl of Leicester the fourth day of September, at his Mannor of Killingworth, of a violent Feaver; I may well say the great Earl, considering the many great Honors he enjoyed, which are extant in the Story; yet one honour greater than he had before, he effected even then when he was ready to go out of the World, and that was, To be Vice-gerent in the high Government of England and Ireland, for which the Patent was already drawn, and had been sealed, but that Burleigh and Hatton shewed the Queen how dangerous a thing it might prove, for so great Authority to reside in one Subject. He was while he lived in so great favour with the Queen, that some thought (and himself not the least) that she meant to marry him; yet when he died his Goods were sold at an Out-cry to make payment of the Debts he owed her.

About this time Philip Earl of Arundel, who three years before had been cast in prison, was now cited in Westminster-Hall, to the Judgment of his Peers, and Henry Earl of Derby was made High Steward of England for the time. The matters laid to his Charge were these: That he had contracted friendship with Cardinal Allen, Parsons the Jesuite, and other Traytors, exciting divers both abroad and at home to restore the Romish Religion, promising his assistance thereunto: and for that reason had a purpose to depart the Kingdom. That he was privy to the Bull, in which Pope Sixtus Quintus had deposed the Queen, and given England to the Spaniard; That being imprisoned in the Tower, he caused Mass to be said for the prosperous success of the Spanish Fleet, and for that purpose had framed peculiar Prayers for his own private use. Being demanded whether he were guilty of these things; turning himself to the Judges, he asked them these questions: First, whether it were lawful to heap up so many Crimes together in one Bill of Indictment? They answered, that it was: Then whether Arguments taken from presumptions were of force? They answered, that it was lawful for him to interpose exceptions, if he saw cause. Then again, if he might be Arraigned for those things which were Capital, by the Law made the thirteenth year of the Queen, after that the time expressed in the Act was expired? They promised, they would proceed against him by no Law, but the old Statute of Treason, made in the Reign of King Edward the third. But now again asked, if he were guilty or not? he pleaded, Not Guilty; whereupon Puckering the Queen's Serjeant at Law, Popham Attorney-General, Shuttleworth Serjeant at Law, and Egerton the Queen's Solicitor, in their turns, urged and proved the Crimes objected; some whereof he denied, some he extenuated; but in conclusion was by his Peers found guilty, and condemned; yet the Queen spared his life, and was content with thus much done in terror to the Papists.

It was now in the year 1589. and the two and thirtieth of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when to be in some sort revenged of the Spaniards for their Invasion, she gave leave to Sir John Norris and Sir Francis Drake to undertake an Expedition at their own private Charges, requiring nothing of her but a few Ships of War, who took along with them Anthony the Bastard, laying Claim to the Kingdom of Portugal, and of Souldiers to the number of eleven thousand, of Seamen about fifteen hundred: setting sail from Plimouth the fifth day of April, they arrived at the Groyne in Galizia; whereof with great valour they took first the Lower Town, and afterwards the Higher, and from thence sailing towards Portugal, they met Robert Earl of Essex, who without the Queen's leave had put to Sea; After two days they arrive at Penycha a Town of Portugal, which they took; and left the Castle to Don Antonio, and from thence they march by Land towards Lisbon threescore miles off: The Foot Companies led by Norris, whom Drake promised to follow with the Fleet, being come to the West suburbs of Lisbon, they found no body there but a few poor disarmed Portugals, who cryed out, God save King Antonio. The day following the Spaniards made a sally out, in which Skirmish, Bret, Carefly and Carre (stout Commanders) were slain; yet did the Earl of Essex drive the Spaniards to the very Gates of the City. And having now tarried here two days, and seeing no sign of the Portugals revolting; which Don Antonio had assured them would be, finding fresh supplies come into the Town, their own Army sickly, Victuals and Powder failing; and which was most of all, Sir Francis Drake not bringing the great Ordnance as he promised, they departed from the Suburbs of Lisbon towards Cascais, a little Town at the mouth of the River Tagus, which Town Drake had taken this mean while, who excused his not coming to Lisbon, by reason of the flats he must have passed, and the Castle of Saint Julian Fortified with fifty pieces of great Ordnance. Near this place they found three threescore Hulks of the Hanse Towns of Germany, laden with Corn and all manner of Munition, which they took as good prize towards their Charges, in regard the Queen had forbidden them to carry Victuals or Munition to the Spaniard. From hence they set sail to Virgo, a forlorn Town by the Sea-side, and pillaging all along that Quarter, returned for England, having lost in the Voyage of Souldiers and Mariners about six thousand; yet not so much by the Enemy, as by eating of strange Fruits, and distemper of the Climate.

A Combination, called the Holy League, was made in France.

The head of this League is the Duke of Guise.

Whom the King for his insolent carriage, caused to be murdered in the very Court.

The Confederates make a new Seal, and usurp the Royal Authority. The King is murdered by a Monk. Being ready to die, he declared the K. of Navarre to be his lawfull Successor.

The Cardinal of Bourbon is proclaimed King of France, & at the same time also the King of Navarre.

It concerns the state of England, to look at this time into the state of France, for while those things were in doing between Spain and England, the Popish Princes of France, under pretext of defending the Catholick Religion, entred into a Combination, which they call'd, The Holy League: The purpose whereof was to root out the Protestants, and to divert the Right of Succession to the Crown of France; for they bound themselves to each other by Oath, to suffer no person but a Catholick to be King of France; which was directly to exclude the King of Navarre, and the Prince of Conde, if the present King without Issue-male should fail. The head of this League was the Duke of Guise, who having given some overthrows to the German Forces that came into France in aid of the Protestants, was immeasurably extolled by the Clergy and others; and grew to such a height of Reputation, that entering into Paris, he made the King glad to leave the City, and in an Assembly at Blois, to make him great Master of the French Chivalry, and to consult by Edict, to the cutting off the Protestants. So as the King standing now in fear of him, used means at last, even in the very Court, to have him murdered; and soon after, the Cardinal his Brother to be strangled. Hereupon so great a confusion followed, that the people every where disobeyed the Magistrates, and spoiled the Kings very Palace at Paris. Some Cities affected a Democracy, others an Aristocracy, but few liked of a Monarchy. The Confederates in the mean while made a new Seal, usurped the Royal Authority, seized into their hands the best fortified places, intercept the Kings Revenues, call in Spanish Souldiers, and in all places denounce war and violence against the King. And the King in this case being forced to fly to the Protestants for succour, they then most wickedly, by one James Clement a Monk, made him away. The King being ready to die, Declareth the King of Navarre to be his lawfull Successour, but the Confederates would exclude him as an open Heretick; and yet whom to make choice of they cannot well agree; some would have the Duke of Lorraine, as being descended from the ancient Kings of France; some the Duke of Savoy, as born of the French King's Daughter, a Prince Potent and Courageous; others would have the Duke of Guise's Brother that was murdered; others the King of Spain; but the greatest part gave their Voices for the Cardinal of Bourbon, who was one degree nearer allyed to the slain King, than the King of Navarre his Nephew. He therefore was proclaimed King of France, with the Title of Charles the Tenth; but he being a Priest, the King of Navarre also was at the same time proclaimed King of France, who abode at Diepe, a Sea-Town in Normandy, and doubted not to drive the Cardinal easily out of France.

The King of Navarre being thus raised in Dignity, but weak in means, implored Aid of the Queen of England, offering to make a League Offensive and Defensive; the Queen out of a pious respect to a King of her own Religion, sent him presently two and twenty thousand pound sterling in Gold (such a sum of Gold, as he professed he had never seen at one time before) and withal supplied him with four thousand Souldiers, under the Command of Peregrine Lord Willoughby; for Colonels, she appointed Sir Thomas Wilford, who was made Marshal of the Field, John Boroughs, Sir William Drury, and Sir Thomas Baskerville, and gave them a months pay in hand. Hereupon the Confederates whom the King had vanquished a little before at Argues beyond all expectation, began to quail, and the day before the arrival of the English, they vanished away: with this addition of Forces, the King marcheth to Paris, and being ready to enter the City, caused a retreat to be sounded, as loth to have spoil made of a City which he hoped shortly should be his own. Afterwards by the assistance of the English he won many Towns, and then having marched at least five hundred miles on foot, he gave them leave after a long Winters service, to return into England. In which Voyage, of men of note died Captain Hunnings, but of a natural death, also Stubbs (he whose right hand was cut off for writing the Book against the Queen's marriage) and Sir William Drury slain by Master Boroughs in a single Combat, where the quarrel was, that he being but a Knight, would take place of Boroughs that was the younger Son of a Baron, contrary to the Laws of the English Gentry.

The K. of Navarre is aided by Queen Elizabeth, both with money and men.

Sir William Drury is slain by Mr. Boroughs in a single Combat, upon a quarrel of taking place, the one being a Knight, the other being a Barons younger Son.

About this time, James King of Scots (with Queen Elizabeth's good liking) espoused Anne the Daughter of Frederick the second King of Denmark by his Deputy; but she afterward failing for Scotland, was by tempest cast upon Norway, and there, through continual storms forced to stay, so as the King in the Winter-season set sail thither, that the marriage according to his Vow might be accomplished within the year: some were of opinion, that those storms were caused by witchcraft, and was confirmed indeed by some witches taken in Scotland; who confessed they had rais'd those storms to keep the Queen from landing in Scotland, and that the Earl Bothwell had asked Counsel of them concerning the King's end; who was thereupon cast into prison, but in a short time breaking loose, occasioned new stirs in Scotland.

This year many Noble personages died; Frances Countess of Suffex, Sister to Sir Henry Sidney, Sir Walter Mildmay, Chancellour and Vice-Treasurer of the Exchequer, William Somerset Earl of Worcester, so numerous in his off-spring, that he could reckon more children of both Sexes, than all the Earls of England. Also John Lord Sturton, Henry Lord Compton, and at Bruxels the Lord Paget.

Many great Personages die.

At this time, the Queen, who was always frugal, strained one point of Frugality more than ever she had done before; for upon the information of one Caermarden, (though Leicester, Burleigh and Walsingham were offended, that credit should be given to such a one, and themselves neglected) she raised Thomas Smith the Customer from thirteen thousand pounds yearly, to two and forty thousand pounds, & at last to fifty thousand.

It was now the year 1590. and the three and thirtieth of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, in which the Earl of Cumberland made a Voyage to the Indies, where he laid level to the ground the Fort of the Isle of Fiala, and brought away eight and fifty Pieces of great Ordnance.

This year was fatal to many Noble personages; first dyed Ambrose Dudley Earl of Warwick, (Son to John Duke of Northumberland) without Issue. After him Sir Francis Walsingham Secretary, a man more skilful in the Politicks, than in the Oeconomicks; more cunning in managing matters of the publick State, than of his own private estate, which he left so mean, and dyed so much indebted, that he was fain to be buried by night, without any Funeral pomp, in the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul; leaving behind him one onely Daughter, famous for her three Husbands, all of them the goodliest men of their time; the first, Sir Philip Sidney; the second, Robert Earl of Essex; the third, Richard Burgh Earl of Clanriccard; by King Charles made Earl of Saint Albans. Within two months after Walsingham died Sir Thomas Randol, who had been fourteen times sent in Embassage to several Princes, yet was never rewarded with any greater dignities, than the Chamberlainship of the Exchequer, and the Postmastership of England. Soon after him dyed Sir James Crofts, who had done good service in Scotland, in Edward the Sixth's time; in Queen Mary's time was condemned of High Treason; in Queen Elizabeth's time set at liberty, and made Governour of Berwick, and afterwards Comptroller of her house. After him died George Talbot, the seventh Earl of Shrewsbury of this House; he was made Earl-Marshall of England, and left behind him a memorial of Wisdom and Integrity. Lastly, died Thomas Lord Wentworth, the last of the English that had been Governour of Calice.

In Ireland at this time Hugh Gaveloc (so called, because he had been long kept in Fetters) the natural Son of Chain O Neale, accused Hugh Earl of Tir-Oen, for holding private consultations with certain Spaniards, who in 88 were by Shipwrack cast upon the coast of Ireland: Tir-Oen to prevent the Accusation, took the said Hugh, and when others refused to doe it, took a cord, and with his own hands strangled him. Hereupon he was sent for into England, and came, and upon pardon obtained, solemnly undertook in the presence of the Queen at Greenwich, to maintain the peace with Turlough Leynigh; Not to usurp the Title of O-Neale, nor any authority over the Gentry about him; to reduce the Territory of Tir-Oen to the form of a County, and civil behaviour, and many such matters; giving Hostages for his true performance; and indeed for a time he observed all things very duly. This trouble allayed, another arose; for soon after this, Hugh Roe Mac-Mahon, a Potentate in the Territory of Monagan, compelled those under his Jurisdiction to pay him Tribute; whereupon the Deputy caused him to be taken, and tryed by a Jury of common-Souldiers, and then to be hanged up, dividing his lands amongst certain English, and some of the Mac-Mahons, reserving a certain yearly Rent to the Crown of England, by this means thinking to extinguish the Power and Title of Mac-Mahon. But hereupon, O Rork fearing that he should be served in like manner, took up Arms against the Queen, whom Bingham President of Connaught soon distressed, and drave into Scotland, and at the Queen's request, was by the King delivered up into his hands.

It was now the year 1591. and the four and thirtieth of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when she, careful lest Britany should come into the Spaniards hands, sent Edmund York into France, to advertise the King to take care thereof; and promising to send him Forces to that end, if he would name some Towns, where they might be in safety. Hereupon he named Cherburg, Granville or Brest, as the fittest; and it was agreed, that three thousand English should be sent into Britany and Picardy; but in the mean time Henry Palmer was sent to Sea with certain Ships, who seized upon thirteen Spanish Ships, as they were returning from Nova Francia. And now Roger Williams, with a Company of six hundred Souldiers, passeth over to Diepe in Normandy; and Sir John Norris, with the rest of the Forces hasted into Britany soon after. Roger Williams with his own six hundred, and the help of Charter Governour of Diepe, put to rout the Confederates, that had blocked up the passages; whose valour, the French King, in his Letters to the Queen, highly extolled. Whereupon growing more courageous, and not minding his Charge, which was to stay at Diepe, he accompanied the King to the very Suburbs of Paris, where, in honour of his Nation, he sent a Challenge to the Spaniards, to encounter two hundred Pikemen of the English, and a hundred Musqueteers, with as many Spaniards, in open Field.

After this the King of France acquainted the Queen, that he had a purpose to set upon Roan or New-haven, before the Prince of Parma should come into France, and thereupon requested her to send four thousand English into Normandy, which upon certain conditions she willingly did, and sent them under the Command of Robert Earl of Essex, accompanied with Sir Thomas Leighton and Sir William Killebrew as his Counsellours. When the Earl came into France, he found that the King was at Noyon, and in Normandy no preparation for the War at all, which seemed strange, and much troubled him; but by and by Sir Roger Williams comes to him from the King, requesting him to come to Noyon, that they might confer concerning a course of War. Thither the Earl made a tedious journey; and being come thither, the King told him, he was now of necessity to go himself into Champagne; but promiseth to send Marshal Biron, and the Duke of Montpensier forthwith to him, to lay siege to Roan. Hereupon the Earl returned to his Tents, expecting their coming, but neither of them came, which troubled the Earl more than before; so as being weary now of doing nothing, he made himself one approach to Roan, where his Brother Walter Devereux was unfortunately slain. Indeed the affairs of the King of France were at this time upon so uncertain terms, that before he could act what he had resolved, something still intervened, that diverted him; for which, by his Letters he excused himself to the Queen

Hacker's prodigious carriage.

At this time was memorable the prodigious carriage of one Hacker, born at Oundle in Northamptonshire, a mean fellow of no learning, whose first prank was this; That when, in shew of Reconciliation to one with whom he had been at variance, he imbraced him, he bit off his Nose, and the man desiring to have his Nose again, that it might be sewed on, while the wound was green, he most villanously eat it up, & swallowed it down before his face. After this, all on a sudden he took upon him a shew of wonderful holiness, did nothing but hear Sermons, and getting Scriptures by heart, and counterfeiting Revelations from God, and an extraordinary calling, grew to be magnified by certain zealous Ministers, and specially of one Edward Coppinger, (a Gentleman of a good house) and one Arthington, a great admirer of the Geneva Discipline; that they accounted him as sent from heaven, and a greater Prophet than Moses or John Baptist; and finally, that he was Christ himself, come with a fan in his hand, to judge the World. And this they proclaimed in Cheapside; giving out that Hacker participated of Christs glorified Body, by his especial Spirit, and was now come to propagate the Gospel over Europe, and to settle a true Discipline in the Church of England; and that they themselves were two Prophets, the one of Mercy, and the other of Judgment; with many other such incredible Blasphemies; whereupon Hacker was apprehended and arraigned; and at last, hanged, drawn and quartered, continuing all the time and at his death, his blasphemous Assertions, Coppinger a while after starved himself to death in Prison, Arthington repented, and made his Recantation in a publick Writing.

He takes upon him to be Christ.

The calling of Bishops at this time cried down by some; but maintained by the Queen.

Besides these, others also at this time opposed the established Government of the Church of England, crying down the calling of Bishops, with whom sided some common Lawyers also, affirming, that the Queen could not depute, nor these men exercise any such Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, and that the Oath Ex Officio was unchristian. But the Queen conceiving, that through the fides of the Prelates, she her self was shot at, suppressed them what she could, and maintained the Government formerly established.

The great Ship called the Revenge is taken by the Spaniards.

About this time the Lord Thomas Howard, six of the Queens ships having waited at the Azores six whole Months for the coming of the Spanish Fleet from America, was at last set upon by Alphonso Bassano with three and fifty Ships, sent out for the Convoy of the American Fleet, where Richard Greenvil Vice-Admiral, being in the Revenge, and separated from his company, was so hemmed in by the Spanish Ships, and so battered with great shot, that most of his men being slain, his Main-mast cut off, himself sore wounded in the head, he commanded to sink the Ship, that it might not come into the Spaniards hands; but this being countermanded by most voices, it was agreed, to yield it to the Spaniards, upon condition that the men should be set at liberty. Greenvil himself was carried into the Spanish Admiral, where within two days he died, not without praise of his very enemies; Thus the great Ship called the Revenge, was yielded, but had so many leaks in the Keel, that soon after it was cast away in a storm; and the loss of this one Ship soon made good upon the Spaniards, by taking many of theirs.

About this time also Cavendish, who in the year 1578. had sailed round about the World, now with five Ships bent his course towards the Magellan Straits; but by reason of foul weather, was not able to pass them, and being driven to the coast of Brasile, was there cast away.

Cavendish cast away in the Straits.

And now, enmity increasing daily between Spain and England, two Proclamations were set forth; one, prohibiting upon pain of High Treason, to carry Victuals or Munition into any of the King of Spain's Dominions: Another, forbidding all persons to entertain any in their Houses, till inquiry be made, what they were, lest they might entertain Popish Priests, who at this time came swarming into England, by reason the King of Spain had lately founded a Seminary at Valladolid for the English.

A Seminary for the English founded at Valladolid by the King of Spain.

At this time died Sir Christopher Hatton Lord Chancellor, whom of a mean Gentlemans house, the Queens favour raised to this height of Dignity; a goodly personage of body, of a noble, but no aspiring spirit; the onely of all the Queen's special Favourites, that died a Batchelour; and therefore left William Newport his Sister's Son his Heir, who erected for him, in St. Paul's Church, a sumptuous Monument. After his death, the keeping of the great Seal was for certain Months committed to the Lord Burleigh Treasurer, Hunsdon, Cobham and Buckhurst: Afterward Puckering the Queen's Serjeant at Law was elected not Chancellor, but Keeper of the Great Seal.

Sir Christopher Hatton Lord Chancellor dies.

Puckering the Queens Serjeant at Law is made L<sup>d</sup> Keeper.

At this time also, Brian O-rork, the Irish Potentate, was arraigned at Westminster; his Indictments were, for raising Rebellion against the Queen, for dragging her Picture at a Horse-tail, for giving the Spaniards entertainment; which things being told him by an Interpreter, (for he understood no English) he said, He would not be tried, unless the Queen her self in person fate to judge him. Yet being told, that it was the Law, he onely said, If it must be so, let it be so; and so condemned, was executed at Tyburn as a Traytor, whereof he seemed to make as little reckoning, as if it had been but in jest. And now this year, the Queen made the Colledge of Dublin in Ireland, an University, which was formerly the Monastery of All-Saints, endowing it with power to confer Scholastical Dignities.

Brian O-rork an Irish Potentate, condemned, and hanged, and why.

The Colledge at Dublin made an University.

At this time, Sir John Perot, who had been Deputy of Ireland, and done good service there, was yet by the malice of his Adversaries of whom Hatton was one, called in question, before the Baron Hunsdon, the Lord Buckhurst, Sir Robert Cecil (lately made a Councellour) Sir John Forrescue, Sir John Wolley, and some of the Judges: His accusations were; First, that he had spoken opprobrious words against the Queen, saying, She was illegitimate and cowardly; Secondly, that he had fostered notorious Traytors, and Popish Priests; Thirdly, that he held correspondence with the Prince of Parma, and the Queen's enemies. To the first of which he confessed, that in his passion he had spoken of the Queen unadvisedly, for which he was infinitely grieved; the rest he denied: And all men knew knew he was never popishly affected. His accusers were one Philip Williams, sometime his Secretary; Denys O-Roghan an Irish married Priest, whose life he had saved; and one Walton, a fellow of no worth or reputation. Yet the crimes being urged against him by Popham and other Lawyers, till eleven a clock at night; he was at last condemned of High-Treason, but Sentence was not pronounced till twenty days after; and yet was not put to death, but died a natural Death in the Tower; he was a man of a goodly personage, stout and cholerick, and one whom (many thought) the Queen had the more reason to respect for her Father King Henry the Eighth's sake.

The Earl of Essex challengeth Monsieur Villersse to a single Combat, but is refused.

The Earl of Essex, after a tedious Winters Siege in Normandy, challenged Monsieur Villersse Governour of Roan to a single Combat; who refusing to meet him, he then returned into England, being called home by the Queen, whose favour, by his long absence, might else have suffered prejudice.

The Prince of Parma dies.

And now the King of France, hearing that the Prince of Parma was coming into France, once again was fain to flie to the Queen for succour, to whom, upon certain conditions, she granted an Army of four thousand men, and some great Ordnance, with which Sir John Norris was sent into France; whom yet the French King employed not, as was agreed, to the great displeasure of the Queen. But as for the Prince of Parma's coming into France, he was prevented by death, when he had governed the Netherlands under the Spaniards fourteen years, a Prince of many excellent parts, and whom Queen Elizabeth never mentioned but with honour.

Sir Walter Raleigh sent with 15 Ships against the Spaniards; and what he did.

And now Queen Elizabeth considering that the King of Spain's chiefest strength was in his Gold of America, sends forth Sir Walter Raleigh with a Fleet of fifteen Ships to meet with the Spanish Fleet; who passing by a Promontory of Spain, received certain intelligence, that the Spanish Fleet was not come forth that year: Whereupon dividing his Navy into two parts; whereof the one he committed to Sir John Borroughs, the other to Sir Martin Forbisher; he waited other opportunities, when, soon after, a mighty Caraque came in view, called The Mother of God, which from the Beak to the Stern, was a hundred threescore and five foot long, built with seven Decks, and carrying six hundred men, besides rich Merchandize. This great Vessel they took, and in it, to the value of a hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling, over and above what the Commanders and Sea-men pilfered.

The Queen in her Progress goes to Oxford; her entertainment there, and her Counsel to the University.

This year the Queen going in Progress, passed through Oxford, where she was entertained by the Scholars with Orations, Stage-Playes and Disputations; and by the Lord Buckhurst Chancellor of the University, with a sumptuous Feast. At her departure she made a Latine Oration, wherein she vowed a Vow, and gave them Counsel; Her Vow was, That as she desired nothing so much, as the prosperity and flourishing estate of her Kingdom, so she as much wished to see the Universities and Schools of Learning to flourish likewise. Her Counsel was, That they would serve God above all, not following the curiosity of some Wits, but the Laws of God, and the Kingdom; That they would not prevent the Laws, but follow them, nor dispute whether better Laws might be made, but observe those which were already enacted.

This year died Anthony Brown Viscount Montacute, whom Queen Mary honoured with this Title; because his Grandmother was Daughter, and one of the Heirs of John Nevill Marquess Montacute; who though he were a great Roman Catholick, yet the Queen finding him faithful alway, loved him, and in his Sicknes went to visit him. There died at this time also, Henry Lord Scroop of Bolton, Knight of the Garter, and long time Governour of the Western Borders towards Scotland.

Anthony Brown Viscount Montacute dies, and how this honour came to his Family.

At this time Henry Barrow, and his Sectaries condemning the Church of England to be no Christian Church, and derogating from the Queen's Authority in matters Ecclesiastical; he the said Barrow, as Ring-leader of the rest, was put to death, in terror to all such disturbers of the peace of the Church.

Henry Barrow a seditious Secretary is put to death.

About this time, by reason of the Queen's correspondence with the Turk, to the end her Subjects might have free Trading in the Territories; it was maliciously given out by some, that she had excited the Turk to a War against the Christians; which caused the Queen to write to the Emperour, shewing him the falseness of this report, wherein she gave him full satisfaction.

And now a constant report came into England, That the King of France had already embraced, or was ready to embrace the Romish Religion: which so much troubled the Queen, that she presently sent Thomas Wilkes into France; with Reasons (if it were not too late) to divert him from it. But before Wilkes came, the King indeed had openly professed the Romish Religion at the Church of St. Denis in Paris, of which his Conversion, he declared the causes to Wilkes at large, shewing the necessity of it, unless he would suffer himself to be utterly thrust out of the Kingdom. And the French Ambassador signifying as much to the Queen, in great perplexity, she writ to him to this effect.

The K. of France embraceth the Romish Religion: and acquaints the Queen with the necessity of his doing it.

Alas, what grief, what anxiety of mind hath befallen me, since I heard this news? was it possible that worldly respects should make you lay aside Gods fear? Could you think, That he, who had hitherto upheld and kept you, would now at the last leave you? It is a dangerous thing to doe evill that good may come thereof. But I hope your mind may alter. In the mean while, I will pray for you, and beg of God, That the hands of Esau may not hinder the blessing of Jacob.

The Queen's Letter to him, out of her sorrow for it.

To this the King answered, That though he had done this in his own person out of necessity; yet he would never be wanting to those of the Reformed Religion, but would take them into his special care and Protection.

And the King's Answer.

And now was Richard Hacket condemned and executed for Treason, being sent from the English Fugitives beyond Sea, to perswade Ferdinand Earl of Derby, Son to Henry newly deceased, to assume the Title of the Kingdom, by right of Descent from Mary, Daughter to Henry the Seventh; and threatening him, that unless he undertook this enterprize, and withall, conceal'd him the Abbettor, he should shortly die in most wretched manner. But the Earl fearing a trap was laid for him, revealed the matter; yet the fellows fellows threatening proved not altogether vain, for the Earl within four months died a most horrible death. This year Death had his tribute paid from the Nobility; for there died Henry Ratcliffe Earl of Suffex, and three Renowned Barons, Arthur Grey of Wilton, Henry Lord Cromwell, and Henry Lord Wentworth; besides Sir Christopher Carlile, whose warlike Prowess at Sea and Land, deserves to be remembred.

Tir-Oen in Ireland assumes to himself the title of O-Neal, more esteemed than to be called Emperor.

In Ireland, at this time, divers great men in Connaught rebelled; and Turlogh Leynigh being dead, Tir-Oen assumed to himself the Title of O-Neale, (which in Ireland is more esteemed, than to be called Emperour;) but upon a sudden, dissembling his discontent, he submitted himself to the Deputy, and promised all Obedience.

The Papists think upon a Succellour to the Queen. Some would have the Earl of Essex and frame a Right to him by Descent.

It was now the year 1594. and the seven and thirtieth of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when the good correspondence between the King of Scots and Queen Elizabeth, gave the Papists small hope that ever he would prove an Instrument to restore the Catholick Religion. Whereupon they began to bethink themselves of some English Papist that might succeed the Queen; but finding none of their own Sect a fit person, they fixed their thoughts upon the Earl of Essex, who always seemed a very moderate man; and him they devised to have some right to the Crown, by Descent from Thomas of Woodstock, King Edward the Third's Son. But the English Fugitives were for the Infanta of Spain; and desiring to set the King of Scots and the Earl of Essex at odds, they set forth a Book, which they Dedicated to Essex, under the name of Doleman, but was written indeed by Parsons (Doleman's bitter Adversary) Cardinal Allen, and Francis Englefield. The scope of which Book was to exclude from Succession all persons whatsoever, and how near soever allied to the Crown, unless they were Roman Catholicks; Contending further for the right of Isabella, Infanta of Spain, as being descended from Constance, Daughter of William the Conquerour; from Eleanor eldest Daughter to Henry the Second, married to Alphonso the Ninth King of Castile; from Beatrix, Daughter to King Henry the Third; Titles obsolete, and which exceed the bounds of Heraldry to discuss. This year the nineteenth of February, was Henry Prince of Scotland born, to whom the Queen was God-mother, and sent Robert Earl of Essex for her Deputy.

The most are for the Infanta of Spain as having divers just Titles.

Prince Henry of Scotland is born.

The Spaniards sent Lopez a Jew, and Physician to the Queen to kill her, and how the matter was carried.

But now greater matters were in hand, Plots were laid against the Queen's life; some Spaniards thinking to make her away by Poyson, and not daring to trust any English man in such a business, they treat to that purpose with Roderick Lopez a Jew, and Physician to the Queen, with Stephen Ferreira, Emanuel Loyse, and other Portugals; for divers of that Nation came into England at this time, in relation to Don Antonio; who being discovered by Letters of theirs that were intercepted, were arraigned at Guild-hall, and by their own confessions convinced, to have conspired against the life of the Queen; they were all condemned and executed at Tyburn; Lopez professing that he loved the Queen as well as Jesus Christ: which was the cause of laughter to them that knew him to be a Jew. The next day after them, was condemned Patrick Cullen an Irish Fencer, sent hither by the English Fugitives, to kill the Queen, who was straightway executed, though he were at that very time sick and ready to die. He is executed at Tyburn.

About this time, Sir John Norris having been in a hot conflict at Sea against the Spaniard, where Sir Martin Forbisher received his death's wound, was now called home, with a purpose to send him into Ireland. In which mean while, Richard Hawkins Son of Sir John Hawkins the famous Sea Captain, had been set forth a year since, with three of the Queen's Ships, and two hundred men in them; whereof one of them at the Isle of St. Anne was by chance fired, another of them separated by Tempest, returned into England; himself in the third, passed the Straights of Magellan, being the sixth man in the Spanish accompt, that had ever done it; and being now come into the wide Southern Sea, he took five Ships laden with Merchandize; one whereof he took away, the rest he suffered to redeem themselves for two thousand Duckats: But at last being set upon by Bertrandus à Castro, who was sent out by the Vice-Roy of those parts, with eight Ships against him, after three days battery, he yielded, and though upon Composition, yet was nevertheless sent into Spain, and there for divers years kept prisoner.

Richard Hawkins taken prisoner by the Spaniards.

But James Lancaster in another part of America, had better success; for being set forth by some London Merchants (whose goods the Spaniards had seized) with three Ships and a long Boat, he took nine and thirty Spanish Sips, and at Fernambucke in Brafile, where the wealth of an East Indian Caraque was lately unloaden, he desperately venturing upon the shoar, loaded fifteen Ships with the wealth of the Indian Caraque; Sugar Reed, Red-wood called Brazil, and other Merchandise, and then safely and victoriously returned home.

At Rome, about this time died Cardinal Allen, born in Lancashire, of an honest Family, brought up in Oxford, in Oriel Colledge. In Queen Mary's daies he was Proctor of the Univerlity, and after Canon of the Cathedral Church at York: Upon the change of Religion in England, he left the Kingdom, and was Divinity Professor at Doway in Flanders, and made Canon of the Church at Cambray. He procured a Seminary to be set up in Doway for the English; another at Rheims, and a third at Rome; and through zeal of the Romish Religion, forgot whose Subject he was born.

Cardinal Allen dies, and of his Education.

At home, at this time, died John Peers Archbishop of York, in whose place succeeded Matthew Hutton, translated from the See of Durham. There died also Ferdinand Stanley Earl of Derby, being in the flower of his age, miserably tormented, and vomiting stuff of a dark rusty colour, being thought to have been poysoned or bewitched. There was found in his Chamber a little Image of wax, with hairs of the colour of his hairs, thrust into the belly: which some thought was done of purpose that men should not suspect him to be poysoned; his vomit so stained the silver Andirons, that it could never be gotten out, and his body though put in searclothes, and wrapped in lead, did so stink and putrefie, that for a long time none could endure to come near where he was buried. The Master of the Horse was much suspected, who the same day the Earl took his bed, took one of his best horses, and fled away. About this time also died George Fines, Lord

The strange death of Ferdinand Earl of Derby.

Lord Dacres, a man somewhat crazed, the Son of Thomas Lord Dacres, hanged in the Reign of King Henry the Eighth.

And now Sir William Fitz-Williams Lord Deputy of Ireland was called home, and William Russel youngest Son of Francis Earl of Bedford, was sent in his room; to whom presently came the Earl of Tir-Oen, and in humble manner craved pardon of his fault, that he had not presented himself at the call of the late Lord Deputy. Eagnal Marshal of the Irish Forces, exhibited many Articles against him, but he so pleaded for himself with promise of loyalty hereafter, that he was dismissed. But see the subdolousness of this man, for he would never after be gotten to come again, though the Deputy sent for him with many kind messages.

It was now the year 1595. and the eight and thirtieth year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when Edmund York and Richard Williams, who were formerly apprehended came to their tryal, and were executed at Tyburn, for being bribed to kill the Queen.

At this time a constant rumour was blown abroad from all parts of Europe, that the Spaniards were coming again against England, with a far greater Fleet than that in Eighty eight, and that it was already under Sail; whereupon Souldiers were levied, and placed on the Sea-coast. Two Navies were made ready, one to expect them at home in the Chanel; the other to go for America, under Hawkins and Drake; but when all came to all, it was but certain Spaniards, who loosed from the Sea-coast of France, with four Gallies, which betimes in the morning landing in Cornwall, fired a Church standing alone in the fields, and three Villages of Fishermen, New-lyne, Mowshole and Pensans, and then presently retired, not taking or killing any one person; and these were the first and last Spaniards that in hostile manner ever set Foot upon English ground.

And now mischiefs growing daily in France, a great number perswaded the King to conclude a Peace with Spain, and the Queen her self began to mistrust him, especially, having lately received Intelligence out of the Pope's Conclave; that he was received into the bosome of the Church of Rome, with the Pope's Benediction, and upon conditions prejudicial to the Protestants.

And therefore at this time, were divers undertakings of the English against Spain; Sir Walter Rawleigh Captain of the Guard, having deflowered a Maid of Honour (whom afterward he married) had lost the Queen's favour, and was held in prison for certain months; but afterward being set at liberty, though banished the Court, he undertook a Voyage to Guyana; setting sail from Plimouth in February, he arrived at Trinidad, where he took St. Joseph's Town, but found not one jot of money there. From hence, with boats and a hundred Souldiers, he entred the vast River Orenoque, ranging up into Guyana four hundred miles, but getting little but his labour for his travel. In like manner, Amyas Preston and Sommers, pillaged sundry Towns of the King of Spain's in the Western parts, and three Ships of the Earl of Cumberland set upon a huge Caraque, which by casualty was fired when they were in fight, and these were the enterprises of private persons: but the Queen being informed, that great store of wealth for the King of Spain's use was conveyed to Port-Rico, in St. John's Island, sent thither Hawkins, Drake and Baskerville, with land Forces, furnishing them with six Ships out of her own Navy, and twenty other men of War. They set sail from Plimouth the last of August, and seven and twenty days after came upon the coast of the great Canary, which being strongly fortified, they forbore to assault. A month after, they came to the Isle of St. Dominick, where five Spanish Ships being sent forth to watch the English, lighted upon one of the small English Ships which was strayed from the Company, and putting the Master and Mariners upon the Rack, understood by them, that the English Navy was bent to Port-Rico; whereupon they make all possible speed to give notice thereof, that being forewarned, they might accordingly be armed. And thereupon as soon as the English had cast Anchors in the Road of Port-Rico; the Spaniards thundred against them from the shore; Sir Nicholas Clifford and Brute Brown were wounded as they sate at supper, and two days after dyed: Hawkins also and Drake, partly of disease, and partly of grief for their ill success, died soon after. At the end of eight months, the Fleet came home, having done the Enemy little hurt, fired onely some few Towns and Ships, but received infinite damage themselves; lost two such Sea-men, as the Kingdom, I may say, all Europe had not their like left. For the Spaniards having of late years received great harms by French and English, had now provided for themselves with Fortifications which were not easily to be won.

At this time the Queen made known to the States in the Low-Countries, the great charges she had been at in relieving them ten years together; for which she required some considerable recompence: The States again alledge the great charges they were at in Eighty eight, in repelling the Spaniards in her cause; yet (not to fall out about the matter) they were content to allow some reasonable retribution; but yet for the present, nothing was concluded. Likewise at this time, the Hanse Towns in Germany make a complaint to the Emperour, and the Princes of the Empire, That the Immunities from Customs anciently granted them by the Kings of England, began to be antiquated, and that a Monopoly of English Merchants was set up in Germany; To which the Queen by Sir Christopher Perkins, first shewing the cause of the first Grant, and then the reason of Queen Mary's prohibiting it afterward, makes them so satisfactory an answer, that those very Hanse-Towns which complained, brought into England at this time such store of Corn, that it prevented a mutiny, which through dearth of Corn, was like to have hapned in London.

This year was famous for the death of many great Personages, Philip Earl of Arundel, condemned in the year 1589. the Queen had all this while spared, but now death would spare him no longer, having since that time been wholly given to contemplation, and macerated himself in a strict course of Religion, leaving one onely Son,

William Russel is sent Deputy into Ireland, to whom Tir-Oen submits himself, but dissemblingly.

Edmund York and Richard Williams executed for being bribed to kill the Queen. A new rumor spread of a new Fleet of Spaniards to invade England, but false.

Sir Walter Rawleigh's voyage to Guyana, and what he did.

Hawkins, Drake and Baskerville are sent to Port Rico.

Their ill success, through grief whereof Hawkins and Drake died.

This year many great personages died.

Son, Thomas by his Wife Anne Dacres of Gilliland. He had two brothers, Thomas Lord Howard, whom Queen Elizabeth made Baron of Suffolk; and William Lord Howard of the North, who yet liveth; and one Sister, the Lady Margaret married to Robert Sackville, after ward Earl of Dorset, and father of Edward Earl of Dorset now living; a Lady so mild, so vertuous, and so devout in her Religion, that if her Brother macerated himself being in prison, she certainly did no less, being at liberty; whom I the rather mention, because I had the happiness to know her living, and the unhappiness to be a Mourner at her Funeral. There died this year also, William Lord Vaulx, a zealous Papist, and Sir Thomas Hineage, Vice-Chamberlain, and Chancellor of the Dutchy of Lancaster, whose only Daughter married to Sir Moyle Finch of Kent, was no small advancer of that House. There dyed also William Whitaker, Master of St. John's Colledg in Cambridge, and Divinity Professor: As likewise Sir Roger Williams, and Sir Thomas Morgan; so as this year was honoured with the deaths of two great Lords, one exquisite Courtier, one great Scholar, and two famous Souldiers.

Sir John Norris is sent into Ireland with an Army to aid the Deputy.

The Earl of Tir-Oen proclaimed Traytor.

Norris out of emulation to the Deputy favours Tir-Oen.

In Ireland at this time, Russel the Deputy doubting a storm of War from Tir-Oen, sent into England, requiring to have some experienced Souldiers sent to him with Forces, who though he desired Baskervyle to be the man, yet Sir John Norris was sent unto him with thirteen hundred old Souldiers, besides a further supply; whom Tir-Oen hearing to be coming, set presently upon the Fort of Blackwater, and in the absence of Edward Cornwall the Governor, took it. But now being doubtful of his case, in a subdolous manner (as he was a double dealing man) he both offereth his help to the Earl of Kildare, against the Deputies servants; and at the same time, maketh promise to the Earl of Ormond, and Sir Henry Wallop, of loyalty and obedience; but notwithstanding he was forthwith proclaimed Traytor, under the name of Hugh O-Neal, bastard Son to Con O-Neal. There was at this time with the Rebels in Ulster a thousand Horse, and 6280 Foot: And in Connaght, two thousand three hundred, all at Tir-Oens command: And the Forces of the English under Norris, not much fewer, with whom the Deputy himself joyned, and marched together to Armagh; which so terrified the Rebels, that Tir-Oen forsaking the Fort of Blackwater, began to hide himself. Whereupon the Deputy returned, leaving Norris to follow the War, with the title of General of the Army. But this satisfied not Norris, and therefore out of emulation betwixt himself and the Deputy, he performed nothing worth the speaking of, and seemed to favour Tir-Oen, as much as the Deputy hated him; insomuch, as he had private Conference with him (a thing not lawful with proclaimed Traytors) and upon his submission, and Hostages given, a Truce was granted both to him and Odonell, till the first of January. When the Truce was expired, Tir-Oen exhibited certain petitions, protesting, if they were granted, he would then perform all duties of a loyal subject. In consulting about which Petitions, another Truce was concluded, till the first of April: During which Truce, Tir-Oen dealt secretly with the King of Spain for Aid to be sent him, making nevertheless a fair shew of willingness to obedience, so far, that by the procurement of Norris and Fenton, a pardon was granted him; the which he pretended to receive more joyfully, than the Instrument which conferred the Earldom upon him; yet all this was but dissimulation, to win time for his own ends.

In the midst of these Irish Affairs, Albertus Arch-Duke of Austria and Cardinal, whom the King of Spain had newly set over the Netherlands, muttered together the Spanish Forces, upon pretence of raising the Siege of La Fere in Picardy; but upon a sudden turneth aside, and besiegeth Calice; and taking Newnham Fort, the very first day became Master of the Haven. The Queen informed hereof, forthwith upon the very Sunday in time of Divine Service, commanded to levy Souldiers, whom she committed to the Earl of Essex; but before they could be shipped, certain news came, that the Town and Fort were taken by the Spaniard: Whereupon the Queens Army was dismissed, and only some money lent to the French King.

But a few days after, a far greater, and more select Army is raised in England, wherein many of Noble Houses served as Volunteers: For the Queen, to divert the King of Spain from invading her Borders, thought it the best way to invade his: Whereupon a Navy of a hundred and fifty Ships was made ready; where were Souldiers under pay, Six thousand three hundred and threescore; Volunteers of the Nobility and Gentry, One thousand; Mariners, Six thousand seven hundred seventy and two, besides the Dutchmen, who brought two and twenty Ships, Robert Earl of Essex, and Charles Howard Lord Admiral of England, were made Generals with equal Authority; but the Admiral to hold Prerogative at Sea, Essex at Land. To these, for a Council of War, were joyned the Lord Thomas Howard, Walter Rawleigh, Francis Vere, George Carew, and Conyers Clifford. The whole Fleet was divided into four Squadrons; The Admiral commanded the first; Essex, the second; the Lord Thomas Howard the third, and Rawleigh the fourth. The Officers of the Army were Francis Vere Serjeant Major General, or Marshall; John Winkfield Quarter-Master General; George Carew Master of the Ordnance; Conyers Clifford Serjeant Major. Colonels were Robert Earl of Suffex, Sir Christopher Blunt, Sir Thomas Gerrard, Sir Richard Winkfield; William Winkfield was Commander of the Volunteers, and Anthony Ashley Secretary to the Council of War, was to Register their acts and Consultations. The Commission being drawn, the Queen gave them private Instructions, and withal, a Prayer of her own making, to be daily used in every Ship.

Robert Earl of Essex, and Charles Howard Lord Admiral, are sent with Forces against Spain, who take Calice, and the passages of it.

This Fleet set forth from Plimouth at the beginning of June. Nigh unto Cabo S. Vincent they lighted upon an Irish Barque, which told them, That at Cales they were secure, and then in the Haven there were at Anchor Gallies, ships of War, and a great many Merchant Vessels. The twentieth of June, they cast Anchor on the West side of the Island; within two days they were agreed to set upon the Spanish Ships, whereat the Earl of Essex cast up his Cap for joy. This business was allotted to the lesser Ships, because the Road was too shallow for the great. The Gallies quickly fled, and creeping along the shore, shifted away, but the Spanish Ships that lay at Anchor at Puntal, turned their broad-sides; so as the English fight with them lasted from break of day till noon; at which time the Spaniards having their Gallions miserably torn, and many of their men slain, resolved to fire the ships, or run them on shore. The Spanish Admiral being fifteen hundred Tun of Burthen, was fired by a Moor, and two other Ships which lay next her took the fire, and were lost likewise. When this Sea-fight was ended, Essex landed Eight hundred Souldiers at Puntal, a league from the Town of Cales, when half a mile from the Town, the Spanish Horse and Foot shewed themselves, and presently gave back again; but straightway cometh forth a greater number: Then Essex commanded his Forces to make a fair retreat; and having enticed forth their Enemies, they turned upon them with such violence, that they forced them back into the Town. Then the Earl got up to a Bulwark newly raised, near the Gate, where he spied a passage into the Town, but so high from ground, that they must leap a Spears length to get down. Yet Evans the Earl of Sussex his Lieutenant, Arthur Savage, and others leaped down; and the mean while Sir Francis Vere broke the Gate, and rushed in, and the rest with him. In the Market-place John Winkfield was shot in the head, and with stones from the top of Houses divers were wounded; amongst whom Samuel Bagnall received eight Wounds, and Arthur Savage was bloody all over, which two were Knighted in the place. The next day the Castle was yielded, upon condition, That the Inhabitants might depart with the Cloaths on their backs, the rest to be left for spoyl. For five hundred and fourscore thousand Duckets the Castle was to be redeemed; and for the payment, forty of the chief Citizens to be sent Hostages into England. Now Rawleigh was commanded to fire the Merchants Ships lying at Port-Reall, when they promised two Millions of Duckets to redeem them: But this the Admiral would not hear of, saying, He was sent to destroy Ships, not to dismiss them upon Composition. A world of Munition was found in the City, and great store of Money privately carried away, every one shifting for himself. It was thought by the wiser sort, That the Spaniard could not be damnified less by this Expedition, than Twenty Millions of Duckets. None of Note was slain amongst the English, but only Winkfield, who also slew a Spanish Captain; and now at last, threescore Military Men were honoured with Knight-hood. After this, having spoyle the whole Island, and demolished the Fort, they returned into England, much against the will of Essex, who would fain have been attempting some other enterprize.

The Queen received them home with much affability, giving many thanks to those of principal Note, but extolling the Earl of Essex and the Admiral above the rest. And now bethinking her self of a fit man to be Governor of the Bryll, which was given by the States as a Caution Town for money due, she made choice of Sir Francis Vere, although Essex commended other to her for the place: But another thing he took with great indignation, That in his absence she had made Sir Robert Cecyl Secretary, whereas he had formerly with great instance commended Sir Thomas Bodley to her.

Sir Robert Cecil is made Secretary of State.

And now the King of Spain to recover his Honour lost at Cales, setteth forth a Navy for England and Ireland, with a great number of Irish Fugitives; but being at Sea, most of his Ships were either run upon Rocks, or cast away in storms; so as this Expedition came to nothing.

But the Queen, at this time, for her better security, entred a League of Defence and Offence with the French King, against the Spaniard, upon certain Conditions; which League she confirmed by Oath, in the Chapel at Greenwich, the nine and twentieth of August, laying her hand upon the hand of Henry de la Tour, Duke of Bulloigne, and Marshal of France; the Bishop of Chichester holding forth the Evangelists, and a great Company of the Nobility standing round about. In September following, Gilbert Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, was sent on Ambassage into France, to take the French Kings Oath, and to present Sir Anthony Mildmay for the Queens Ambassadour in Ordinary in the room of Sir Henry Unton lately there deceased, and to invest the King with the Order of the Garter. Soon after, Baskerville waisted into Picardy with Two thousand Souldiers; for no more were by agreement to be sent this year.

Queen Elizabeth enters a League Offensive and Defensive with the King of France.

It was now the year 1596, and the Nine and thirtieth year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when Thomas Arundel of Warder returned into England, from the War in Hungary against the Turk, whom, for his good service done there, the Emperor by his Letters Patents, had created Earl of the Sacred Empire, and all and singular his Heirs and their Posterity, Males or Females, lawfully descended from him, to be Earls and Countesses of the holy Empire for ever. Those who are graced with this Title, have a Place and Voice in the Imperial Diets, may purchase Lands in the Emperor's Dominions, may take up voluntary Souldiers, and are not bound to answer any matter before any Judge, but only in the Chamber of the Empire. At his return, a great Question came in agitation, Whether Titles of Honour given to the Queens Subjects without her privy, ought to be accepted by them, or admitted by her. For this new Earl stuck in the stomachs of the English Barons, who inwardly grudged to give him place. The matter was long disputed on both sides, but what issue it had, or whether he were permitted this honour here at home, I find not: Certain it is, That Sir Nicholas Clifford and Sir Anthony Sherley, whom the French King two years since received into the Order of St. Michael, were laid in Prison at their coming home, and charged to resign their Robes of the Order.

An. Reg. 39. Thomas Arundel of Warder is by the Emperor made Earl of the Empire; and what the Priviledges of that honour are.

Whether Honours given to the Queens Subjects without her privy, are to be admitted.

This

Many great persons die.

This year many great Persons dyed; John Puckering Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, whom Thomas Egerton succeeded; Richard Fletcher Bishop of London, who for marrying the Lady Baker (as goodly a Lady as he was a Prelate) incurred the Queen's Displeasure; and to cure his Cares, fell immoderately to drinking of Tobacco, and so expired. Henry Cary Baron of Hunsdon, Lord Chamberlain of her Majesty's House, and her Cousin german. Sir Francis Knolls, who married Hunsdon's Sister, in Queen Mary's days an Exile in Germany for the Gospel, by Queen Elizabeth made first Vice-Chamberlain, then Captain of the Guard, afterward Treasurer of the Household, and Knight of the Garter. Henry Hastings Earl of Huntington, and President of the Council in the North, who spent his estate upon Puritan Ministers: Francis Lord Hastings, Nephew to him by his Brother George, who succeeded him in the Earldom; and Margaret Clifford Countess of Derby (who descended of the Blood Royal from Charles Brandon) consulted with Sorcerers and cunning men, and thereupon a little before her end, was in a manner excluded from the Queen's favour.

The Earl of Essex, Sir Walter Rawleigh and others are sent to seize the Spanish, but are distressed by Tempests.

The Queen at this time was told, That the King of Spain was preparing a new Fleet against Ireland; whereupon to encounter him, she also prepared a Navy of a hundred and twenty Ships, seventeen of the Queen's, three and forty lesser Ships of War, the rest for the carriage of Provision. They were parted into three Squadrons: Essex commanded the first, who was also chief Commander in the Expedition, the Lord Thomas Howard the second, and Rawleigh the third. In this Fleet were sundry of the Nobility and Gentry, Charles Blunt Lord Mountjoy, Vere, Carew, Sir Christopher Blunt, the Earls of Rutland and Southampton, the Lords Grey, Cromwel, Rich, and many others. The ninth of July they weighed Anchor from Plymouth, and were to direct their course to Ferall and the Groyne, to seize upon the Spanish Fleet in the Harbour, and towards the Isles called Azores, and to intercept the Indian Fleet at their return into Spain; but this Expedition was crossed and overthrown by tempests, for they had not sailed forty Leagues from Plymouth, when they were shaken with such a terrible Tempest for four days together, that the Mariners themselves were at their wits end, and the Fleet had much ado to recover Plymouth: The Navy being amended, they hoised up Sail the second time, but the Wind fell presently again so cross, that for a whole months time they could not get out of the Haven; returning to Plymouth, the seventeenth of August they got out of the Haven; and now the third time, with a side-wind hoise up sail, but before they came in view of Spain, they were dispersed by another horrible Tempest, wherein of the two great Ships which were taken at Calice, one was dashed in pieces, the other wandred no man knew whither. At the Island Flores the Fleet met again, where Rawleigh being distressed for Water went on shore without leave; and ere he had watered, had charge to follow Essex to Fayal: but not finding him there, he observed the Port, and calling a Council, the Commanders wished him to set upon the place, and not let slip so fair a Booty. Upon this Rawleigh with some of the prime Vo-luntiers, got to shore, and won the Town, but found no booty in it. The next day Essex came thither, whom Merrick informeth what Rawleigh had done, affirming spitefully, That he had done it onely to prevent his Lordship in the honour of the Exploit: whereupon some perswaded the Earl to call a Council of War, and then displace him: others again, to take off his head for going to Land without the Chief Commanders leave; all saying, He was never like to have such another opportunity to be rid of his Adversary; upon this Sidney, Brett, Berry, and others of Rawleigh's Company were displaced, and laid by the heels; Rawleigh himself was sent for, and entertained with a grim look by Essex and all his Party; Essex rebuketh him angerly, for landing his Forces, which none upon pain of death might do, without the Generals command; Rawleigh made answer, That the Captains indeed, Shipmasters, and the rest were within the compass of that Law; but not the Three prime Commanders, of whom himself was One: That he had a long time waited his coming, and longer would have waited, but that the Islanders provoked him to fight. And now the Lord Thomas Howard mediated, that no severity might be used against Rawleigh, and perswaded him to acknowledge his fault; which being done, all were friends, and the displaced Captains were restored to their places, for the Earl was of a placable disposition; easily apt to take offence, and as easily to remit it.

From hence they sail to Gratiosa, where the Inhabitants craved mercy and obtained it; and here Essex would have tarried, in expectation of the Indian Fleet; but that Graves the Pilot dissuaded, because the Harbour was not good. And now see the unluckiness of ill counsel, for the English were not gone above an hour or two from this place, when loe, the American Fleet (wherein were forty Ships, and seven of them laden with treasure) cometh thither, which hearing that the English were thereabouts, directed their course to Tercera, where they gained the Haven, all but three Ships, indifferent wealthy; which the English took: and then were minded to set upon the rest in the Port; but finding the attempt not feasible, they passed from hence to St. Michaels; where Southampton, Rutland, Evers, Bredon and Dockwray were Knighted. And then Essex landed within six miles of the Town, nigh unto Villa Franca, a fair Town, and well furnished with Merchandize, Wine, Wood, and Corn; where they tarried six days: and the common Souldiers found good booty. And now a Caraque was espied, coming out of the East-Indies which by a warning piece shot off in a Dutch Ship, perceiving that the English were there; run her self ashore, unloaded her Merchandize, and then fired her self. Thus the English had ill luck every where in this expedition: And the ninth of October they hoised sail for England; but within two days, a terrible tempest from the Northward dispersed them; and the Spanish Fleet also at the same time; so as they never came in view of one another: one Spanish Ship was cast upon Dartmouth, the Mariners and Souldiers half starved in her; who intimated, that the Spanish Fleet intended to seize upon some Haven in Cornwall, which being nigh the mouth of the Chanel, might be convenient to receive Forces from

For this he is questioned by the Earl; but his Answer and the Lord Thomas Howard's mediation, reconciles all.

Spain: but the Divine Providence frustrated the designs both of the Spaniard and the English.

But now at his return, the Earl of Essex found that done in England, in his absence, which infinitely discontented him; Sir Robert Cecil made Chancellour of the Dutchy of Lancaster; and which was more, Charles Lord Howard, created Earl of Nottingham, with relation in his Patent to the Victory in Eighty eight, and his good service at Cales: This glory he envied him, and besides stomached it, that he must now take place of him: It being enacted in the Reign of Henry the Eighth, That the chief Officers of the Kingdom should have Precedence of all men of their degree. Whereupon the Queen, to give him content, was fain to create him Earl Marshal of England; by which he recovered his place again.

About this time, an Ambassadour came into England, from the King of Poland; who, when the Queen expected he should give her thanks for having procured a peace between the King his Master, and the Turk; he clean contrary expostulated unkindness, for breach of Priviledges, in trading with Spain, requiring a present remedy, or else the King would otherwise right himself. The Queen not a little offended, suddenly replied; How was I deceived? I expected an Ambassadour, and behold a Herald; such a speech I never heard in all my life-time. And after some further checking of him for his boldness, she referred him to her Council; and then retired into her Closet. The Ambassadour afterward in private Conference with some of the Council, excused himself, saying, That his Speech was penned by others, and then given him in Writing. To his Message, the Council gave the like answer as they had given before to the Hanse-Towns, upon the like occasion: though now again, the Hanse-Towns obtain of the Emperor, to prohibit the English from trading in Germany, which made the Queen to prohibite the Hanse-Towns from trading in England, and put them out of the Steel-yard till this difference was accorded.

This year the Chancellour of Denmark came into England to restore the Garter, which she had bestowed upon the King's Father, and withal offering the King's help, to make a Peace for the Queen with the Spaniard. The Queen thanked him; but meant not to use his help for that which she did not desire, and especially not now, when he had newly molested the King of France her Ally, and had taken Amyens the strongest Town of Picardy: Though why should the Queen be so tender of the French King, when now to get an Aid of Four thousand Souldiers from her, he fell to devices; intimating unto her, That he was now offered by the Pope's Nuntio a very commodious Peace, if he would but forsake her. But while these things were in Treaty, Amyens was recovered again by the valour of Baskerville, (who died at the Siege) and of Sir Arthur Savage, as the King in his Letters to the Queen thankfully acknowledged.

About this time a Parliament was holden at Westminster, where Subsidies were willingly granted; and to this Parliament was called the Lord La Ware, and restored to his blood, which by Act of Parliament in the Reign of King Ed- ward the Sixth was tainted. Also to this Parliament was called Thomas Lord Howard, by the Title of Baron Howard of Walden.

In Ireland at this time, a great part of Ulster, and almost all Connaught was in Rebellion; whereupon Russel the Deputy was called home, and Thomas Lord Burroughs sent in his place, a man very stout and couragious, but no Souldier: This infinitely discontented Norris, who thought himself sure of the place, and now to see his Rival preferred before him, and himself to be under him, President of Munster, drave him into such a melancholy, that in a very short time (and as he thought to himself with much disgrace) he ended his life.

And now the Earl of Tir-Oen craveth and obtaineth a months Truce of the new Deputy, at the months end the Deputy marcheth against the Rebels, and gaineth the Fort at Black-water, when suddenly the Rebels shew themselves upon a hill hard by, against whom the Earl of Kildare marcheth and puts them to flight; but yet with some loss of his own side, as Francis Vaughan the Deputies Brother in Law, Turner a Serjeant Major, and two Foster-Brothers of the Earl of Kildare, whose death he took so heavily, that within a few daies he died himself.

As soon as the Deputy had fortified the Castle at Black-water, and withdrawn his Army, the Rebels began to besiege it again; (for this was the main place of their strength) which caused the Deputy with all possible speed to make thither, but unhappily dyed by the way. Whereupon the Rebels set upon the Fort more fiercely than before: but being still repelled, they comforted themselves with this, that there was not many days provision left in the Fort; yet the admirable fortitude of Thomas Williams the Captain and the Garrison Souldiers saved the place, who, when their Horse-flesh was all spent, fed upon weeds growing within the Trenches, and endured all kind of misery. And now the Lord Burroughs the Deputy being dead, the Army by direction from England, was committed to the Earl of Ormond, and the Government to two Lords Justices, Adam Loft-houfe Archbishop of Dublin and Chancellour, and Robert Gardner: to this new Lieutenant, Tir-Oen exhibiteth a Bill of his oppressions and grievances with request of pardon, and at the same time stirreth up Mac Hugh to a new Rebellion in Leraster.

In France at this time, the French King being importuned by the Pope, and by his own Subjects began to incline to a Peace with Spain; which the Queen understanding, she sent into France Sir Robert Cecil, Herbert and Wilks, (who died at his landing in France;) The States likewise sent thither Justine of Nassaw, and Barneveldt, and others likewise into England to dissuade the Peace; but notwithstanding all they could say or do, the French King shortly after concluded a Peace, to the great discontentment of the Queen and the States, but to the great good, and establishment of the French Commonwealth.

And now the Queen providing for her own and her Peoples safety, sent Sir Francis Vere to the States, to know if they were willing to joyn in a Treaty of Peace with the Spaniard: if not, what what they would afford towards a War; and to deal earnestly with them about repayment of money due to her from them. At home in the mean time was holden a great Consultation, Whether a Peace with Spain were convenient for England, or no? and many Reasons were on both sides alledged. Burleigh Lord Treasurer was for Peace, Essex for War, and so vehement in it, that the Treasurer, after a long debating, in a strange manner of Presage, reached forth the Book of the Psalms to him, pointing him to that Verse, The bloody minded man shall not live out half his days. Which made Essex afterward set forth an Apology, with Reasons for justification of his Opinion.

The Queen gives the Earl a box on the Ear, and why: and how he took it.

But now another Consultation was held, about a fit man to be Deputy of Ireland; The Queen intended to send Sir Williams Knolles, Essex his Uncle; but Essex was violent for Sir George Carew, whom he had a mind to remove from the Court; and when he could not by any means persuade the Queen to it, he then, forgetting himself and his duty, uncivilly and contemptuously turned his back upon the Queen, muttering certain words. Whereupon she growing impatient, gave him a box on the ear, and bid him be gone with a vengeance; Essex laid his hand upon his Sword hilt, and swore a great Oath, That he could not, nor would not put up such an indignity; and that he would not have taken it at King Henry the Eighth his hands; and so in rage flung away from the Court. But afterward, admonished by the Lord Keeper, he became more milde; and in a short time returned into the Queen's favour.

About this time, William Cecill Lord Burleigh, and high Treasurer of England, finding himself to droop with age, (for he was now threescore and seventeen years old) sent Letters to the Queen, intreating her to release him of his publick charge; whereupon she went to visit and comfort him; but within a few days he ended his life, after he had been the principal stay of the English Common-wealth for many years together. One great good he did to his Country a little before his death, that he brought the States of the Low-Countries to a Composition for the payment of Eight hundred thousand pounds, by Thirty thousand pounds yearly; likewise a new League to be concluded with them.

The Earl of Cumberland takes Porto Rico.

The King of Denmark's Subjects having lately seized upon some goods of the English as Prize, to the value of a hundred thousand Dollars; the Queen sent the Lord Zouch, and Christopher Perkins Doctor of Law, in Embassage to the Dane, both to congratulate his late marriage with the Elector's Daughter of Brandenburg; and also to crave restitution of the English Goods; who obtained, that in lieu thereof, Threescore thousand Dollars were repayed. And now George Clifford Earl of Cumberland, having with a Navy of eleven Ships, waited for Portugal Caragues, and the American Fleet, till the season of the year was past (they not daring to stir forth) he at last set upon Port-Rico and took it; but seven hundred of his men falling sick of Calentures, and dying within forty dayes, he was fain to return home with some honour, but little profit.

About this time, one Edward Squire was Arraigned of high Treason; he had been at first an ordinary Scrivener, afterwards a Groom in the Queen's Stable, and going as a Souldier in Drakes last expedition, was taken prisoner and carried into Spain, there he came acquainted with one Wallpole an English Jesuite, who caused him to be put into the Inquisition for an Heretick, and the fellow tasting of misery, was easily drawn to become a Papist, and afterward to attempt any thing for the Catholick cause. His ghostly father perswaded him it were meritorious to make away the Queen and the Earl of Essex, and sent him into England with a certain poison, wherewith to anoint the pommel of the Queen's Saddle, and the chair in which the Earl should sit, which he accordingly performed, but neither of them took effect, whereupon Wallpole suspecting Squire's fidelity was bent to revenge it, and sent one into England, who in general terms should lay this aspersions upon him; whereupon Squire is called in question, and never thinking that his Confessor would detect him, directly denied all at first, but after seeing himself betrayed, confessed all the matter and was executed.

Edward Squire executed and why.

This whole year the Rebellion was hot in Ireland; for Tir-Oen notwithstanding his pardon lately obtained, all on a sudden besieged the Fort at Black-water, to the raising of which Siege, the Lieutenant General (for there was as yet no Deputy) sent thirteen Companies under the command of the Marshal, Tir-Oen's sworn adversary, him Tir-Oen slew, and put his whole Army to rout, and atchieved such a Victory, with so great loss to the English, as they had never felt the like since they first set footing in Ireland; for thirteen valiant Commanders, and fifteen hundred common Souldiers were slain at this skirmish, and soon after the Fort of Black-water was yielded up. And now Tir-Oen's fame began to resound as the Assertor of the liberty of the Nation, and upon a sudden all Munster brake forth into Rebellion. For the Cherishing whereof Tir-Oen sent thither Ouny Mac-Rorye and Terrell (who originally an English man, was grown a deadly enemy to the English Nation) with four hundred Kerns. Against these, Thomas Norris President of the Province, marched to Killmallock with a good force; but finding that the Irish Souldiers of his Company were ready to revolt, he was fain to disperse his Army and retire to Corke. Hereupon the Rebels grew insolent, spoiled the Country, and in cruel manner put all the English to the sword. Furthermore they declare Fitz Thomas to be Earl of Desmond; but upon condition he should hold of O-Neale, that is, of Tir-Oen, who now dispatched Letters to the Spaniard, relating his Victories to the full, and vowing to accept no terms of peace with the English, and yet at the same instant (after his wonted treacherous manner) proffered some kind of submission to the Lieutenant, but withal made unreasonable demands.

Tir-Oen breaks openly into Rebellion, and gives the English a great defeat.

The State of Ireland being thus in combustion a serious consultation is holden whom to send to quench it: the Queen and most of the Council thought Sir Charles Blunt Lord Mountjoy the fittest man; but Essex covertly intimated, that he had no military experience, and besides was too Bookish to prove a good Commander: he seemed to aim at the place for himself, though he made a shew modestly to refuse it, and yet still ready with with his exceptions if any other were nominated: many thought it dangerous to have an Army put into his hands, for his followers talked of great matters, that he (forsooth) was descended of the blood Royal of Scotland and England, and had better Right to the Crown then any other of the Competitors. In conclusion, he is appointed Vice-Roy, with ample Authority, to make War or conclude Peace, and pardon all offenders, even Tir-Oen himself. An Army is allotted him as great as he desired: Indeed greater than ever Ireland had seen before, twenty thousand Foot and thirteen hundred Horse: with these, and a great Retinue besides of the Nobility, he passeth into Ireland; where as soon as he had taken the Sword, contrary to his Commission (which was to go immediately against the Arch-rebel) he marched towards Munster against the petty Rebels, taketh the Castle of Cahir, and driveth the Rebels into the Woods and Groves adjoining. His Forces being now impaired, he tarrieth to make them up, but in the mean time sendeth directions to Sir Conierds Clifford, President of Connaught, to set upon the Rebels in one place, (thereby to sever their forces) while he assaulted them in another; Clifford marched toward Belike, with 1500 Souldiers, where the Rebels are upon them at unawares, under the conduct of O-Rork, (his Son that was hanged here in England.) The English repel them at first with ease, and march along, but the Rebels finding they wanted Powder, set upon them again, and put them to flight; in which skirmish, Clifford and many of the old Souldiers were slain.

Essex having by this received new supplies out of England, and a check for neglecting the Queen's Command, setteth forth at length towards the Borders of Ulster, with thirteen hundred Foot and five hundred Horse; being come thither, Tir-Oen by a messenger requested parley, Essex refuseth, saying, he might speak with him the next morning between the two Armies; the next day word is brought to Essex that Tir-Oen craved the Queen's mercy, and that he might onely be heard speak, appointing the shallow of Balla Clinch for a most convenient place; thither came Essex alone, with whom Tir-Oen (riding his Horse up to the girts) had private conference a full hour; A while after, Con (Tir-Oen's base Son) came to Essex, requesting in his Fathers name a second parley, and that some of the chief on both sides might be present: Essex consented, so there came not more than six. At the day appointed, many words had not passed, but it was agreed, that their Delegates should Treat the next day concerning a Peace: between them it was concluded, that a Truce should be held from six weeks to six weeks till May-day.

By this time, the Queen understanding that no more was done, after so much time and money spent, in a great anger taxeth the Earls proceedings, and I know not how, it fell from her to some others that stood by, that he had other thoughts in his mind, than the good of his Prince and Country: And thereupon dispatched very sharp Letters to him, blaming his delay, and letting slip every fair opportunity: with which Letters Essex was so nettled, and chiefly troubled that the Queen had now made Cecil Master of the Wards, which he expected himself; that he began to cast strange projects within his mind, and held private consultations of returning into England with part of his Forces, to surprize his Adversaries; But from this course, the Earl of Southampton, and Sir Christopher Blunt dissuaded him, as being dangerous and wicked. Yet within a month over he went, and came to the Court at Nonesuch, to inform the Queen of the State of Ireland. By the way the Lord Gray of Wilton crossed him, but saluted him not; whom one of his followers offered to kill for his contempt: but Essex would not suffer him: and made such haste, that early in the morning he was upon his Knees before the Queen in the Privy Chamber: She entertained him courteously, but not with the countenance she was wont: and after a little talk bid him keep in his Chamber; and soon after, committed him to Custody, in the Lord Privy Seal's house; where entering into consideration of his case, he giveth himself wholly to Divine Contemplation, and writeth wonderful Letters to his friends, of the vanity of the things of this life.

It was now the year one thousand six hundred, and the two and fortieth of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when after the departure of the Earl of Essex, Tir-Oen began to carry himself as Monarch of Ireland, and sendeth Kernes to make spoil in the possessions of such as continued in their loyalty to the Queen, under Mac-Guir their Captain, who lighting casually upon Sir Warham Saint-Leger, thrust him through with a spear, and was himself thrust through withal. Whereupon the Queen sent Sir Charles Blunt Lord Mountjoy to take upon him the Deputies place, who loseth no time, but first of all marcheth towards Ulster, buildeth a Fort within eight miles of Armagh, which in honour of Sir John Norris, under whom he had his first military schooling, he called by the name of Mount Norris; there he placed Edward Blayne, who kept the Rebels in awe in those parts, from thence back he goeth into Leinster, wherein the Glynnes he reduceth into order, Donel-Spaniab, Phelim Mac-Pheoph, and the rebelling Nation of the O-Tooles, taking hostages of them, then back into Ulster again, being Victor where-soever he cometh, and at Tredah, receiveth into protection Mac-Henry, Mac-Cowly, and other Rebels, who fell at his feet for mercy. All this and more he did in his first year, and no less successful was Carew President of Munster, who drave out of the County the Titular Earl of Desmond, and having found Munster a turbulent Province, in April, he overcame it, and made it so quiet by December following, that the Rebels maintained no one Fort in it against the Queen.

And now a new Consultation was holden in England, touching a Peace with the King of Spain, the which he sought both by the French King, and by Albertus the Arch-Duke, who was now returned into the Netherlands out of Spain, where he was married to the Infanta. The Queen consenting to a Treaty, left it to the French King to nominate both the time and place for the meeting of the Delegates, who set down the month of May, and Bulloign in France; But now foreseeing that a question would arise about Precedency, some were appointed to search Ancient Records concerning that point. These men found in the Book of the Ceremonies of the Court

At last the Earl of Essex is sent with ample authority.

He hath private Conference with Tir-Oen.

A Truce is concluded.

The Queen writes to Essex, blaming his delay.

Essex without leave comes over to the Queen.

Is welcomed with committing him to the Lord Privy Seal.

The Earl of Tir-Oen upon Essex's departure carries himself as Monarch of Ireland.

Sir Charles Blunt Lord Mountjoy is sent Deputy into Ireland.

A Treaty of Peace is agreed on with Spain.

The English Commissioners have a charge not to give Precedence to Spain; and why!

Court of Rome, which (according to the Canons) giveth Rule to the rest, as the Lady and Mistress; that amongst Kings, the first place is due to the King of France, the second to the Kings of England, and the third to the King of Castile; That the English quietly held this priviledg in the General Councils of Basil, Constance, and others: besides the Kingdom of Castile, (which is the Spaniards first Title, and which is but an upstart in regard of England) had Earls, but no Kings till the year 1017. In like manner, Pope Julius the third gave sentence for Henry the seventh of England, against Ferdinand, who was then King of Castile.

At the day appointed, the Delegates met at Bulloign, Sir Henry Nevill, Leiger Ambassador, Sir John Herbert, Robert Beal, and Thomas Edmunds for the English, and other for the King of Spain and the Archduke. The English had instructions, first concerning Precedency, in no case to give way to the King of Spain; yet if they contended, to put the matter to the decision of Lots, rather than the Treaty should be dissolved; and for the rest, to propose and mention the reviewing of the ancient Burgundian League, freedom of Commerce, &c.

The Spaniards being denied Precedence, break off the Treaty.

At the meeting, when they had severally shewed their Commissions; the English challenge the Precedency, the Spaniards do the like, and in so peremptory a manner, that without it they would dissolve the Treaty. Hereupon the English made a proposition, to let pass the question of Precedency; and to transact the business by writing, and Messengers between them: Or that the Treaty might be intermitted only for three-score days, not quite broken off; but all was to no purpose; and at three months end they parted.

The States the mean while were so far from regarding a Peace, that at this time they thought upon reducing the Sea Coast of Flanders into their Command; and thereupon they landed an Army there, of fourteen thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse, under the conduct of Maurice of Nassaw; and fifteen hundred of the English under the command of Sir Francis Vere, and his Brother Horatio. At which time happened the famous Battel of Newport, against the Archduke, where nine thousand of the Spaniards were slain; and the Victory, by the valour of the English, fell to the Dutch; for so forward were the English in this Battel, that of their fifteen hundred, eight hundred were slain and fore wounded, eight Captains killed, and of the rest every man hurt.

The Company of East-India
Merchants
Founded by the Queen.

All this year, and the year past, sundry quarrels and complaints arose between the English and French, touching reprisals of goods taken from each other by Pirates of either Nation: Also touching Customs and Impositions, contrary to the Treaty of Bloys, and deceit in English Clothes, to the great Infamy of the Nation. In Denmark likewise arose controversies touching commerce, and the Fishing of the English upon the Coast of Island and Norway. The Queen also at that time, for the increase of Navigation and Commerce, Founded the Company of East-India Merchants, allowing them large Priviledges: But whether this hath proved beneficial to the Common-wealth, (there having been by this means such a mass of money and great store of other commodities carried out of the Kingdom, and so many Mariners lost every year) wise men make a question.

About this time also, Pope Clement the eighth, perceiving the Queen to be in her declining age, sent two Breves into England, the one to the Popish Clergy, the other to the Laity, to suffer no person whatsoever, to take the Kingdom upon him after the Queens death, but one that should promise by Oath, to promote with all his might the Roman Catholick Religion, how near soever otherwise, he were allyed to the Blood Royal of the King of England.

This year by reason of intemperate weather, happened a great scarcity of Corn in England, and thereby many grievous complaints were occasioned. The common people cast out reproachful slanders against the Lord Treasurer Buckhurst, as the granter of Licenses for transportation of Corn; but he appealing to the Queen, she forthwith defended his Innocency, and made it known by open Proclamation, imputed the fault upon Broggers of Corn, and Forestallers of Markets, and gave order that the slanderers should be apprehended and punished.

The Earl of Essex, who had now been Prisoner six months in the House of the Lord Privy Seal, he then began to repent in good earnest, resolving to put away his perverse Counsellors Gilly Merrick and Henry Cusse, and then he shewed so much patience and great submission, that the Queen then sent him to his own house, and to be there confined, always protesting, that she would do nothing that should be for his ruine, but only that, which should be for his amendment. Nevertheless, when as the common people extolled his Innocency, she could not for the removal of suspicion of injustice, free her self and her Counsellors, but bring him to trial; not in the Star-Chamber, lest the Censure should fall too heavy on him, but in the house of the Lord Privy Seal, where the cause should have a plain hearing before the Lords of the Council, four Earls, two Barons, and four Judges of the Realm. The objections were, That contrary to his Commission he had made the Earl of Southampton General of the Horse, had drawn his Forces into Munster, neglecting the Arch-rebel Tir-Oen, entertained a Parlee with him against the Dignity of the Queens Majesty, and the person of a Viceroy, which he represented: And that the said Parlee was suspicious, in regard it was private. Some aggravations the Lawyers added from abrupt sentences in his Letter to the Lord Privy Seal, written two years since, as these: No storm is more fierce than the indignation of an Impotent Prince. What? cannot Princes err? May they not injure their Subjects? and such like.

The Earl of Essex upon his penitence is allowed to live at his own house.

Yet he is brought to a private Trial in the Lord Privy Seals house, and what was objected against him.

He falling upon his knee at the end of the Board, professed he would not contest with the Queen, nor excuse the faults of his young years either in whole or in part; Protesting that he always meant well, howsoever it fell out otherwise, and that now he would bid the World farewell; withall shedding many tears, so as the standers by wept also. Yet could he not contain himself, but began to plead excuses, till the Lord Privy Seal interrupted him, advising him to proceed.

The Earl protests his innocency, and sheweth his Repentance with tears.

What his Censure
was.

Yet upon

ceed as he began, to fly to the Queens Mercy, who would not have him questioned for disloyalty, but only for a contempt; and that he did not well to pretend obedience in words, which in deeds he had not performed. At length, in the name of the rest, he pronounceth this Sentence against him; That he should be deposed from the Office of a Privy Counsellor, suspended from the functions of the Earl Marshall, and Master of the Ordnance, and be imprisoned during the Queens pleasure. She had given expresse charge, not to suspend him from the Office of Master of the Horse (minding shortly to take him into favour) and that his Censure in no case should be Recorded. After this he made shew of wonderfull humility & mortification, which so affected the Queen, that shortly she removed Barkley his Keeper, and gave him leave to go at large; only admonishing him, To make his own Discretion his Keeper, and not to come at the Court, or in her Presence.

After this Sentence, Cuffe, who always perswaded the Earl to stand stoutly in his own defence, began so plainly to tax him of cowardize and pusillanimity; that the Earl in anger, commanded his Name to be put out of the Roll of his Servants; yet Merrick the Steward did it not, as being of Cuffes mind himself.

Essex being now ready to go into the Country, remembred himself to the Queen, by the Lord Henry Howard, in these words; That he kissed the Rod, and the Queens hands, which had only corrected, not overthrown him; yet he should never enjoy solid comfort, till he might see those blessed Eyes, which had been his load-stars, whereby he had happily steered his course, while he held on his way at lawful distance; But now he resolved to eat grass with Nebuchadnezzar, till it pleased the Queen to restore his Senses. She being greatly joyed with these his speeches; Would to God (said she) his deeds be answerable to his words; He hath long tryed my Patience, I must now make tryal of his humility.

And now the Earl grew so confident of the Queens Favour, that he became a Suitor to her for the Farm of sweet Wines; but she to try his temper, and with what mind he would bear a repulse, made him Answer, That she must first know what it was worth, & not give away things hand over head; & had oftentimes in her mouth, the Aphorism of Physicians, That foul bodies, the more you nourish them, the more you corrupt them. And indeed, this was the right way to find whether the Ulcer of his Mind were thoroughly cured or no; for being not thoroughly cured, it would endure no touching; and no more did his, but as though every denial of a courtesie, were an injury that required revenge; his Melancholy was presently turned into Choler, now he began to hearken to Cuffe again; telling him, That it was now plain, the Queen determined to make him as poor as Job, that he should live of the Basket, and gather crumbs under the Table. Hereupon he returned to London, Southampton is sent for out of the Low-Country. tries, his doors are set open for all comers, Merrick his Steward receiveth to his own Table decayed Souldiers, discontented and audicious persons; Sermons are made there every day by Puritan Ministers, to which the Citizens flock, and all signs of Popularity appeared; which matters coming to the Queens ears, alienated her affection from him daily more and more; but especially she was exasperated, that her Person was despised by him; for (not to say the worst) he had muttered, That the Queen was now old and decrepit, and withered as well in mind as body.

And now again, he runneth upon desperate counsels, for the removal of his adversaries from the Court, seeketh to scrue himself into the King of Scots favour, to whom he traduceth his adversaries, by name Ramleigh, Cobham, Carew, Cecill, and the Admiral as inclined to the Spanish Faction, and at one and the same time, seeketh to win to him both Puritans and Papists. Many were of his party, but few of his Counsel; and these were the Earl of Southampton, Sir Charles Davers, Sir Ferdinando Gorge Captain of the Garrison of Plymouth, Sir Christopher Blunt, and some others. With these he met privately in Drury House to avoid suspicion, where he first giveth them a Catalogue of the Nobility and Gentry that favoured him, to the number of a hundred and twenty. Then they consult, Whether it were better to set upon the Tower of London, or the Queens Palace; this latter they resolve upon, which should be done in this manner; Blunt should keep the great Gate with a select number of men, and Davers seize upon the Presence Chamber: Then Essex with his Company should come from the Mues, and present himself before the Queen. But now suspicions arising from divers circumstances, Secretary Herbert was sent to call him before the Council, at the Treasurers House; but he doubting the matter, excuseth himself that he was not very well. And now the Plot of seizing upon the Court, which had been four months in contriving, was by this means quite dashed, for they had ready at the present, neither Souldiers, nor Munition, so as some speedier course must now be thought on: At which time very opportunely cometh one to them (set on no doubt by Essex his Adversaries) as if he had been sent on purpose from the Citizens, to promise him their Aid; which made Essex to applaud his own great good fortune.

And now were four of the Lords, namely the Lord Keeper, the Earl of Worcester, Sir William Knolles, & the Lord Chief Justice of England, sent by the Queen to Essex House, who could hardly be suffered to come in, all their Attendants were kept out, save he that carried the Seal before the Keeper. In the Court they found a confused number of people, and the Earls of Essex, Rutland, and Southampton, in the midst of them. The Keeper turning himself to Essex, told him, The Queen had sent him and the rest to understand the cause of this concourse, promising Justice, if any person had done them wrong. Essex with a loud voice cryed out, They lye in wait for my life, we are met to defend our selves. The Keeper urging Essex again to unfold some part of his grievance; the unruly multitude cryeth out, Away, let us be gone, they come to betray you, Kill them, cast away that Great Seal. Essex retireth into the house, the Lords follow him; he chargeth them to make the doors fast, & turning him to the Lords, Have patience for a while (saith he) I must go into the City to dispatch a little business with the Mayor and Sheriffs, I will return presently. the City,

There the Lords are kept prisoners; Essex maketh haste into the City, with a Troop of 200 men at his heels; the Earle of Bedford, the Lord Cromwell, and other Lords meeting him by the way, joyn themselves: coming into London, he cryeth out aloud, For the Queen, for the Queen, they lay wait for my life. The Citizens came running to gaze, but not so much as one person took Arms to take his part. Passing along the City, he came all in a sweat to the Sheriff Smith's house, who shifeth himself forth at a Back-door, and goeth to the Lord Mayor. By this time certain of the Nobility entred the City with a Herald, declaring Essex and his adherents Traytors. Hereupon, hearing also that the Lord Admiral made towards him with an Army, he began to be disheartned; George taketh care for himself, requesteth he might be sent to release the Counsellors, and with them to crave the Queens mercy, whiles the issue was yet doubtful. The Earl was content that Popham only should be freed; but he refused, unless the Keeper also might be dismissed. Then George freeth them all, and goeth along with them to the Court by water.

Now when Essex thought to return, he found a chain fastened cross the street, at the West end of Pauls, and men in Arms on the other side: then he began to draw his Sword; and having once given the word, Blunt letteth fly at them, slew one of them incontinent, himself being sorely wounded and taken. Essex himself had his Hat shot through; whereupon retiring, he took Boat at Queen-Hytbe, and went to Essex House; where, finding the Counsellours all dismissed, he grew extream angry and dismayed, and cast certain papers into the fire, saying, They should tell no tales. By and by the Admiral besiegeth the House; commandeth them to yield. Southampton offereth, if the Admiral would give Hostages to secure them, they would present themselves to the Queen. The Admiral answereth him by Sidney, That Rebels are not to proffer Conditions. Within an hour, Essex finding the case desperate, resolveth to rush forth; and the Lord Sands (the most aged in the company) greatly urged it, saying, it were better to die valiantly than by the hands of a Hang-man. But Essex his mind upon a little deliberation altering, they fell upon their knees, and deliver their Weapons to the Admiral, when it was ten a clock at night. Owen Salisbury, and one or two more were slain with Musket shot, and as many of the Beliegers. The next day Thomas Lea, Commander of a Company of Souldiers in Ireland, who to one Crosse a Sea-Captain (that detected him) intimated, how noble an exploit it were, for six stout Fellows to go to the Queen, and compel her forcibly to release Essex and Southampton, was presently apprehended, examined, found guilty, and executed. Essex and Southampton were carried first to Lambeth, to the Archbishops house, because it was a dark night; but anon were sent to the Tower, by the Queens direction; and with them Rutland, Sands, Cromwell, Mounteagle, Danvers, and Bromley; the rest were put in common prisons.

On the nineteenth of February, Essex and Southampton were called to their Arraignment before their Peers in Westminster-Hall; where Buckhurst Lord Treasurer, was appointed Lord High-Steward of England for that time. The Peers being severally called by their names, Essex demanded if it were not lawful for them to except against some of the Peers, as private persons might do against the Jurors. The Judges made answer, That the credit and fidelity of the Peers of England was presumed to be such, That in Tryals they were not bound to take an Oath, nor are they lyable to any exception. Then were they joyntly indited of High-Treason; namely, that they plotted to deprive the Queen of her life and Kingdom, To surprize her in her very Palace; and that they brake forth into open Rebellion, by imprisoning the Counsellors of the Kingdom; by exciting the Londoners to Rebellion with vain fictions; by assaulting the Queens loyal Subjects in the City; and by defending of Essex House against the Queens Forces. Hereunto they pleaded, Not guilty: Essex withall averring, That they had done nothing but of necessity, and the Law of Nature. Telverton aggravateth the specialties; and Edward Coke Attorney argueth, That the Earl could not excuse himself from the Law of Nature, seeing Majesty is not to be affronted for private revenge. The Earl of Essex with great confidence made answer, That to his Prince and Country, he always had and would bear a loyal affection. Then Francis Bacon (one that was little expected to speak against Essex by whom he had been raised) in defence of Cobham, Cecil and Rawleigh, aggravateth his crying out, That the Crown of England was sold to the Spaniard: whereto Essex replied, That he heard indeed, that Cecil the Secretary should say to one of the Lords of the Council, That the right of the Infanta of Spain to the Kingdom of England, was as good as any of the Competitors. Upon this Cecil (who stood by as an Auditor) steppeth in, and falling upon his knees, beseecheth the Steward, that with his good leave, he might quit himself from this foul aspersion: which leave being granted him, he provoked Essex, if he durst, to name the Counsellor; but he would not: therefore (saith Cecil) it is a Fiction; still Essex averreth it. Then Cecil turning himself to Southampton, besought him by all manner of Obtestations to name the man. He referreth it to the Honourable Assembly, and to Cecil himself, if in Honour and good Reason he ought to do it: they affirming, He might, Southampton named Sir William Knolles, Essex his Uncle. He being sent for, at Cecil's intreaty, said, That Cecil two years since told him, that one Dolman in a Book, had asserted the Right of the Infanta; and had spoken no otherwise than so.

Now after the Judges had delivered their opinion what was Law in the matters alledged, the Earls, by the Stewards direction, were taken aside: Then the Peers rose, and went apart, and having consulted about an hour, returned to their seats, and in their order, pronounced the Earls guilty of High-Treason. Then the high Steward advising Essex to implore the Queens mercy, giveth Sentence, and that done, brake his Staff, and departed.

The next day, Sir Robert Vernon, Sir William Constable, Sir Edward Baynham, Littleton, Cuff, Captain Whitlock, John and Christopher Wright, and Orell an old Souldier, were called to their Tryal: but the Queen (informed by Sir Fulk Grevill, Grevil, That most of them were drawn unwittingly into the danger) commanded that only Littleton, Baynham, and Orell should have their Tryal, the rest to be sent back to prison. These were all condemned, but their lives spared, which favour Rawleigh (for a good sum of money received of Baynham) procured.

Essex complains of Blunt & Cuffe.

Essex in the mean while, requested he might speak with some of the Counsellors, to whom he reconciled himself, and to Cecil especially; and then intimating that the Queen could not be in safety while he lived; he requested he might be executed privately in the Tower: He grievously inveigheth against some of the Conspiracy, and willeth to speak with some of them, but especially with Blunt and Cuffe; whom as soon as he saw, he brake forth into these words; O Cuffe, ask pardon of God, and the Queen, for thou hast chiefly provoked me to this disloyalty. Also he intimated Sir Henry Nevill, ordinary Ambassadour in France, to have been acquainted with the Conspiracy; and that others in Scotland, France, the Netherlands, and the Lord Mountjoy Deputy of Ireland knew of his purpose, and others in England; who being many in number, and the Lord Mountjoy, ordering the Affairs of Ireland in good fashion, the Queen wisely would take no notice of it.

The five and twentieth day of February, which was to be the fatal day, there were sent to the Earl divers Ministers, to give him ghostly comfort. The Queen now wavering in her self, one while remembring the ancient kindness she had shewed him, she commanded he should not be executed; then again, thinking of his stubbornness, that he would not once ask her mercy, and had said openly, That he could not live, but she must perish; countermanding her former word, she gave order that he should be executed.

He is executed in the Tower.

Then was he brought forth into the Yard, where a Scaffold was erected, and sundry of the Nobility present, among whom Rawleigh also; but being told, it was an inhumane thing to stand by and behold the death of his Adversary, he withdrew himself into the Armory, and from thence beheld the Tragedy. Essex being ascended the Scaffold, uncovered his head, cast up his eyes towards Heaven, and crying God mercy for the manifold sins of his youth, but this last specially, which he said was a bloody, crying and contagious sin; craved pardon of the Queen and her Counsellors, commended his spirit into the hands of God, and had his head taken off at the third blow, though the first bereft him both of his sense and motion.

Cuffe pleading for himself at his Tryal.

The fifth of March, Sir Christopher Blunt, Sir Charles Davers, Sir John Davis, Sir Gyllie Merrick and Cuffe, were brought to their Tryal in Westminster-Hall, before the Queens delegates. The Heads of their Indictments, were the same which were objected to Essex and Southampton. The others said little in their defence, only Cuffe stood upon these two Answers; Whereas (saith he) I am challenged of Treason, because I was in Essex house the day of the Rebellion; by the same Argument the Lyon in the Cellar might be indicted; all that day I lamented the Earls fortune, and dealt with him to fly to the Queens mercy. And as for the Consultation in Drury-House, it is no more to be called High Treason, than an Embryo may be accounted a perfect man. The Lawyers on the other side demonstrated, That no necessity lay upon him to tarry in the House; and that the Consultation in Drury-House was it self a Treason, though it had never broke forth into act. Merrick said only this, The Earl of Essex raised me, and he hath overturned me.

The thirteenth of March, Merrick, and Cuffe are drawn to Tyburne, where Cuffe entring into a long Speech, was by the Sheriff interrupted; and then, after prayers to God, and desiring God and the Queen to pardon him, he was cast from the Ladder: a man of great Wit and Learning, but of a boisterous and turbulent disposition. In the same manner dyed Merrick.

The fifteenth of March, Sir Charles Davers and Sir Christopher Blunt were beheaded on the Tower-Hill; albeit Davers offered ten thousand pounds to redeem his life, though with perpetual imprisonment. The Earl of Southampton and the Sheriff Smith were kept prisoners; though Smith, after some time, was upon sureties suffered to go at large. The eighth of July, Sir Henry Nevill was cited before the Lords of the Council, where it was laid to his Charge, That he was present at the Consultation in Drury-House, yet had not revealed their sinister purposes; and had imparted to Essex the secrets of his French Embassy. He confessed, That at the Earls intreaty, he shewed him the Commentaries of the French proceedings, was present at one of their Consultations only; but contemned their counsels, yet durst not be an Informer against so great Personages. Hereupon he had a grievous check given him, and was committed to prison.

One act of the by, is not here to be omitted. Essex at his Arraignment had complained, That his hand-writing was counterfeited. It happened the Countess of Essex being fearful in her Husbands behalf, gave a Letter which she had received from him, to the Custody of one Rhihove, a Dutch woman that waited on her: this Dutch womans husband named Daniel, lighted by chance upon the Letter, and perceiving some passages in it which might bring the Earl of Essex into danger, got a cunning Fellow to draw a counterfeit Copy of the said Letter; with this he cometh to the fearful Lady, who was newly brought to bed, threatening to give the same to her husbands Adversaries, unless she would presently give him three thousand pounds. She to shun the danger, paid him eleven hundred and seventy pounds at the very instant; yet did he deliver her the counterfeit Copy only, meaning to make use of the true one, to get another sum of the Earls Adversary. This imposture being found out, he was censured to perpetual imprisonment, condemned in three thousand pounds (two of which were to go to the Countess) and his Ears nailed to the Pillory, with this Writing over his head; A notorious Cheater.

Soon after a Parliament was assembled, where- The Qu. in grievous complaints being tendred to the lower House touching Monopolies; the Queen, by way of prevention, sendeth out Proclamations, declaring the said Licences and Patents to be void in part, leaving some part to the discussion of the Laws: which thing was so acceptable to the lower House, that they presently sent eighty eighty select persons, together with the Speaker, to give the Queen thanks; and she on the other side gave them thanks for being such faithful Monitors to her, to recal her from an error, wherein, through ignorance, not wilfulness, she was fallen.

The Spaniards land in Ireland, & take Kinsale.

Tir-Oen joyneth his Forces with the Spaniards, which together make a great Army, but in a Battel are defeated.

Alphonso O Campo their chief Leader is taken Prisoner.

D' Aquila who commanded the Spaniards, requires a Composition, and departs.

Sir Rich. Levison sets upon the Spanish Fleet of Treasure, but cannot prevail.

In Ireland, the Deputy at the entry of the Spring, draweth his Forces together, and driveth Tir-Oen from where he had fortified himself, Carrew President of Munster, taketh the titular Earl lurking in a Cave, and receiveth intelligence, that the Spaniards invited by Tir-Oen, had a purpose to land in Munster, yet could not perswade the Deputy they had any design for Ireland; but in the midst of September, certain News was brought, the Spaniards were in fight, who wanting wind to carry their Fleet to Cork, put into Kinsale the three and twentieth of September, and land their Souldiers without resistance. Richard Percy having but few Souldiers to defend the Town, is commanded to come away and leave Kinsale to the Spaniards, into which they enter with Ensigns displayed, and by the Magistrates and Inhabitants were bidden welcome.

D' Aquila, who commanded the Spaniards, publisheth a Declaration, wherein he sheweth, That Queen Elizabeth was deposed from her Kingdom by sentence of the Pope, her Subjects absolved from their Allegiance; And that the Spaniards were now come to deliver Ireland from the jaws of the Devil. Tir-Oen, joyneth his Forces with them, so as they were now six thousand Foot, and five thousand Horse, and promised themselves assured Victory, the English being not near so many. The four and twentieth of December a Battel is joyned; where after long fight, the Victory inclined to the English. Tir-Oen, Odonell, and the rest cast away their weapons, and save themselves by flight. Alphonso O Campo chief Ruler of the Spaniards, together with three other Captains, was taken prisoner, and six Ensign-bearers, twelve hundred were slain, nine colours taken, whereof four belonged to the Spaniards: of the English not many were slain, but a great number wounded.

After six days, D' Aquila sendeth Letters to the Deputy by a Drummer, requesting that some person of account might be sent to him, with whom to confer; Sir William Godolphine is sent, to whom he complained of the cowardise, and (he feared) treachery of the Irish; and therefore, although he wanted nothing to hold out the Siege, and did daily expect great Forces from Spain, yet was willing to make a Composition: whereupon, at last it was agreed, The Spaniards should yield up Kinsale to the Deputy, as also the Castles and Forts at Baltimore, Bere Haven, and Castle-Haven, and should depart with life and goods, and colours displayed. The English at a reasonable price, should furnish them with ships and provision into Spain; and that they should not carry Arms against the Queen of England, till they were arrived in Spain, &c.

And now the Spaniards being driven out of Ireland, the Queen, to prevent their coming again, sendeth out Sir Richard Levison and Sir William Monson, with eight ships of her own, and some smaller ships of War, to attempt something upon the Coast of Spain. On the nineteenth of March, Levison hoisteth Sayl, and Monson afterward, having in vain tarried behind for some Dutch ships to joyn with them. Levison in the mean time lighted upon the Spanish Navy of eight and thirty ships, which brought the Treasure from America, and set upon them, but to no purpose. When Monson was come with the rest of the Fleet, they had certain notice, That a mighty Indian Caraque of sixteen hundred Tun, and richly laden, was upon the Coast of Portugal. There indeed they found it, but it lay close under a Fort, attended with eleven Gallies; and the Caraque it self appeared as big as a Castle; yet they resolved to fire it, if they could not take it. The next day they thundred so violently against the Gallies, that within seven hours the Marques of St. Croix, together with the Portugal Gallies which he commanded, withdrew themselves; two of them were taken and fired; and in them was great store of powder, which was going for the Low-Countries. And now Levison signifieth to the Captain of the Caraque, That the Gallies which they trusted to, were driven away, and therefore, if they now refused mercy, they must expect none hereafter. After much speech to and fro, it was at last agreed, That the Caraque, with the Ordnance and Merchandize should be yielded up. Thus the English having a fair wind returned home with a Booty, to the value of a Million of Duckets, by the Portugal account, and not past five of their men lost in the Voyage.

At this time there arose a Contestation amongst the Popish Clergy here in England; for the Jesuits and secular Priests made bitter Invectives in their writings, one against the other. The original of the Priests quarrel was, That Blackwell, one wholly at the beck of the Jesuits, was set over them as Arch-Presbyter, who first of all despoiled them of their Faculties; and when they appealed to the Pope, caused them to be declared Schismatics and Hereticks. They in sundry Books extolled the Queen very highly, as one that dealt mildly always with the Catholics, till such time as they set all in a combustion in England; and by their Treasons, caused most severe Laws to be enacted against the Catholics. Parsons they traduced as a Bastard, an Equivocator and a Traytor. Whether they contended thus in good earnest, or in jest only, is hard to say; but the Bishop of London politically nourished the contention, and all he gained, was this, That the Queen and her Council, finding them dangerous to the Common-wealth, both the one and the other, upon penalty of the Laws, were by Proclamation commanded to depart out of the Kingdom presently.

In France, the Marshal Biron, for entering into dangerous attempts against the Publick Peace, was arraigned, and lost his head. His confession brought some other into danger; and amongst them, the Duke of Bulloign, of the Protestant Religion, that when he was cited, he durst not appear, but fled into Germany. Hereupon the King of France sendeth to Queen Elizabeth, complaining that the Duke held his marriage unlawful, and the Popes dispensation nothing worth, pronouncing his Sons illegitimate; had destined the Prince of Conde to the Succession of the Crown, and conspired the Destruction of the prime of the Nobility. The Queen, by her to it.

But he takes a Caraque of 1600 Tun, worth a Million of Duckets.

The Jesuits and the secular Priests contend against one another.

Both of them are commanded to depart the Realm.

The King of France complains to the Queen against the Duke of Bulloign, &c.

Legier Ambassadour, adviseth the King not too credulously to entertain those reports, as doubting these suggestions might proceed from some of the Spanish Faction. Hereupon the King grew very angry, saying, The Queen held a better opinion of the Duke than he deserved, and that he was one of the chief Architects of Essex his Treason; and being questioned by the King about it, was not able to deny it. About this time also, the Duke of Savoy, by cunning sleights, and open force, practised against the States of Geneva; and the Queen relieved them with a great sum of money, gathered amongst the Clergy and Laity all over England.

Tir. Oen yields himself to the Deputy absolutely without any condition.

And now the Earl Tir-Oen, perceiving himself in a desperate estate, resolved to sue for mercy, and promised at last to submit his life and fortunes to the Queens pleasure, absolutely without condition. Hereupon, being admitted to the presence of the Deputy, at the very entry of the room, he fell on his knees; and then passing on a few steps, prostrated himself again, saying, I confess and crave pardon for my great fault against God, & a most bountiful Prince my dread Sovereign; I fly to the Queens mercy, as a sacred Anchor, permitting her to dispose of my life and fortunes at her pleasure. Upon this his submission, the Deputy commanded him to go aside, and the next day took him along to Dublin with him, meaning to bring him into England, that the Queen might deal with him according to her Royal pleasure: But before he could come into England, the Queen dyed.

Her Taxations.

IN a Parliament holden the first year of her Reign, a Subsidy was granted, of two shillings eight pence the pound of Goods, and four shillings of Lands, to be paid at two several Payments, of every person Spiritual and Temporal. In her sixth year, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, one Subsidy was granted by the Clergy, and another by the Laity, together with two Fifteenths and Tenths. In her eighth year, in a Parliament then holden, there were offered to her four Subsidies, upon condition she would declare a Successor; but she refused their offer, and directly remitted the fourth Subsidy which they had granted, saying, It was all one, whether the money were in her Subjects Coffers, or in her own. In her thirteenth year, in a Parliament then holden, towards her charges of repressing the Northern Rebellion, there was granted her by the Clergy, a Subsidy of Six shilling in the pound; and by the Temporality, two Fifteenths with a Subsidy of two shillings and eight pence in the pound. In her six and thirtieth year, a Parliament was holden, wherein was granted by the Clergy, two whole Subsidies, and by the Laity three, besides six Fifteenths and Tenths; but it was put into the Act, That this great Contribution, the like whereof had not been known in former Ages, should not be drawn into example. In her fortieth year, in a Parliament at Westminster, were granted her by the Clergy, three entire Subsidies; and by the Laity as many, with six Fifteenths and Tenths. In her two and fortieth year, to furnish her with money towards the Irish War, she delegated certain Commissioners, to

Of her Laws and Ordinances.

IN a Parliament holden in her first year, an Act was made, That every person should go to Divine Service upon Sundays and Holy-days, or else pay twelve pence to the poor. Also it was enacted, That Bishops should not let the Lands of the Church, longer than for one and twenty years, or three Lives, except to the Queen or her Successors. In the third year, a Proclamation was made, That the Teston coyned for twelve pence, and in the Reign of King Edward embased to six pence, should not be current but for four pence; the Groat, but for two pence; and the piece of two pence, but for a penny: And not long after, all the said base moneys were called in, and fine Sterling money was allowed for them after the Rate. For Ireland also, the coyned Sterling money; where nine pence in England, went for twelve pence there. The Queen was the first that brought certain Countries to deliver Provision at a certain rate, that so they might be freed from the Purveyors: Also the first that granted allowance to Judges for their Circuit. In her sixth year, in a Parliament then holden, it was made Treason to refuse taking the Oath of Supremacy; yet with this limitation, That by it the blood should not be dishonoured, nor goods confiscate; nor the Oath to be required of any Baron of the Kingdom. Also this year, by a Common-council in London, it was enacted, That all such Citizens as from thenceforth should be constrained to sell their Household-stuff, Leases of Houses, or such like, should first cause the same to be cryed through the City, by a man with a Bell, and then to be sold by the common Out-cryer appointed for that purpose, and he to receive one farthing upon the shilling for his pains. In her three and twentieth year, she represseth by Proclamation excess in Apparel, Gold Chains, & Cloaks which men wore down to their heels. The length of Swords was limited to three Foot, and Daggers to twelve Inches, besides the hilts. Buildings likewise in the Suburbs were restrained, In-mates forbidden, and expresse charge set forth, That no dwelling house should be new built within three miles of any City Gates, under pain of imprisonment, and loss of the materials. In her time was set on foot by Sir Thomas Smith, the Law made for the serving of Colledges with provision, to the great benefit of those Scholastical Societies. In her two and fortieth year, she setteth forth Proclamations against the Transportation of Gold or Silver, wrought or unwrought, according to the former Acts of Parliament in that case provided. This year also she founded the Company of the East-India Merchants, and allowed them ample Priviledges. In her three and fortieth year, all Monopolies are called in by Proclamation. In her four and twentieth year, severe Laws are made against Papists, some inflicting death, some fine and imprisonment. In her eight and twentieth year, a Proclamation was set forth, prohibiting to

The protestant Religion is by degrees established.

ON Sunday the first of January next after the Queens coming to the Crown, by virtue of her Proclamation, the English Litany was read accordingly as was used in her Graces Chapel, in all Churches through the City of London, and likewise the Epistle and Gospel of the day, begun to be read at Mass-time in the English Tongue. Also in a Parliament holden in her first year, the first Fruits and Tenth were restored to the Crown, and the Supreme Government over the State Ecclesiastical, and the Book of Common Prayer & Administration of the Sacraments in the English Tongue was restored, and by degrees the Protestant Religion was established. The Bishops that refused the Oath of Supremacy, were all removed, and Protestant Bishops placed in their room. It was enacted also, That all persons should go to Divine Service upon Sundays and Holy-days, and a Fine of twelve pence imposed upon every one that should be absent, and the same to be given to the poor. In her fourth year, the Queen was solicited by Pope Pius, to send her Oratours to the Council of Trent, which she refused, as not acknowledging it a lawful Council. In a Parliament holden in her eighth year, it was enacted and by a general consent declared, That the Election of the Archbishops and Bishops in England, together with their Consecration, Confirmation, and Investiture (which some persons slanderously called in question) was lawful and Canonical, and that they were rightly, & according to the Acts and Statutes of the Kingdom, chosen and consecrated. In her eleventh year, there arose in England two contrary factions in Religion: on the one side, Thomas Harding, Nicholas Sanders, and other Divines that had fled out of England, began to exercise the Episcopal Jurisdiction upon the Queens Subjects which they had derived from the See of Rome: On the other side, Coleman, Burton, Hallingham, Benson, and other, making profession of the pure Religion, would allow of nothing but what was directly taken out of the Scriptures, openly condemning the received Discipline of the Church of England, together with the Church Liturgy, and the very calling of Bishops, as favouring too much of the Roman Religion, Protesting in the Pulpits, That it was an impious thing to hold any thing common with the Church of Rome, and used all diligence to have the Church of England, reformed in every point, according to the Rule of the Church of Geneva. These, although the Queen commanded to be committed to Prison, yet it is incredible how upon a sudden their followers encreased, known by the envious name of Puritans. This Sect so mightly encreased, that in her sixteenth year, the Queen and Kingdom, was extremely troubled with some of the Clergy, who breathing out nothing but Evangelical parity, cryed down the Ecclesiastical Form of Government (as a thing polluted with Roman dregs) and setting forth Books likewise, Intituled, The Admonition to the Parliament, and the Defence of the Admonition: they refused to resort to the Divine Service Publickly in use, and framed to themselves other Rites, Whereupon, the Queen to suppress them, whom by no means she liked, commanded every where the severity of the Law touching the Uniformity of Common-Prayer to be put in execution, and those Books, upon pain of Imprisonment, to be delivered into the hands of the Bishops, or some of the Queens Council. And this year were taken at Mass in their several houses, the Lord Morley's Lady and her Children, the Lady Guilford, and the Lady Brown, who being thereof indited and convicted, suffer the penalty of the Law in that case provided. Until the twentieth year of Queen Elizabeths Reign, the Papists in England were mercifully connived at, while they solemnized their own Rites within their private houses (though that also were against the Laws) but when as that Thunderbolt of excommunicating the Queen came abroad, then was the Law enacted against those who brought into the Kingdom any Agnus Dei, or hallowed Beads, or reconciled any of the Queens Subjects to the See of Rome; yet for six whole years together after this Law was made, it was not executed upon any Papist, till Cutbert Mayn a Priest, and an obstinate maintainer of the Popes authority against the Queen, was executed at Launceston in Cornwall, and the Gentlemans Goods that harboured him confiscated, and himself adjudg'd to perpetual Imprisonment. In her three and twentieth year, divers Priests and Jesuites came into England, amongst whom, Robert Parsons, and Edmund Campian, English Men and Jesuites, being now bound for England, to promote the Catholick Cause, at which time a Proclamation was set forth, That whosoever had any Children beyond the Sea, should by a certain day call them home; and that no person should receive or harbour any Seminary Priest or Jesuite. At this time also, there arose up in Holland a certain Sect, naming themselves, The Family of Love, who perswaded their followers, that those only who were adopted into that Family, were elected, and no other could be saved, but were all Reprobates, and damned, and that it was lawful for them to deny upon Oath whatsoever they pleased, before any Magistrate, or whomsoever that were not of that Family. Many of their Books were printed, under these titles, The Gospel of the Kingdom, The Lords Sentences, The Prophecie of the spirit of Love, the publication of Peace upon earth, by the Author H.N. but who this Author was they would by no means reveal: at last he was found to be Henry Nichols of Leyden, who blasphemously preached, That he was partaker of the Divinity of God, and God of his humane Nature: all which Books were by Proclamation commanded to be burnt. In a Parliament holden the eighth and twentieth year of her Reign, some out of a desire of Reformation, began to pick quarrels at the Clergy, desiring to pass Laws for the restraint of Bishops in their granting of Faculties, conferring of Holy Orders, Ecclesiastical Censure, and, the Oath Ex Officio. They complained likewise of the non-residency of

of Ministers, and the like. But the Queen, who always hated Innovation (which for the most part changeth for the worse) would give no ear unto them; conceiving besides, That these proceedings in Parliament in Ecclesiastical Affairs derogated from her Prerogative. In her six and twentieth year, the Queen gave a special charge to Whitgift Archbishop of Canterbury, to settle an Uniformity in the Ecclesiastical Discipline, according to the Laws, which through the connivence of Bishops, and perverseness of the Puritans, lay now almost gasping: Whereupon, he provided three Articles, to which every Minister should subscribe.

The first, That the Queen had Supreme Authority over all persons born within her Dominions, of what condition soever they were; and that no other Prince, or Prelate, or Potentate, hath, or ought to have any Jurisdiction, Civil or Ecclesiastical, within her Realms and Dominions.

The second, That the Book of Common-Prayer, and the Ordination of Bishops, Priests and Deacons, containeth nothing contrary to the Word of God but may lawfully be used, and that they will use that and no other.

The third, That the Articles agreed on in the Synod holden at London in the year 1562, and published by the Queen's Authority, they did allow of, and believe them to be consonant to the Word of God.

It is incredible what Reproaches the Archbishop incurred by setting forth these Articles, both from factious Ministers, and from some also of the Nobility; yet by his patience and constancy, he brought at last peace to the Church, making this his Motto, Vincit qui patitur. Neither did these at home only disturb the Peace of the Church, but others also from abroad, as Robert Brown, a young Student of Divinity in Cambridge, from whom came the Sectaries called Brownists; and Richard Harrison a petty Schoolmaster. These presuming to judge matters of Religion by their own private spirit, by Books set forth in Zealand, and dispersed at this time over England, condemned the Church of England for no Church, and ensnared many in the Nets of their new Schism. Neither could they be restrained, though their Books were prohibited by the Queens Authority, and soundly confuted by sundry learned men; and one or two of the Ring-leaders executed at Saint Edmunds Bury. In her one and thirtieth year, these Puritan's flames brake forth again, Books are written by the names of Martin Mar-Prelate, and A Demonstration of the Discipline, by Penry and Udal against the Government of Bishops; and nothing would please them, but the Discipline of Geneva: Many Abettors they had, Knightly and Wigstone; Knights, besides Cartwright (the father of them) Snape, King, Pardlow, Payn, and others; who though called in question, fined and imprisoned, could never be reclaimed. In her six and thirtieth year, the Queen caused the severity of the Laws to be executed upon Henry Barrow and his Sectaries, for disturbing the Church and the publick Peace, by scattering of their monstrous Opinions condemning the Church of England as no Christian Church, and derogating from the Queens Authority in Causes Ecclesiastical.

Works of Piety in her time.

THIS Queen converted Westminster Abbey into a Collegiate Church, and there ordained a Dean, twelve Prebendaries, a Master, Usher, and forty Scholars, Vicars, Singing-men, and twelve Alms-men. In her third year, the Merchant-Tailors founded a notable Grammar-School in the Parish of St. Lawrence Pountney in London. Also this year, William Harper Mayor of London founded a Free-School in the Town of Bedford, where he was born. In her seventh year, on the seventh of June, Sir Thomas Gresham laid the first stone of the Royal Exchange in Cornhil, which in November the year after, at his own charges was finished, being the year 1567. In her tenth year, the Citizens of London builded a new Conduit at Walbrook corner, near to Dowgate, the water whereof is conveyed out of the Thames. Also this year, Sir Thomas Roe Mayor of London, caused to be enclosed within a wall of Brick one Acre of ground near unto Bedlam, without Bishops gate, to be a place of Burial for the dead of such Parishes in London as lacked convenient ground within their Parishes: He also builded a convenient Room in Pauls Churchyard, on the South side of the Cross, to receive a certain number of Hearers at Sermon time. Sir William Peter having himself been born at Exeter in Devonshire, gave to Exeter Colledge in Oxford, a hundred pound Lands a year: He also builded at Ingerstone in Essex, Alms-houses for twenty poor people, and giving them some competent maintenance. Sir Thomas Gresham had his dwelling house in Broad-street, London, which he dedicated to the profession of the Liberal Sciences, erecting there Lectures of Divinity, Civil Law, Phylick, Geometry, Astronomy, Musick and Rhetorick, allotting to the Professors very competent allowances. In her seventeenth year died Matthew Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury, who founded a Grammar-School in Rochdale, in the County of Lancaster: He also procured to Corpus Christi Colledge in Cambridge, thirteen Scholarships, and built two Chambers for Scholars, and the inward Library of the same Colledge, and procured to it the Patronage of St. Mary Abchurch in London, with many other works of like kind. Sir Nicholas Bacon L. Keeper gave for Six Scholars to be found in Benet Colledge in Cambridge, three pounds six shillings and eight pence for ever. Edmund Grindall Archbishop of Canterbury, founded a Free-School in Cumberland, where he was born, and gave many pensions to both Universities. Francis Countess of Sussex, Sister to Sir Henry Sidney, founded Sussex-Sidney Colledge in Cambridge: As likewise Sir Walter Mildmay Chancellor of the Exchequer, founded Emanuel Colledge in the same University. Sir Thomas Bodley erected & furnished the famous publick Library at Oxford. Alexander Nowel Dean of Pauls, endowed Brasen-nose Colledge in Oxford, where he was brought up with two hundred pounds per annum, and dyed in the year 1602. Sir Roger Manhood chief Baron of the Exchequer, built seven seven Almshouses in Canterbury giving to every Almshouse four pounds yearly: and our worthy Country-man William Lambert, built an Almshouse at Greenwich, which he called, The Colledge for the poor of Queen Elizabeth. Also in her time, namely, in the year 1595, Bevis Bulmar Gentleman, builded a large house of great height, called an Engine, at the Bridge-foot, for the conveying and forcing of Thames water to serve in the middle and west parts of the City. Also in her time, namely, in the year 1596, Ralph Rokeby one of her Masters of Requests, then dying, gave by his Will, to Christs Hospital in London, 100*l.* to the Colledge of the poor of Queen Elizabeth in East Greenwich, 100*l.* to the poor Scholars in Cambridge, 100*l.* to the poor Scholars in Oxford, 100*l.* to the Prisoners in the two Compters in London, 100*l.* to the Prisoners in the Fleet, 100*l.* to the Prisoners in Ludgate, 100*l.* to the Prisoners in Newgate, 100*l.* to the Prisoners in the Kings Bench, 100*l.* to the Prisoners in the Marshallsey, 100*l.* to the Prisoners in the White-Lyon, 20*l.* a liberal and pious Legacy; and worthy not to be forgotten.

Casualties in her Time.

The Pulse to beat of one that was dead. A vein of Brasse found. Also the Stone called Lapis Calaminiaris. Gun-powder first made in England. The Spire of Pauls Church burnt down with Lightning.

Many monstrous Births.

IN the first year of Her Reign, dyed Sir Thomas Cheyney. Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports, of whom it is reported for a certain, That his pulse did beat more than three quarters of an hour after he was dead, as strongly as if he had been still alive. In her third year there was found near Keswick in Cumberland, a most rich Vein of pure and native Brasse, which had lain neglected a long time: Also the stone called Lapis Calaminiaris, which is of great use in Brasse-Works, was first brought into England at this time, and in most plentiful manner. Likewise this Queen was the first that caused Gun-powder to be made in England, which before was had from forrain parts, and at dear rates. In her third year, the Spire of the Cathedral Church of Pauls being five hundred and twenty foot from the ground, and two hundred and sixty from the square Steeple where it was placed, and was made of wooden materials, but covered with Lead, was with lightning burnt down, together with the Roofs of that large Church, and that within the space of five hours; the Roofs were after re-edified, but the Spire is yet wanting. The Queen gave towards it a thousand Marks in Money, and a thousand load of Timber; and the City granted a Benevolence, and three Fifteenths; and the Clergy also contributed to it. Also this year there were many monstrous Births: A Mare brought forth a Foal with two heads, and a long tail growing out between the two Heads. A Sow farrowed a Pig with two Bodies, eight Feet, and but one Head. A man-child was born at Chichester in Sussex, having Arms and Legs like to an Anatomy, the Breast and Belly monstrous big, about the Neck a great collar of flesh and skin, growing like the ruff of a shirt. In her sixth year, upon the returning of the Army from Newhaven, the Pestilence was brought into England, but especially into London; where, in one year there dyed one and twenty thousand and five hundred. This year also, in the month of December, was driven on the shore at Grimseby in Lincolnshire, a monstrous Fish, in length nineteen yards, his tail fifteen foot broad, and six yards between the eyes. Twelve men stood upright in his mouth to get the Oyl. In her seventh year, on the one and twentieth of December, began a Frost, so extream, that on New-years Even people passed over the Thames on foot; some played at foot-ball, some shot at pricks, as if in had been firm ground. Yet this great Frost, the third of January at night began to thaw, and by the fifth day there was no Ice at all to be seen; which sudden thaw caused great Inundations. In her eighth year, within the space of ten Months, there dyed in London seven Aldermen, namely, Edward Banks, Richard Chamberlain, Sir Martin Bowes, Sir Richard Mallory, Sir William Hewet, Sir Thomas White, and Richard Lambert, one of the Sheriffs for that year. The same year also, in the Town of Osweestre in Shropshire, two hundred houses, in the space of two hours were consumed with fire. In her tenth year, were taken in Suffolk, at Downham Bridge near to Ipswich, seventeen monstrous Fishes; some of them being seven and twenty Foot in length: And in the same year, many Dutch flying into England, to avoid the persecution of the Duke D<sup>e</sup> Alva, were the first that brought into England the Art of making Bayes, Sayes, Serges, and such woven stuffs both Wollen and Linen. In her time a rich Vein of Copper was found the Earl of *Northumberland*s Grounds, which she by her Preogative seized upon. In her thirteenth year, a prodigious Earth-quake happened in the East-parts of Herefordshire, near a little Town called Kinnaston. On the seventeenth of February, at six of the clock in the evening, the earth began to open, and a Hill with a Rock under it (making at first a great bellowing noise, which was heard a great way off) lifted it self up a great height, and began to travel, bearing along with it the Trees that grew upon it, the Sheeps-folds, and Flocks of Sheep abiding there at the same time. In the place from whence it was first moved, it left a gaping distance forty foot broad, and four-score Ells long; the whole Field was about twenty Acres. Passing all along, it overthrew a Chappel standing in the way, removed an Yew-Tree planted in the Church-yard, from the West into the East; with the like force it thrust before it High-ways, Sheep-folds, Hedges and Trees, made tilled-ground Pasture, and again turned Pasture into Tillage. Having walked in this sort from Saturday in the evening, till Monday noon, it then stood still. In her fifteenth year, in the month of November, a new Star or rather a Meteor (but that it was found to be above the Moon) was seen in Cathedra Cassiopeæ, exceeding Jupiter in brightness, and in that place was carried with the Diurnal motion of the Heavens sixteen months together, though after eight months it was perceived to grow less and less. In her sixteenth year, was a great Dearth, so as Wheat was sold at five and six shillings the Bushel, and other things in proportion. In her seventeenth year, a vast mighty Whale was cast upon the Isle of Thanet in Kent, twenty Ells long, and thirteen foot broad from the belly to the back-bone, and eleven foot between the eyes, One of his eyes being taken out of his head, was more than a Cart with six Horses could draw; the Oyl being boyled out of the head, was Parma-citte. This year also, the River Thames ebbd and flowd twice within an hour: and in the month of November, the Heaven seemed to be all on a fire. Also on the four and twentieth of February, being a great Frost, after a Flood which was great, there came down the River of Se-verne such a swarm of Flies and Beetles, that they were judged to be above a hundred Quar-ters; the Mills thereabout were dammed up with them for the space of four days, and then were cleansed by digging them out with Shovels. In her two and twentieth year, a strange apparition happened in Somersetshire, threescore personages all cloathed in black, a furlong in distance from those that beheld them; and after their appearing, and a little while tarrying, they vanished away, but immediately another strange company, in like manner, colour and number appeared in the same place: and they encountred one another, and so vanished away. And the third time appeared that number again, all in bright armour, and en-countred one another, and so vanished away. This was examined before Sir George Norton, & sworn by four honest men that saw it, to be true. In her three and twentieth year, in the beginning of April, about six a clock afternoon, happened an Earthquake not far from Tork, which in some places struck the very stones out of Buildings, & made the Bells in Churches to jangle. The night following, the earth trembled once or twice in Kent, and again the first day of May. In this year also, in the Town of Walsham in Suffex, a Child of eleven years old, named William Wi-thers, lay in a trance for the space of ten days without any sustenance; and at the last coming to himself, he uttered to the standers by, many strange speeches; inveighing against Pride, Co-vetousness, coldness of Charity, and other enor-mous sins. In her six and twentieth year, being the year 1588, the like Prodigy happened in Dorsetshire; as in the year 1571, had happened in Herefordshire; A Field of three Acres in Blackmore, with the Trees and Fences, moved from its place, and passed over another Field, tra-velling in the High-way that goeth to Herne, and there stayed. In her eight and twentieth year, Tobacco was first brought out of the West-In-dies, into England by Ralph Lane. In her five and thirtieth year, there was so great a drought, that not only the Fields, but the Springs themselves were dried up, and many Cattle every where dyed for want of water. The River of Thames likewise did so fail, that a Horseman might ride over at London-Bridge. In her six and thirtieth year, was a great Plague in London; so as there dyed this year in London and the suburbs, seven-teen thousand eight hundred and ninety, besides the Lord Mayor, and three Aldermen; and Michaels Term was holden at St. Albans. For the price of Victuals in her time, we may take a pattern of the rest by one kind; for John Stow reporteth, that in his youth he fetched many a half penniworth of Milk from a Farm by the Mi-nories, and never had less than three Ale-Pints for a half-penniworth in Summer, nor less than two Ale-pints for a half penny in the Winter. Al-so in the year 1522, a fat Ox was sold at London for twenty six shillings at the most; a fat Wea-ther for three shillings four pence; a fat Calf the like price: a fat Lamb for twelve pence, three pound of Beef for a penny.

Of Her Personage and Condition.

She was of stature indifferent tall, slender and straight, fair of Complexion, her hair in-clining to pale yellow, her fore-head large and fair, her eyes lively and sweet, but short-sighted, her Nose somewhat rising in the midst; the whole compass of her countenance somewhat long, yet of admirable beauty, but the beauty of her mind was far more admirable: She had been a Subject which taught her to Rule; She had been in mi-sery, which taught her to be mercifull; and indeed, never Prince ruled with more justice, & with her justice mingled more mercy: She had more Valour in her than was fit for a woman, but that she was Ruler over men; and more Humi-lity in her than was fit for a Prince, but that she meant to be a President to women. She delighted in nothing so much, as in the love of her people, which she procured by ordaining good Magi-strates, and forbearing Impositions. Her way not to need them, was frugality; and her way to have them when she needed them, was libe-rality. She made honour in her time the more honourable, by not making it common; and in-deed, knowing it to be an influence from her self, she kept it, as her self, a Virgin, and would not prostitute it to unworthy persons. She declined being a Mother of Children, to the end she might be a Mother of her Country; and indeed, no mother ever loved her children more, than she did her people; and therefore never children lo-ved a mother more, than her people did her. She coveted not so much to be an owner of riches, as of rich Subjects; for she thought money did as well in their Coffers as in her own: and indeed she never wanted, when they had it; and they always had it, when she needed it. Never Prince had a wiser Council than she, yet never Prince needed it less; for she was her self a Counsellor to her Council. In sum, whatsoever may in flattery be said of a wise, just, merciful, religious, and learned Prince, may truly be said of her: in all which, if ever she had an equal, yet she never certainly had a superiour. In play-ing her game of Fortune, she loved not an after-game; for she liked Preventions better than Remedies. She was admirable in expressing her mind, both by speech and writing: and if colle-ction could be made of her Apophthegms, & ex-temporal Orations, it would certainly excell any thing extant in that kind: and for her writing, Sir Henry Savile affirms, That he had seen some Translations of hers, which far exceeded the Ori-ginals. Never Prince kept greater State with less stateliness: Her Pensioners and Guard were always the tallest and goodliest Gentlemen and Yeomen of the Kingdom: Her Maids of Honor and other Women about her, the fairest and most beautiful Laides of the Realm; and yet her self a Diana amongst her Nymphs; inso-much that a great Lord of France, being enter-tained at Court, and the Queen asking him how he liked her Ladies, made answer, It was hard to judge of Stars, in the presence of the Sun.

Of her Death and Burial.

IT was now the Year 1602, when she feeling some Infirmities of Old Age and Sickness, retired her self at the end of January, to Richmond; at which time, in a sad Omen, she commanded the Ring to be filed off her finger, where-with she was solemnly at the first inaugurated into the Kingdom, and since that time had never taken it off, it being grown into the flesh in such manner, that it could not be drawn off without filing. At the beginning of her Sickness, the Almonds of her Jaws began to swell, and her appetite by little and little failed her; withal she gave her self wholly to sadness and heaviness, which some imputed to her care for the loss of the Earl of Essex; Others, because she heard, that divers of the Nobility sought the favour of the King of Scots, adoring him as the Sun rising, and neglecting her: but howsoever, in March, a kind of benumbedness seized upon her, with a deep melancholy, so as she would sit silently, refrain her meat, and not admit of any Conference, but with the Archbishop of Canterbury, with whom she prayed fervently, till such time as her speech failed her, which failed her a day before she died. She being in this case, it was thought fit the Admiral and Secretary should go to her, to know her mind concerning a Successor; to whom she gave this Answer; My Throne hath been the Throne of Kings, I would not a mean Person should succeed me. The Secretary requesting her to speak more plainly, I will (said she) have a King succeed me; and what King, but the King of Scots, my nearest Kinsman? After this, the Archbishop exhorted her to think of God; That do I (said she) nor do my thoughts ever wander from him. And when her tongue no longer served her, it was evident by the lifting up of her hands and eyes, that her thoughts were fixed upon him. And so on the four and twentieth day of March, being the last day of the year 1602, she yielded up her soul to God, when she had lived Threescore and nine years, six months, and seven days; Reigned Four and forty years, four months, and seven days. Her Body was embalmed, wrapped in Lead, and brought to White-hall; from whence on the eight and twentieth of April following, in great solemnity, it was carried into the Collegiate Church of Saint Peters at Westminster, and there interred in the Vault of her Grand-father, King Henry the Seventh, in his Magnificent Chapell, where our Renowned Sovereign King James hath built her a Princely Monument, inscribed with Epitaphs to her eternal glory. At her Funeral were said to be Mourners in black, to the number of One thousand and six hundred persons.

Men of Note in her time.

THE Ocean is not more boundless, than the number of Men of Note in her time; but though all of them cannot be reckoned, yet some of them must not be omitted. And to begin with States-men: An exquisite States-man for his own ends, was Robert Earl of Leicester; and for his Countries good, Sir William Cecil Lord Burleigh; as also Sir Francis Walsingham, that great underminer of Conspirators. Famous Sea-men, where the Earl of Cumberland, the Lord Thomas Howard, afterward Earl of Suffolk; and of meaner Rank, Sir John Hawkins, Sir Martin Forbysher, Sir Walter Raleigh, Cavendish, Preston, Ryman; and to name the worthiest last, Sir Francis Drake, who though he were but a short square-bodied man, yet his great Acts have made the Spaniards believe that he was some goodly personage. Great Commanders by Land, were Robert Earl of Essex, the Lord Willoughby, the Lord Grey of Wilton, Sir Francis Vere, Sir Roger Williams, Baskerville, Savage, and the Honour of his Family, and our English Nation, Sir John Norris. Learned Gentlemen and Writers, were Sir Thomas Chaloner, employed by Queen Elizabeth as her Leiger in Spain, who wrote five Books of the restoring of the English Common-wealth, in Elegant Verses, while (as he said) he lived in a Stove in Winter, and in a Barn in Summer: Roger Askam, born in Yorkshire, notably skilful in the Greek and Latine Tongues, who had sometime been School-master to Queen Elizabeth, and her Secretary for the Latine Tongue; but taking too great delight in Gaming and Cock-fighting, he both lived and died in mean estate, yet left behind him sundry Monuments of Wit and Industry. Sir Thomas Smith born at Saffron Walden in Essex, sometime Secretary to King Edward the sixth, who wrote an imperfect Work of the English Common-wealth, a singular Book of the Orthography of the English Tongue, and another of the Pronunciation of the Greek; the first man that set on foot the Law for serving the Colledges with Provision. Sir Henry Savill, Provost of Eaton, and Reader to Queen Elizabeth, who set forth all St. Chrysostom's Works in Greek, and by translating of Cornelius Tacitus, deserved as much of the English Tongue, as he of the Latin. But above all, the admirable Sir Philip Sidney, who by writing in a light Argument, shewed how excellently, and beyond all comparison he could have done in a grave. Learned Divines were John Jewel, born in Devonshire, a Student in Corpus Christi Colledge in Oxford, in Queen Maries time an Exile, by Queen Elizabeth made Bishop of Salisbury, who wrote an Apology for the Protestant Doctrine, and died at scarce Fifty years of age, in the Fourteenth year of Queen Elizabeth. John Whitaker, Master of St. Johns Colledge in Cambridge, who Learnedly answered all the Books of Bellarmino. Bilson Bishop of Winchester, sometimes Fellow of New Colledge in Oxford, who, amongst his other learned Works, hath written notably of Christs descent into Hell. Richard Hooker, Preacher at the Temple, who with too much meekness smothered his great Learning.

Learning, yet hath something discovered it in his five Books of Ecclesiastical Discipline, and died in the year 1599. Alexander Nowel Dean of Pauls, who forbearing deeper works, set forth a Catechism, according to the Doctrine of the English Church, and died in the year 1620. After such men, it might be thought ridiculous to speak of Stage-players; but seeing excellency in the meanest things deserves remembering, and Roscus the Comedian is recorded in History with such commendation, it may be allowed us to do the like with some of our Nation. Richard Bourbidge and Edward Allen, two such Actors as no age must ever look to see the like: and, to make their Comedies compleat, Richard Tarleton, who for the part called the Clowns Part, never had his match, never will have. For Writers of Plays, and such as had been Players themselves, William Shakespeare and Benjamin Jonson, have specially left their Names recommended to Posterity.

THE REIGN OF KING JAMES.

Anno. Dom.
1603.

JAMES the Fourth, King of Scotland, married Margaret eldest Daughter of Henry the Seventh, King of England, by whom he had James the Fifth, who had one only Child Mary Queen of Scots, who had one only Son James the Sixth, who from James the Fourth had undoubted Right to the Kingdom of Scotland; and from Margaret, King Henry the Seventh's eldest Daughter, (the Male line being clean extinct) unquestionable Title to the Crown of England: whereupon Queen Elizabeth being dead about Ten a clock in the morning the 24th of March, King James the Sixth, King of Scotland, was the very same day (Mr. Secretary Cecil himself reading his Title, and Queen Elizabeth's Will) proclaimed King of England, Scotland and Ireland, by sound of Trumpet, first at White-Hall, and then in Cheapside, in presence of all the Lords of the Council, and other of the Nobility, with a general Acclamation of all sorts of people, that we may truly say, Sorrow was never more deceived than at this time; for where upon the death of Queen Elizabeth, it was expected there would be nothing for a long time but sorrowing and lamenting: now that very sorrow was swallowed up of joy, her death bringing with it no other alteration but only of Sex, in all other points in a manner the same; the like Wisdom, the like Learning, the like Justice, the like Religiousness in them both: only bettered in this, that we changed a Queen of 70 years old, whom we could not look to keep long, for a King of 36, whom we might well hope to enjoy many years.

Sir Robert Cary acquaints him with the Queens death

Queen Elizabeth was no sooner dead, but Sir Robert Cary a younger Son of the late Lord Hunsdon, posted away unsent, to King James in Scotland, informing him of the accident: for bringing which news, the King afterwards rewarded him with making him a Baron of the Realm, and Lord of Leppington. But though it were sufficient for the Kings information, that he heard the news by Sir Robert Cary; yet it was not sufficient for the Lords of the Council in discharge of their duty, if he heard it not from them; and therefore within a very few days, as soon as they could provide fit men, they sent first Sir Charles Piercy, and Mr. Thomas Somerset, and after them Sir Thomas Lake Clerk of the Signet, a man well acquainted with the State of the Kingdom, both to acquaint him with the general applause of all the Realm, to receive him for their Sovereign, and also inform him in what terms the state of the Kingdom stood, that so he might not come altogether a stranger when he came into it.

Queen Elizabeth indeed had left him not only a Kingdom, but a Kingdom without incumbrance; no Wars abroad, no Sedition at home; and not only so, but a Kingdom furnished with all the fruits of Piece, plenty of all things necessary, and of all necessary things the chiefeft, a Wise Council; for she left Sir Thomas Egerton Lord Chancellour, Thomas Lord Buckhurst Lord Treasurer, Charles Earl of Nottingham Lord Admiral, and Sir Robert Cecil Principal Secretary: Four such men that the meanest of them were sufficient to sit at the Helm of any Kingdom. Yet to these and divers other besides (all whom the King now by his Letters authorizeth to exercise their several places, as formerly they had done) he addeth certain new ones of his own chusing; as namely, the Earls of Northumberland and Cumberland, the Lord Thomas Howard, and then after the Lord Henry Howard, the one the brother, the other the Son of the late Duke of Norfolk who had suffered so much, that at last he suffered for the Queen his Mother. But although the calling of these two last to such a place, was done (no doubt) out of favour to that house, yet one of them being known, the other doubted to be a Papist, it was presently apprehended as a favour to that side; and the Catholicks were not a little confident of his his good inclination to them all in general. And it was indeed but necessary they should at this time have such a conceit; for in the late Queens sickness, a little before her death, Pope Clement the eighth had written two Brieves to the Catholics in England, to admit of none to succeed in the Kingdom, when that miserable woman should happen to die (so he pleased to stile the most glorious Queen that ever lived) but such a one, of whose good inclination to the See of Rome, they should at least be well perswaded. And now King James having settled the Government of his Kingdom of Scotland, and made convenient preparation for his journey: on the fifth of April 1603, he sets forward and rode that day from Edenburgh to Dunglass, and from thence the next day to Berwick, where having stayed two days, the eighth of April he rode to Withrington a house of Sir Robert Caries, from thence the ninth to Newcastle, where he stayed Sunday, and heard the Bishop of Durham preach, and so joyful were the Townsmen of his being there, that all the time of stay they bore the charge of his household. The thirteenth of April he set forward to Durham, and from thence the fourteenth to Waltworth, the fifteenth towards York, where his train encreased to such a multitude, that he was fain to publish an inhibition of the peoples resorts, and flocking to him. At York it was a question to whom it belonged to bear the sword before the King in that place; for both the Earl of Cumberland claimed it as hereditary to his House, and the President of the North claimed it as belonging to his place, but it was adjudged to George Earl of Cumberland; who accordingly did it. From York the eighteenth day the King rode to Grimston, to a house of Sir Edward Stanhops; the nineteenth to Pomfret, and so to Doncaster, where he lodged at the sign of the Bear and Sun: The twentieth of April he rode towards Worsuppe, a house of the Earl of Shrewsbury; from thence the twenty first to Newark upon Trent, where a Cutpurse being taken in the fact, was by the Kings warrant hanged; a most unseasonable delinquent, who would force the King to a work of Justice at a time when he intended nothing but mercy: the 22 to Beaver Castle, a house of the Earl of Rutlands, hunting all the way as he rode: From Beaver the 23 to Burleigh, where having stayed two or three days, the 27 he removed to Hinchinbrook, a house of Sir Oliver Cromwells, where the heads of the University of Cambridge met him: From thence he rode towards Royston, and as he passed through Godmanchester, a Town close by Huntington, the Bailiffs of the Town presented him with 70 Teem of Horse all traced to fair new Ploughs, at which the King wondring, they said, it was the ancient custom so to do when any King of England passed through their Town, and by which, as being the Kings Tenants, they held their Land. At Royston, he lodged that night at Mr. Chesters house at his own charge, which he had not done before, since his coming into England. The 30 of April he rode to Standon, a house of Sir Thomas Sadlers, where he stayed Sunday and heard the Bishop of London Preach. The second of May he removed to Brosbourn, a house of Sir Henry Cocks, cofferer to the late Queen, and now to the King, where met him the Lord Keeper, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord Admiral, and divers other Lords. The third of May he came to Theobalds, a house of Sir Robert Cecils; when all the Lords of the late Queens most honourable Privy Council presented themselves, and there the Lord Keeper made a grave Oration. At this house, the fourth of May, the King made divers Noblemen of Scotland of his Privy Council here in England; namely the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Marre, the Lord Hume, and Sir George Hume Treasurer of Scotland, Sir James Elpingston his Secretary, and the Lord of Kinlosse, made afterward Master of the Rolls: Saturday the seventh of May, he rode towards London, where by the way, the Sheriff Swinerton, and the Aldermen met him; and by their Oratour Mr. Richard Martin, made him an Eloquent Oration; and then he rode on to the Charter-house near Smithfield, a house belonging to the Lord Thomas Howard, where he stayed four days: and at his departing thence made the Lord Zouch, and the Lord Burgley, of his Privy Council. But we must not here omit, that from the Kings first setting forth of Scotland, as he was in all places received with Royal entertainment and rich presents, so he again carried himself most affable, and distributed his favours in most plentiful manner: in some places discharging all prisoners, but such as lay for Treason or Murder: but especially in conferring the order of Knight-hood, of which sort the first he made, was Mr. John Peyton, son to Sir John Peyton, Lieutenant of the Tower. After him divers Scots in sundry places; at Theobalds, eight and twenty (of which number the compiler of this work, though the unworthiest, was one); at the Charter-house above fourscore: and not many days after, no fewer than at least a hundred; and before the year went about God knows how many hundreds, that one would wonder what the King would do with so many Milites, having no war toward: But it was indeed fit to have a vent to the passage of Honour, which during Queen Elizabeths Reign had been so stopped, that scarce any County of England had Knights enow to make a Jury.

Before we go farther, it will not be amiss to shew what great men attended King James out of Scotland; as namely, the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Marre, the Lord Hume, and many other great Lords; and many other whom he afterward made great Lords, as being in his special favour: first Sir George Hume, made afterward Earl of Dunbarre; then Sir Thomas Erskin, made Earl of Kelly; then Sir John Ramsay made Earl of Holderness; (which two last had the fortune to come first in to his rescue against the Gowries) then Sir James Hay, made afterward Earl of Carlile; and then Sir Richard Preston made Earl of Kildare in Ireland; but whose great fortune by marrying the Heir of that Earldom was afterward the occasion of his great misfortune; for coming out of Ireland, he was unfortunately cast away and drowned.

But though King James was now safely come himself to London; yet he accounted himself but half come, untill his Queen and Children were come to him; and therefore there are now appointed to go to conduct them; of Lords, the Earl of Suffex, the Earl of Lincoln, the L. Compton, the Lord Norris, and Sir George Carew Knight, Lord President of Manster: of Ladies, the Countess of Worcester, the Countess of Kildare, the Lady Anne Herbert Daughter to Henry Earl of Pembroke; broke; the Lord Scroops Lady, the Lady Rich, wife to the Lord Rich, and the Lady Walsingham, one of the late Queens Bed-chamber: But although these only were appointed to go, yet many other Lords and great Ladies went of themselves to attend her Majesty; as, the Countess of Bedford, the Lady Hastings, the Lady Cecil, the Lady Hatton, the Lady Harrington, and divers other: and with this Princely attendance, the Queen with two of her Children, namely Prince Henry of the age of nine years, and the Lady Elizabeth, on the eleventh of June came to York: where resting themselves some few dayes, on the seven and twentieth of June they came to Easton in Northamptonshire, a house of Sir George Fermors, where the King met them at dinner: and afterward they rode together to a house of Sir John Fortescue, and so to London. The Kings younger son, Charles Duke of Albany came not at this time, as being not three years old, and therefore not thought able to endure such a journey; but the year following falling sick of a Feaver, Doctor Atkins one of the Kings Physicians was sent to conduct him, who in six weeks cured him of his feavour; and the first week of October brought him life to Windsor, where the King then lay; for which service he was so well rewarded, that together with the gains of his usual practice, he grew to a greater wealth than was usual for Physicians.

Lords made by the King.

King James had distributed the meaner Order of Knighthood, very plentifully; now he thinks fit to raise his distributions to a higher degree, and thereupon the twentieth of May, he made Sir Robert Cecil Baron of Esmond; Sir Robert Sidney Baron of Penbunth; Sir William Knowles Baron of Greys, and Sir Edward Wootton Baron of Morley; and not long after he made the Lord Henry Howard Earl of Northampton; and Thomas Sackville Lord Buckhurst, he made Earl of Dorset.

Ambassadors from all Princes of Christendom come to congratulate the Kings happy coming to the Crown.

The King had by this time found the love and affection of his own people; but the affection of neighbouring Princes towards him stood yet in suspense; when now to take away that doubt, came first in the beginning of June, an Ambassador from the Palgrave of Rhine; presently after another from the States of Holland and Zeland; another from the Archduke of Austria; another from the King of Spain; from the Seignior of Venice another; another from the Duke of Florence; and lastly, on the eighth of June Monsieur de Rosny from the King of France: all congratulating his happy coming to the Crown of England; for entertainment of which Ambassadors, and all other that should come after, the King had erected an Officer by the name of Master of the Ceremonies, allowing him two hundred pounds a year Fee; and the first that had the place was Sir Lewis Lewkenor: a Gentleman, who besides other good parts, was very skilful in the neighbouring languages.

The Office of Master of the Ceremonies erected.

Fourteen Serjeants of Law made.

Upon the seventeenth of May this year, were made fourteen Serjeants at Law: whereof eleven had received Writs the last year of Queen Elizabeth: namely, Tho. Coventry, Robert Haughton, Lawrence Tanfield, John Crook, Thomas Foster, Edward Philips, Thomas Harris, James Altham, Henry Hubbard, Augustine Nicholls, and Robert Parker; to whom the King added three new; John Sherley, George Saygge, and Richard Hutton, who all kept their Feast together in the middle Temple-Hall.

One would think that at this time all Offences against Queen Elizabeth had been forgotten; but King James more tender of wrongs done to her than to himself, would not suffer Valentine Thomas so to escape; who after he had lyen many years prisoner in the Tower, was on the fourth of June arraigned at the Kings Bench Bar; and for conspiracy against the late Queen and some of her Council, was on the seventh of June after six a clock at night, drawn to St. Thomas Watrings, and there hanged and quartered.

Valentine Thomas for offences against Queen Elizabeth is hanged and quartered.

About this time the Honourable Charles Lord Montjoy returned out of Ireland; bringing along with him Hugh O'Neal, Earl of Tir-Oen; at whose coming to the King, the Lord Montjoy was sworn of the King Privy Council; and the Earl of Tir-Oen, who had been the cause of so much English blood shed, was yet pardoned, and proclamation made, that by all men he should be used with respect and honour.

The Lord Montjoy brings Tir-Oen into England, who is fully pardoned.

All this while the King had moved within his own Sphear, and had done nothing out of the Realm; his first Impoyment abroad was now in June, to his brother the King of Denmark, to whom he sent in Ambassage the Earl of Rutland upon two occasions: the one to be Godfather to his Son, who was named Christianus, the other to present him with the Order of the Garter; upon the like Impoyment, soon after, he sent the Lord Spencer to Frederick Duke of Wirtemberg; which Lords saw the said Princes invested with the Garter, and after honourable entertainment returned home.

The Earl of Rutland sent with the Garter to the King of Denmark. The Lord Spencer to the Duke of Wirtemberg.

It was now a time that every man might sit under his Vine, and enjoy the happiness of a peaceable Government; when suddenly like a storm in a fair Summers day, brake forth a Treason of a strange Composition: for where in all Treasons commonly they are all of some one Faction, in this there were people of all sorts, Priests and Laymen, Papists and Protestants, Noblemen, Knights and Gentlemen; that one would think it should be a well managed Treason, and yet was the shallowest that ever was set on foot; so shallow that it could scarce be observed, either what the Authors of it ailed, or what it was they would have done. Indeed the great favour which King James at his first coming to the Crown, shewed to the Earl of Southampton, was like to breed no good blood to those that were his opposites; and it was said (how true I know not) that as the King had sent to enlarge the Earl of Southampton, and appointed him to meet him upon the way: so when he heard of an intention that the Lord Cobham and Sir Walter Raleigh had to meet him, he sent them word they should spare their labour. But whether it were so or no, it seems they found some cause of discontentment, and discontentment will never want Complices; and by this means was the composition of this Treason made up, and thereupon were apprehended Henry Lord Cobham, and George Brook his brother, Thomas Lord Grey of Wilton, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Griffith Markham, and Sir Edward Parham Knights, Bartholomew Brookesby, and Anthony Copley Gentlemen, William Watson and William Clerk Priests: But though they were apprehended in July, yet they came not to their arraignment till

A Treason of a strange composition.

The Lord Cobham, Sir Walter Raleigh, others arraigned at Winchester; and why.

November following; for by reason of the sickness, which was then hot in London, the Term was put off till Craftino Martini, and, then to be kept at Winchester in Hampshire, only the Courts of the Exchequer, Wards and Liveries, and the Duchy of Lancaster were kept in the Kings Manor at Richmond in the County of Surrey; and so in the fourth of November following, all the foresaid Delinquents were removed from the Tower of London and other Prisons, by strong Guards to Winchester, and there Arraigned; Whose Indictment was for Conspiring

1. To kill the King.
2. To raise Rebellion.
3. To alter Religion.
4. To subvert the State.
5. To procure Invasion by Strangers.

Concerning the first Point, it was proved, that the Lord Grey intended to obtain the levying of 2000 men, for defence of the Low-Countries, and with them to seize upon the King and Prince, and take the Lords of the Council in their Chambers. For the other Points, It was proved, That the Lord Cobham and Sir Walter Raleigh, met at St. Martins in the Fields, and there consulted about raising Sedition, moving Rebellion, altering Religion, subverting the State, and to set up the Lady Arbella. And particularly for the Point of subverting the State; it was proved, That Watson was designed to be Lord Chancellor, George Brook Lord Treasurer, Sir Griffith Markham Secretary, and the Lord Grey to be Master of the Horse, and Earl Marshal of England. And for effecting of these Treasons, it was proved, That Watson the Priest had devised Oaths in writing, by which all parties were bound to keep them secret. And for the last point, It was proved, that Sir Walter Raleigh was appointed to treat with Count Aremberg for six hundred thousand Crowns, and the Lord Cobham to go to the Archduke and to the King of Spain, to perswade them to assist the Lady Arbella. These things being proved against them; on the days in which they were severally Indicted, the most which was replied in mitigation of their fault, was first by Watson, who affirmed it could not be Treason, because the King was not yet Crowned; and then by the Lord Grey, that it was but a verbal matter, and never took effect, and therefore could be no Treason: but these assertions being both refuted, they were all (except Sir Edward Parham, who only was acquitted) on their several days of Indictment, found guilty of Treason, and had Judgement accordingly. The Priests Watson and Clerk were executed at Winchester, the nine and twentieth of November: George Brook was beheaded the fifth of December; but then the hand of Justice stayed, and this was the course which the King held in shewing mercy. After the death of the three before named, he signed three other Warrants for the execution of the late Lord Cobham, the Lord Grey, and Sir Griffith Markham, on a certain day then following; but before that day, he privately framed another Warrant written with his own hand to the Sheriff, (who was then Sir Benjamin Tichburn) by which he countermanded the former Warrants; and that there might be no notice taken of it, he sent it by Mr. John Gybbe, a Scotch-man, and one utterly unknown of all the Company, appointing him to deliver it so, that it might not take effect, till after their several confessions, and at the very point of their Execution; which was accordingly performed. At which time it was a wonderful thing to see how the Delinquents falling upon their knees, lamented their misdoings, and most of all how they extolled the Kings unspeakable mercy. But though thus pardoned, yet were they carried back to the Tower, where the Lord Grey not long after died, and in him was extinct that Barony, which had formerly brought forth many valorous and worthy men. Sir Griffith Markham after some time was set at liberty, and passed beyond Sea, where he lived long after in mean account. The Lord Cobham likewise was afterward discharged of Imprisonment, but deprived of his Estate, lived many years in great penury; and in him ended that noble Family, which had flourished in great honour many Ages. Sir Walter Raleigh was kept in the Tower, where to his great honour he spent his time in writing, and had been a happy man if he had never been released. But such is our state, that no mans fortune is understood, whether it be good or bad, until it be discovered by the Event.

The Lord Grey dies in the Tower, in which that barony was extinct.

The Lord Cobham discharged of Imprisonment, but lived in great penury, and in him that Barony also was extinct. Sir Walter Raleigh kept in the Tower: where, and how he spent his time.

But in this mean time many things had passed; for his Majesty having deferred the Feast of St. George until his being at some of his own Houses, held now the said Feast at Windfor, the second of July, where the Prince was installed Knight of the Garter; as also the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Southampton, the Earl of Marre, and the Earl of Pembroke; and at the same time were elected the King of Denmark, and the Duke of Wirtemberg: though their investing have been spoken of before.

The Prince and others made Knights of the Garter.

And now was preparation made for the Kings Coronation, and for a preparative unto it, he first restored the Earl of Southampton, and then raised in honour these following: Sir Thomas Egerton Lord Chancellor, he made Baron of Elsmere; Sir William Russel, Baron of Thornaugh; Sir Henry Grey, Baron of Groby; Sir John Peter, Baron of Writtle; Sir John Harrington, Baron of Exton; Sir Henry Denvers, Baron of Dantsey; Sir Thomas Gerrard, Baron of Gerard Bromley in the County of Stafford; and Sir Robert Spencer, Baron of Wormeleyton. After this he conferred inferior Orders; and made Knights, all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other: and lastly, made Knights of the Bath three-score and two, most of them Noblemens sons, and the rest Gentlemen of special worth. These things done on the five and twentieth of July, being St. James day, the King and Queen were together Crowned, and anointed at Westminster, by the hands of John Whitgift, Archbishop of Canterbury, in presence of the Nobility and others, namely, Sir Robert Lee Lord Major of London, in a Gown of Crimson Velvet, his Brethren the Aldermen in Gowns of Scarlet, and 12 Principal Citizens admitted to attend on them: all other Citizens stayed from passing thither either by water or land by reason of the sickness; and the first of August following all suiters were by Proclamation forbidden to repair to the Court till the Winter following.

Divers Lords made.

The King and Queen are crowned together.

The fifth of August kept holy-day, for the Kings deliverance from the Gowries.

At this time the King forgot not a deliverance he had formerly had ; which though it were had in Scotland, yet he would have notice of it taken in England, which was his deliverance from the conspiracy of the Gowries on the fifth day of August three years before; and thereupon Friday being the fifth of August was by commandment appointed to be holy day, with Morning Prayer, Sermons and Evening Prayer that day, and Bonfires at night; which was then and after, during his life solemnly observed.

All Letters of Mart called in. A Treaty of Peace with Spain, and who were Commissioners.

King James had in him as it were two persons; one as he was the King of Scotland; and in this he was in perfect amity with the King of Spain; another as he was King of England, and in this he had some difference with Spain, but he, as Rex pacificus took the best from both, and was altogether for the Olive branch; and thereupon when at his coming into England, he found Letters of Mart granted against the Spaniards, he first caused them all to be called in, and then consented to a Treaty of perfect reconciliation: In which Treaty handled at London, the 18th of August, 1604, the Commissioners for the King of England where Tho. Earl of Dorset, Charles Earl of Nottingham, Charles Earl of Devonshire, Henry Earl of Northampton, and Robert Viscount Cranburn: For the King of Spain, John de Velasco Constable of Castile, John de Tassis Earl of Villa Mediana, and Alexander Robidius Professor of the Law in the Colledge of Millain: For the Archdukes, Charles Count of Aremberg, John Richardot President of the Privy Council, and Lodowick Werreiken principal Secretary: by whom a Peace being concluded and continued in many Articles; the Summer following, the King of Spain sent Don John de Velasco Constable of Castile and Duke of Fryas, also Pedrac de la Syerra, his great Chamberlain accompanied with divers Marquesses, Earls and Barons, who coming into England, were by the Earl of Devonshire on the nineteenth of August brought to the Court, where the King in his Chapel in the presence of the Commissioners and other English Lords, (the Duke of Fryas holding the Kings hands between his) took his Oath upon the holy Bible, religiously to observe and keep all the Articles of the Peace and League agreed upon: and in March following, being now the third year of King James, Charles Earl of Nottingham, Lord high Admiral of England was sent into Spain to take in like manner the King of Spains Oath: who accompanied with three Barons, and many Knights, Gentlemen and others, to the number of six hundred and fifty, the fifteenth of April arrived at Groyne, from whence he was conducted to Valledolid, three hundred miles off, where the King of Spain then kept his Court, entertained in all places as he passed, at the King of Spains charge, with so great provisions and such demonstration of love and gladness, that it plainly shewed the Spaniards were as glad of our friendship as we of theirs. The Lord Ambassador being come to the Court, he caused Thomas Knoll Esquire, to deliver the Presents sent from the King of England, which were six goodly Horses, with saddles and saddle-clothes very richly imbroidered, whereof three for the King, and three for the Queen: two Cross-bows with sheafs of Arrows: four fowling Pieces inlaid with plates of Gold: and a couple of Lyme-hounds of singular qualities: which the King and Queen in very kind manner accepted; and then on the thirtieth of May, the Lord Ambassador being set for, the King came forth into a large room: where having a little Table set before him, and a Bible very reverently laid upon it, together with a Crucifix, the Archbishop of Toledo read the Oath, at the reading whereof the Lord Ambassador held the Kings hands between his; and the King kneeling down, laid his hands upon the Book, and after his Oath subscribed to the Articles formerly concluded. Whilest the E. of Nottingham was thus employed in Spain, the right honourable Edward Earl of Hertford, was likewise sent Ambassador to Albertus and Isabella, Archdukes of Austria, to take their Oaths, for confirmation of the said Articles of Peace, which were taken at Bruxels the first of May with great state and solemnity: After which as the Earl bestowed on the Archdukes servants, to the full sum of 3 thousand pounds; So the Archduke at his departure, bestowed upon the Earl, a Jewel worth nine hundred pounds, and a suit of Arras worth three hundred, and bore his charges all the time of his stay at Bruxels. And now was King James truly Rex pacificus, in peace and amity with all Princes of Christendom, which few of his Ancestors ever were.

A little before this, in the Month of August, in the year 1604, the strong Town of Ostend in Flanders, after above three years siege, and the slaughter of above a hundred and twenty thousand men of both sides, and in defence whereof, Sir Francis Vere General, and his brother Sir Horatio Vere had shewed great Valour, was by the Marquess Spinola taken; for which service, the King of Spain made him Duke of Santa Severina, and the Lord General of all the Forces in the Low-Countries.

It was now the third year of King James his Reign, when he kept Saint Georges Feast at Greenwich, and there made two new Knights of the Garter; namely, the High and Mighty Prince Duke Ulrick, heir of Norway, and brother to our gracious Queen Anne: and the right Noble Lord Henry Howard Earl of Northampton. And upon the Saturday following in the Hall at Greenwich, being richly hanged with Arras, he created three Earls, one Viscount and four Barons: namely, Sir Robert Cecil Viscount Cranburn, he created Earl of Salisbury: Tho. Cecil Lord Burleigh his eldest brother, he created Earl of Exeter, and Sir Philip Herbert, younger brother to the Earl of Pembroke, he created Earl of Montgomery, then Robert Sidney Baron of Penhurst Lord Chamberlain to the Queen, he created Viscount Liste: Sir John Stanhope, Vicechamberlain to the King, he made Lord Stanhope of Harington: Sir George Carew Vicechamberlain to the Queen, he made Lord Carew of Clopton: Mr. Thomas Arundel of Devonshire, he made Lord Arundel of Warder: and Mr. William Cavendish, he made Lord Cavendish of Hardwick.

About this time a strange fancy possessed the brains of a professed Physitian, one Richard Haddock of new Colledge in Oxford, who pretended to preach at night in his sleep, in such sort, that though he were called aloud or stirred and pull'd by the hands or feet, yet would make no shew of either hearing or feeling. And this he did often, in the presence of many honourable persons, that came came to hear him, so as within a short time, his fame was spread through the land, by the name of the sleeping Preacher. At length, the King commanded him to be brought to the Court, where his Majesty sat up the most part of a night to attend the event: when at last Haidock making a shew to be asleep, began to pray; then taking a Text, made his Division; applying it to his purpose, for in his Preaching his use was to inveigh against the Pope, against the Cross in Baptism, and against the last Canons of the Church of England, and having ended his Sermon, seemed to continue sleeping. His Majesty having well observed the manner of his carriage; after a few days called the said Haidock before him, and in Conference with him (as he had indeed an admirable sagacity in discovering of Fictions) made him confess, that all he did was but imposture: and thereupon to fall upon his knees, and ask forgiveness: which the King granted, upon condition, that in all places he should openly acknowledge his offence; because many were brought into belief, that his nightly preaching was either by inspiration, or by vision.

Discovered by the King.

The King tries the nature of the Lyon, with a Cock and a Lamb.

We may not here think it unworthy the relating, seeing King James thought it not unworthy the seeing, thereby to observe the nature of the Lyon, and make a solemn matter of it; for on Monday the third of June (taking with him the Duke of Lenox, and divers Earls and Lords) he went to the Lyons Tower, and caused two Lyons, a male and female, to be put forth, and then a live-Cock to be cast before them; which they (as being their natural enemy) presently killed and sucked his blood. Then a live-Lamb to be put down to them, which the generous Lyons (as having respect to its Innocency) never offered to touch, though the Lamb was so bold as to go close unto them. Then the King caused those Lyons to be taken away, and another Lyon to be put forth, and two Mastiffs to be put in to him, who presently flew upon the Lyon, and turned him upon his back; and though the Lyon were superiour to them in strength, yet it seems they were his matches in courage, and so much superior as they were the first assailants, with whom otherwise, perhaps the Lyon would not have offered to meddle.

Charles the Kings younger Son is created Duke of York, and the solemn manner of it.

On Friday the fourth of January in the Kings second year, Charles Duke of Albany, the Kings second Son, being then but four years old, was created Duke of York; which because it was done with extraordinary solemnity, is not unworthy to have the manner of it here related. First were appointed Knights of the Bath, the Duke of Albany himself, then the Lord Willowby, the Lord Chandois, the Lord Compton, the Lord Norris, Will. Cecil Son and Heir to the Viscount Cranburn, Allen Percy Brother to the Earl of Northumberland, Thomas Somerset second Son to the Earl of Worcester, Francis Mannors Brother to the Earl of Rutland; Thomas Howard second Son to the Earl of Suffolk, and John Harington Son and Heir to the Lord Harington, the Earls of Oxford and Essex were Esquires to the Duke of Albany: all the Knights took their lodging that night in the first Gate-house going to Kings-street; where they supped, and had Bathes provided for them. The next morning being Saturday, they went out into the Park in their Hermits weeds, the Minstrels playing, and the Heralds going before them into the Court, and so into the Chapel, where every Knight with his Esquires went to the Altar, and there offered, (the Dean of the Chapel, in a rich Cope, holding the Basson.) After this they went up into their lodgings; and there new attired themselves in Robes of Crimson Taffaty, with Hats and white Feathers; and so went back to the great Chamber: where; by the King, they were girded with the Sword, and had gilt Spurs put upon them. This done; they were solemnly served at Dinner, and after went again to the Chapel, and there offered their Swords. The next day being Sunday, and Twelfth day, in Robes of purple Satin, with Doctors hoods on their shoulders, and Hats with white feathers, they issued out of the Revcestry with the Duke of Albany (being then to be made Duke of York) into the Hall, where the King sat under the Cloth of Estate, and then the Heralds going before, the Knights of the Bathe followed, and then the Earl of Suffolk, Lord Chamberlain came alone, then followed Henry Howard Earl of Southampton, and Charles Blunt Earl of Devonshire, carrying the Robes of Estate for the Duke of York; after whom Wriothsley Earl of Southampton carried the Coroner, George Clifford Earl of Cumberland the Golden Rod, the Earl of Worcester the Cap of Estate, and the Earl of Nottingham bore the Duke of Albany in his Arms, supported by the Earls of Dorset and Northumberland; who all coming in this order before the King, the Duke of Albany was after the Patent read, created Duke of York, with the Robes and Coroner put upon him; and the Golden Rod delivered into his hand: all which performed they went to Dinner, and the Solemnity ended.

About this time, on the fifteenth of June, Thomas Douglas a Scotch-man, was committed to the Tower, and had Irons put upon him, being sent thither but three days before from the Count Palatine of the Rhine. His offence was, that he had counterfeited the Kings Privy-Seal to divers Princes of Germany; One to the Arch-Bishop of Cullen, another to the Archbishop of Trier, another to the Duke of Cleve, another to the Archbishop of Moguntia, and a fifth to the Count Palatine of the Rhine; whereof being examined and convicted, he was drawn on a Hurdle into Smithfield, and there hanged and quartered.

Thomas Douglas a Scotch-man hanged in Smithfield, and why.

And now was a second Parliament appointed to be held at Westminster, on the nineteenth of March following, when four days before the day of sitting, the King, the Queen and Prince rode solemnly in great state through the City of London, where in divers places were erected Pageants, Presents given, Orations made, and all demonstrations of love and observance; and then the Parliament beginning, the King made a long and loving Speech to the House, wherein he signified the cause of his calling it; but in the time when it should have proceeded, there was suddenly discovered a Plot of Treason (so damnable and foul that posterity will hardly think it true, when they shall hear of it,) the Plot was to blow up with Gunpowder both Houses of Parliament at a time, when the King, Prince and all the Nobility should be sitting in the Upper-House, and all the Knights and Burgeses in the lower.

The Gunpowder Treason.

By whom first plot d.

And with what Alli-stants.

By what means first discovered.

The principal contriver of this Plot was Robert Catesbie, a Gentleman of great account in Northamptonshire, descended from that Catesbie who had been special Counsellour of King Richard the third, to whose family the Divine Providence had now ordained to give a disastrous period. This Catesbie not able to perform the work himself alone, draws in many to assist him, as namely, Thomas Piercy, Thomas Winter, John Grant, Ambrose Rookwood, John Wright, Francis Tresham, Guido Fawkes, and at last Sir Everard Digby, all earnest Papists, and all bound by Oath, and by receiving the Sacrament to be secret; For effecting of this Plot, they hired a house close adjoyning to the Upper-House of Parliament, where they were to dig through a Wall, for the fit placing of their Powder. About Candlemasse they had wrought the Wall half through: when suddenly they heard a noise in the next Room, which made them fear they had been discovered: but sending Guy Fawkes (who went now under the name of John Johnson, as Master Piercies man) to see what the matter was, he brought word, that it was a Cellar where Sea-coals had been laid, and were now a felling, and the Room offered to be let for a yearly Rent. This Room therefore as most fit for their purpose, being right under the Parliament-House, Master Piercy presently went and hired, laying into it twenty Barrels of Powder, which they covered with Billets and Faggots, for being discovered. Thus the first part of the Plot was put in good readines. It now remained to consider what was to be done, when the blow should be given: for though the King and Prince might be slain, yet the Duke of York and the Lady Elizabeth should still be safe, and so they should be no nearer their end than now they were. This work therefore for surprizing the Duke of York, Piercy undertook, and for surprizing the Lady Elizabeth, they agreed upon a march of hunting near to Dunchurch, under colour whereof they would draw company together, and surprize her at the Lord Harrington's house in Warwickshire, where she then lay, and then proclaim her Queen, and so be sure to have all things done as they would themselves. Thus far their bloody Plot went fairly on, and had perhaps gone on so still, if they had continued only bloody; but now a tendernefs of heart took some of them, lest their Friends should perish together with the rest, and this tendernefs overthrows them; for to prevent such promiscuous slaughter, a Letter was framed, and sent to the Lord Monteagle, Son and Heir to the Lord Morley, brought him by one of his Foot-men, which he received from an unknown man in the street; The Letter was this: My Lord, out of the love I bear to some of your friends, I have a care of your preservation; therefore I would wish you, as you tender your life, to forbear your attendance at this Parliament; for God and man have concurred to punish the wickedness of this time: And think not slightly of this Advertisement: for though there be no appearance of any stir; yet I say, they shall receive a terrible blow this Parliament, and yet shall not see who hurts them. This counsel is not to be contemned; because it may do you good, and can do you no harm; for the danger is past, as soon as you have burnt this Letter; and I hope you will make good use of it.

My Lord having read this Letter, though much perplexed, yet went presently to the Court at White-Hall, (the King being then a hunting at Royston) and delivered it to the Earl of Salisbury, principal Secretary of State, and the Earl having read it, acquainted first the Lord Chamberlain with it, and then the Lord Admiral, the Earl of Worcester and Northampton, who as soon as the King was returned from Hunting, acquainted him with it: the Earl of Salisbury telling him, that he thought it must be written either by a fool, or mad man, because of those words, (for the danger is past as soon as you have burnt this Letter); for if the danger were so soon past, what needed any warning? But the King considering it more deeply, apprehended presently some violent motion; and that it must be some sudden danger by blowing up with Powder; and thereupon commanded, that diligent search should be made in the Parliament House, and all other Rooms and Lodgings near adjoyning: which search was made by the Lord Chamberlain, accompanied with the Lord Monteagle, who entering the Cellar under the Upper House, found there great store of Faggots and Billets; which was answered to be for Mr. Piercie's own provision: but then it being considered why such store should be laid in for Mr. Piercie, who used to make but little stay in Town, and thereupon more diligent search being made, there was found under the Billets one of the Barrels of Powder; and after that all the rest, being six and thirty; together with other Instruments fit for their purpose; and then spying the said Fawkes to stand suspiciously, they apprehended him, and found in his pocket a piece of Touch-wood, a Tinder-box to light the Touch-wood, and a Watch, which Mr. Piercie had bought the day before, to try the short and long burning of the Touch-wood, which he had prepared to give fire to the train of Powder. The Plot being thus discovered, yet the most of the confederates met at Dunchurch, as they had agreed; where they divulged many detestable untruths against the King and State: signifying withal, that they were there met for advancement of the Catholick cause; hoping thereby to have many to joyn with them in their Rebellion: but this availed them nothing: for first Sir Richard Verney high Sheriff of Warwickshire chased them from thence; and Sir Richard Welch Sheriff of Worcestershire, knowing them to be entred into Mr. Littletons house at Walbach, beset them round, where Catesbie and Piercie issuing forth, were both slain with one shot of a Musquet; and after them, both the Wrights, John and Christopher, were likewise slain outright; Thomas Winter was taken alive: all which time, Francis Tresham remained still about the Court, offering his service for their suppression: but being suspected, was examined, and sent to the Tower, where he confessed all, and within a few dayes after died of the Strangury. On the seven and twentieth of January following, a Commission was directed to divers Lords and Judges of both Benches, for tryal of the rest of the Confederates: namely, Thomas Winter, Guido Fawkes, Robert Keyes, Thomas Bates, Robert Winter, late of Hoodington in Warwickshire, Esquire, John Graunt late of Northbrook, in the County of Warwick, Esquire, Ambrose Rookwood, late of Staningfield, in in Suffolk, Esquire, Sir Everard Digby, late of Gotthurst in Buckinghamshire, Knight, who were all condemned, and had Judgement to dye, and on the Thursday following Sir Everard Digby, Robert Winter, Graunt and Bates, were accordingly drawn, hanged and quartered at the West end of Pauls Church in London, and the Friday the other four: namely, Thomas Winter, Keyes, Rookwood, and Fawks were executed in the Parliament-yard at Westminster. Of all whom, none was so much lamented as Sir Everard Digby, and indeed worthily; for he was a goodly personage, and of excellent parts, and had it seems been cunningly drawn in, and bound to secrecy by Oath, when he little thought of any such Treason. The seventh of November the Earl of Northumberland, upon suspicion of being acquainted with the plot, was first commanded to his House, and after a while committed to the Tower. And thus was this great Plot discovered, and the Plotters punished; to the great rejoycing of all people: insomuch, that even the King of Spain's and Archdukes Embassadors made Bonfires, and threw money among the people in token of joy.

The Earl of Northumberland committed to the Tower; and why.

A Present from the King of Spain to King James.

Another from the Queen of Spain to the Queen of England.

The Lord Montague's reward for being a means of discovering the Treason.

The fifth of November kept holy in thankfulness for this deliverance.

A rumour spread, that that the King was slain at Oaking, but false; and the joy upon the hearing the truth.

And at this time, on the fourth of January, the Spanish Embassador delivered a Present to the King from the King his Master: namely, six Jennets of Andalusia, with Saddles very richly imbroydered, and Saddle-cloths of cloth of Tissue: One of which Jennets was Snow white, and had a mane which reached to the ground. But this was a Present sent before any knowledge had of the Powder-Treason: but as soon as this was known, there was presently another Present sent from the Queen of Spain to the Queen of England, of purpose to congratulate the Kings happy deliverance from the intended Powder-Treason; and the Present was brought by Don John de Mendosa, which was a Robe of Murrie Sattin, imbroydered all over with Amber leather; and upon the leather, in every seam and skirt twice imbroydered about with Gold; the forepart whereof was set with eight and forty tags three inches long of beaten Gold, hollow within, and filled with Amber-griese, also two large Chains of Amber-griese; Two Carkanets of Amber-griese, a Velvet Cap with gold Buttons, curiously enameled, and a Girdle suitable to the Buttons; all which were presented together in a large Vessel of Gold, in form of a Bason; so as it seems there was none rejoyced more for the overthrow of this Plot for the Catholick cause, than the Catholick King himself. And now King James, not to be unmindful to the Lord Montague, for being the means of discovering this Treason, he gave unto him in Fee Farm of Crown-land 2000 l. to him and his Heirs, and 500 l. a year besides during his life: and not to be unthankful to God for the deliverance, he caused the fifth of November, being the day of the discovery, to be kept holy, with Prayer and Thanksgiving to God, which was then solemnly performed, and hath been since, and is likely for ever to be continued.

But in the midst of this great joy, there was suddenly spread a rumour of great sorrow; for on Saturday the two and twentieth of March, news was brought to the Court for certain, that the King was slain at Oaking, twenty miles from London, stabbed with an invenomed knife, whereupon the Court gates were presently shut, and double guard set in all places about London, and all mens minds were infinitely distracted; but within two hours all these clouds were clean dispersed, and the Sun began to shine out again; and it was certainly known, that the King was safe, and in perfect health: for which a Proclamation was presently sent forth to signifie it to the people; and that afternoon the King came himself to Whitehall, where thousands of people ravished with joy, came flocking to see him; and so general was the rejoycing, that the Spanish Embassador gave Sir Lewis Lewknor, Master of the Ceremonies, a Chain of Gold of good value, for bringing him the news: Though afterward it was thought by some, that this rumour was but politickly devised to make the Parliament and people more tender of the Kings safety, and by making them more sensible what a treasure they had of his life, to make them more willing to part with their treasure for his living, as indeed this Parliament they did, giving more Subsidies than are usual.

The eight and twentieth of March following, Henry Garnet Provincial of the English Jesuites, was arraigned in Guild-hall, for concealing the foresaid treason, where he had Judgement to be hang'd, drawn and quartered, and accordingly on the third of May, was drawn from the Tower to the West end of Pauls Church, and there executed. At his death, he confessed his fault, asked forgiveness, and exhorted all Catholicks never to attempt any treason against the King or State, as a course which God would never prosper.

Henry Garnet a Jesuite executed; and why.

On Tuesday the twentieth of May, were enstalled at Windsor Knights of the Garter, Rob Cecil Earl of Salisbury, and Thomas Howard Viscount Byndon; both of them honourably attended, but the Earl of Salisbury beyond ordinary proportion.

There was yet a Bag end of the late Powder-Treason behind to be examined: whereupon two Barons of the Realm; namely, Henry L. Mordant, and Edward Lord Sturton, were brought from the Tower to the Star-chamber: and there, not charged indeed with any point of the treason, but only reflectingly, because they neglected to appear at the Parliament, according to the summons; for which neglect only, without any further charge, they were fined to pay to the King; the Lord Mordant ten thousand Marks, and the Lord Sturton six thousand, and to be prisoners during the Kings pleasure. But on the 27 of June, Henry Earl of Northumberland was likewise brought from the Tower to the Star-chamber, and more directly charged with circumstances concerning the Treason, specially in regard of Thomas Piercy, whom he had admitted to be one of the Kings Gentlemen Pensioners, without ministring unto him the Oath of Supremacy, knowing him to be a Recusant; for which, and some misprisions, he was fined to pay to the King thirty thousand pounds, to forfeit all his Offices, and to be kept prisoner during the Kings pleasure, as indeed he continued many years, and at last released, was yet confined.

Henry Lord Mordant, and Edw. Lord Sturton fined; and why.

Henry Earl of Northumberland fined; and why.

It was now the fourth year of King James his Reign, and was a time of Princely vilitation; for this Summer, the 17 of July, Christianus King of Denmark, Brother to the Queen, having been long expected, with eight ships came into the River of Francis Prince of Vandemont comes into England, with what he at train, and of his entertainment.

After the King of Denmark's departure, on the 23 of September arrived at London Francis Prince of Vandemont, third Son to the Duke of Lorraine, accompanied with seven Earls, ten Barons, forty Gentlemen of quality, and sixscore common persons; who all the five and twentieth of September went by Coach to the King at Hampton-Court, where fourteen dayes together they were feasted and royally entertained, and then returned.

An Insurrection in Northamptonshire and Warwickshire about inlosures, by Captain Pouch, and how suppressed.

But these Festivals were followed with a little disturbance; for in May, the year after, great Assemblies were gathered together in Northamptonshire, Warwickshire and Leicestershire, throwing down Inclosures at first, without any particular head: but at last rose up a base Fellow, called John Reynolds, whom they named Captain Pouch, because he had a great leather Pouch hanging by his side, who affirmed to the Company, that in that Pouch he had sufficient to defend them against all comers: but when he was afterward apprehended, and his Pouch searched, there was nothing found in it but a piece of green Cheese. Proclamation was made, commanding them to surcease their disorder: But this prevailed nothing, till the King sent Henry Earl of Huntington, Thomas Earl of Exeter, Edward Lord Zouch, and Sir Edward Cook Lord Chief Justice of England, to suppress them by force of Arms, and to punish the Levellers according to the nature of their offences; some by death, as for Treason; some by Fines; as for Routs; but Captain Pouch was made exemplar.

The King is made free of the Cloth-workers.

On Friday the twelfth of June, his Majesty attended with divers Lords, dined with the Lord Mayor Sir John Wals, who after dinner presented him with a purse full of Gold, and humbly besought his Majesty, that he would be pleased to be free of his Company the Cloth-workers: To which the King graciously condescended; and thereupon called to Sir William Stone Master of the Company, and said, Stone give me thy hand; and now I am a Cloth-worker. And in token of my special favour to this Fraternity, I do here give to this Company a brace of Bucks yearly for ever, against the time of the Election of the Master and Wardens: at which time also many Lords and Gentlemen were made Free of the Cloth-workers.

On Thursday the 16 of July, the King and Prince with many Lords dined at Merchant-Taylors Hall, where the Master and Wardens of that Society presented the King with a purse of Gold, giving him humble thanks for gracing their Fraternity with his Royal Presence; and therewithal shewed him a Roll, wherein were registred the names of 7 Kings, 1 Queen, 17 Princes and Dukes, 2 Duchesses, one Archbishop, one and thirty Earls, threescore and six Barons, seven Abbots, seven Priors, with a great number of Knights and Esquires, who had been free of that Company; which his Majesty graciously accepted, but told them, that he himself was already Free of another Company: but the Prince his Son should be free of theirs, and that he would see the Garland put on his head: whereupon the Master presented the Prince also with a purse of Gold, which he graciously accepted, and said, that not only himself would be free of the Merchant-Taylors, but the Lords also that were with him should do the like, all which was performed with great solemnity.

The Prince is made free of the Merchant-Taylors, and a list of great Personages that had been of that Company.

The fourth of July this year, Sir Thomas Knevet was called by Writ to the Parliament by the name of Baron of Estrick, the next day Sir Julius Caesar, Chancellor of the Exchequer, was sworn a Privy Counsellor; and the sixteenth of November following, Sir Jervis Clifton Kt. was called to the Parliament by Writ, by the name and title of Baron of Layton Brameswold, whose only Daughter and Heir, was soon after, married to Eysme Steward, Baron of Aubigny in France, sole Brother of the Duke of Lenox; whom he afterward succeeded in that Dignity.

Sir Thomas Knevet and Jervis Clifton made Barons by calling them to the Parliament.

About this time, Hugh Earl of Tir-Oen, most ungrateful and utterly forgetful of the Kings great clemency to him, together with Terconell, Hugh Baron of Dungannon, and divers other Irish Lords fled into the parts beyond Sea, with purpose to sollicite foreign Princes against the King, and to offer the Kingdom of Ireland to the Pope, which was presently signified to the Realm by Proclamation.

The Earl of Tir-Oen flies beyond Sea, to sollicite Princes against the King.

On the eleventh of April this year, George Jervis a Seminary Priest, and the three and twentieth of June following, Thomas Garnet a Jesuite, were both executed at Tyburn; Tho. Garnet having the favour offered him to be pardoned, if he would but take the Oath of Allegiance, which he refused.

George Jervis a Seminary Priest, and Thomas Garnet a Jesuite executed; and why.

The 19 of April at Whitehall, died Thomas Earl of Dorset Lord Treasurer, (whose death because he died suddenly as he sate at the Council Table) was by some untowardly interpreted; but being dead, and his head opened, there were found in it certain little bags of water, which whether by the straining of his study the night before, in which he sate up till eleven a clock, or otherwise by their own maturity, suddenly breaking and falling upon his brain, caused his sudden death. So certain it is, that death comes not alwayes by determinate steps, but sometimes per saltum, and we all carry about us the causes of sudden death, though unsensible of them till we be unsensible. This Lord was of excellent parts, and in his place exceeding industrious, and I have heard many Checker-men say, there never was a better Treasurer, both for the Kings profit, and the good of the Subject.

The twentieth of May at Windsor, were made two Knights of the Garter; George Earl of Dunbar, and Philip Earl of Montgomery; but the Earl of Dunbar, within a year or two after left both his honour and his life; but not his life without honour, having been a faithful Servant, and a wise Counsellor to the King, and was honourably interred in the Church at Westminster.

Divers English Pirates turn Turks.

About this time were many famous English Pirates that stuck not for to turn Turks, and lived in great state at Tunis, of whom the chief were Ward, Bishop, Sir Francis Verney and Glanville, whom after many depredations and outrageous acts at Sea, partly the King of Spain suppressed, and partly the King of England, and nineteen of their associates being taken, were hanged at Wapping.

The New Exchange in the Strand builded.

Also at this time, in the Strand on the North side of Durham-house, where stood an old long stable: Robert Earl of Salisbury now Lord Treasurer of England, caused to be erected a stately building; which upon Tuesday the tenth of April, in the year 1609, was begun to be richly furnished with Wares; and the next day after, the King, the Queen, and Prince, with many great Lords and Ladies came to see it: and then the King gave it the name of Britains Bourse.

Fishing upon the English Coast forbidden to strangers.

On the eighth of May this year, the King by Proclamation prohibited all forain Nations, that after August they should not fish upon any of the Coasts of England, Scotland, or Ireland, nor the Isles adjacent, without the special licence from the Commissioners in that behalf ordained.

Allum first made in England, and by whom.

At this time the making of Allum, which heretofore with great charges had been fetched from forain parts, was by divers that laboured in it; and now lastly by Sir John Bourchier brought to perfection in England, and thereupon the King prohibited upon pain of confiscation, any Allum to be brought from beyond the Seas, and took the whole traffique thereof to himself.

The King hath aid of his Subjects for making Prince Henry Knight.

And now the King according to an ancient custom, had aid of his Subjects through England, for making his eldest Son Prince Henry Knight, which yet was levied with great moderation, and the Prince to shew himself worthy of it, performed his first Feats of Arms at Barriers, with wonderful skill and courage: being not yet full sixteen years of age.

1610. An. Reg. 8.

The Prince is created Prince of Wales, and the solemn manner of his creating.

It was now the eighth year of King James his Reign, being the year 1610, when Prince Henry being come to the age of seventeen years, it was thought fit he should be initiated into Royalty: and thereupon the thirtieth of May this year, he was created Prince of Wales in most solemn manner: which was thus, Garter King at Arms, bore the Letters Patents, the Earl of Suffolk the Robes of Purple-Velvet, the Earl of Huntington the Train, the Earl of Cumberland the Sword, the Earl of Rutland the Ring, the Earl of Darby the Rod, the Earl of Shrewsbury the Cap and Coronet, the Earls of Nottingham and Northampton supported the Prince, being in his Surcoat only and bare-headed: and in this manner being conducted to the King, attended on by the Knights of the Bath, five and twenty in number, all great men, and great mens sons, the Earl of Salisbury principal Secretary, read the Letters Patents; the Prince kneeling all the while before the King: and at the words accustomed, the King put on him the Robe, the Sword, the Cap and the Coronet, the Rod and the Ring, and then kissed him on the cheek, and so the solemnity ended.

After this, it was thought fit, he should keep his Court by himself: and thereupon Sir Thomas Chaloner, a learned Gentleman, who had before been his Governour, was now made his Lord Chamberlain, Sir Edward Philips his Chancellor, and all other Officers assigned him, belonging to a Princes Court: wherein he shewed himself so early ripe for Majesty, that he seemed to be a King, while he was yet but Prince: and all mens eyes began to fix upon him.

He keeps Court by himself, and who were his great Officers.

King James had long since shut up the Gates of Janus, and was in peace with all Princes abroad; his only care now was to keep peace at home; and to this end, the three first dayes of June, in his own Person he heard the differences between the Ecclesiastical and the Temporal Judges argued, touching the Protections out of the Kings Bench and Common Pleas; to this end, the eighth, ninth, and tenth of June, he heard the manifold complaints of the abuses of the Victuallers, and other Officers of his Navy Royal; to this end, the fourth of June, 1610, he once again by Proclamation, commanded all Roman Priests, Seminaries and Jesuites, as being the chief Incendiaries of troubles, to depart this Kingdom by the fifth of July next, and not to return upon pain of severity of the Law: as also all Recusants, to return home to their dwellings, and not to remain in London, nor to come within ten miles of the Court, without special Licence.

Seminaries and Jesuites commanded to avoid the Realm; and w<sup>h</sup>o

After which Proclamation, the Oath of Allegiance was presently ministered to all sorts of people, and their names certified to the Lords of the Council, that refused to take it; and this he the rather did out of consideration of the bloody fact, committed lately by one Ravillack, upon the person of the renowned K. of France, Henry the fourth: and whereas Queen Elizabeth in her 43 year, had granted her Letters Patents to continue for 15 years to the East-India Merchants; now upon their humble Petition, the King was pleased to enlarge their Patents, giving them a Charter to continue for ever, enabling them thereby to be a body Corporate and Politick, which so encouraged the Merchants, that they built a Ship of twelve hundred tun, the greatest that was ever made in this Kingdom by Merchants; which the King and Prince honoured with going to Deptford to see it, and then named it, The Trades increase: and at this time gave to Sir Thomas Smith (Governor of that Company) a fair chain of Gold, with a Jewel, wherein was his Picture. But this great Ship having been in the Red Sea, and returning to Bantham, was there lost, and most of her men cast away. But then the King himself builded the goodliest Ship of War that was ever built in England, being of the burthen of 1400 Tun, and carrying threescore and four pieces of great Ordnance, which he gave to his Son Prince Henry, who named it after his own dignity, The Prince.

The East-India Company made a Corporation with large Priviledges. They build a ship of twelve hundred Tun, called The Trades increase, which was cast away in the Red-Sea.

Thereupon the King builds a ship of 1400 tun, called The Prince, and gives it to the Prince.

And now whereas a Parliament had been holden this year, and was prorogued to a certain day; the King perhaps not finding it to comply with his designs, or for some other cause known to himself, on the last day of December, under the great Seal of England dissolved it.

The King dissolves a Parliament under the Great Seal of England.

Before

Sir Robert Carre comes into the Kings favour, and of the many honours heaped suddenly upon him.

Before this time one Sir Robert Carre, a Gentleman of Scotland, or of the Borders, at a time of Tilting before the King, chanced with a fall off his Horse to break his Leg; upon which mischance, he was forced for some dayes to keep his bed, in which time the King was some time pleased to come and visit him: and then it was first perceived, that the King had begun to cast an eye of favour upon him: and indeed from that time forward (as he was a very fine Gentleman, and very wise) many great favours were heaped upon him: So as on Easter Munday, in the year 1611, he was created Viscount Rochester. On the two and twentieth of April, 1612. was sworn a Privy-Counsellor. On the fourth of November, 1613. was created Earl of Somerset, and the tenth of July following made Lord Chamberlain.

But this Sun-shine of Fortune lasted not long; yet not by any inconstancy in the King, but by the Earls own undeserving, which thus fell out: The Right Honourable Robert Earl of Essex had before this time married the beautiful Lady Frances Howard, Daughter of Thomas Earl of Suffolk, who upon causes judicially heard, were afterward Divorced, and left free to marry any other. After which Divorce, this great Favourite (the Earl of Somerset) takes her for wife; the King gracing their Marriage with all demonstrations of Love and Favour; and the Lords gracing it with a stately Masque that night; and a few dayes after, the Bride and Bridegroom, accompanied with most of the Nobility of the Kingdom, were Feasted at Merchant-Taylors Hall by the Lord Mayor and Aldermen. But see how soon this fair weather was overcast: For it happened, that one Sir Thomas Overbury, a very ingenuous Gentleman, and the Earls special Friend, who had written a witty Treatise of a Wife: and it seems not thinking the Lady in all points answerable to his description, had been an earnest dissuader of the Match, and to strengthen his dissuasion, laid perhaps some unjust imputation upon the Ladies Fame, which so incensed them both against him, that a less revenge could not give them satisfaction, than to take away his life: So true is that saying,

Improbe amor, quid non mortalia pectora cogis?

Sir Thomas
Overbury
Poisoned.

Sir Jervis Trelvis Lieutenant of the Tower executed.
The Earl of Somerset and his Lady condemned, but their lives spared.

Upon this, they find Pretences to have the said Sir Thomas committed to the Tower, and there by their Instruments effect their Revenge: some say by a poisoned Tansey sent him to eat, some by a poisoned Glyster ministred unto him, but howsoever effected it was; for which fact Sir Jervis Trelvis then Lieutenant of the Tower, and three or four other of inferior condition were put to death, the Lady and Earl themselves were arraigned and condemned: but through the Kings great clemency had their lives spared, but in such sort, as was to them no less grievous than death it self, being never after suffered to see the Kings face, nor to come near his Court.

This Favourite being thus out of Favour, there was place made for entertaining another; for indeed King James was of so sociable and loving a nature, that he could not be long without an Alter idem; a bosome Friend with whom to communicate his Internos sensus, and upon whose shoulders he might sometimes lay a burthen, which he was not willing to bear himself; and this new Friend was Mr. George Villiers, a Gentleman of a good House, but a younger Brother, but of so delicate a composition of body, and withal of so excellent parts of mind, as if nature had framed him on purpose to be a Kings Favourite. And indeed never any man was partaker of the Royal influence like to him, made first a Knight and Gentleman of the Kings Bed-chamber, soon after made a Viscount and Master of the Horse; a while after created Earl of Buckingham, then Marquess of Buckingham, and made Lord Admiral: Lastly, made Duke of Buckingham, the greatest Title of Honour that a Subject is capable of, and yet this Title not greater than his Power: for all matters of Grace passed from the King by him, and to grace him the more, his Mother (who after his Fathers death, had married a younger Son of the Lord Comptons) was created Countess of Buckingham, his Sister who had married a Gentleman of no extraordinary Family, had her Husband made Earl of Denbigh, his two brothers were made, one of them Viscount Purbeck, the other Earl of Anglesey; besides many other of his Friends and Kindred highly advanced; For this Lord affected not an advancement that should be only personal, but rather be in common to all his Family; and was not of the disposition of some, who like to great Oaks, love to keep all that are near them underwood; though it be in truth both against Nature and Policy to stand alone, when they would be less subject to the violence of Winds, if more stood together. And though never any man had juster cause to be envied than he, yet never any man was less envied; because though his Honours made him great, yet they made him not swell, but he retained the like temper of affable carriage after his advancement, as he had done before.

But before all these Favours were heaped upon him, many other great passages had intervened; for first, after the death of Thomas Earl of Dorset, Robert Earl of Salisbury had been Lord Treasurer, and after him Thomas Earl of Suffolk. But this Lord, though of a most noble disposition, yet as having had his training up another way, seemed less ready in discharging the place, and whether for this, or for his Ladies taking too much upon her by his indulgence; the Staff was soon after taken from him; after whom there came in such a sequence of Treasurers as no Age before had ever seen; all wise and able men indeed; but yet in whom the Office seemed an employment, rather to ennoble the Officer than to enrich the King. For first Sir Henry Mountague was taken from the Kings Bench: and on the fourth of December, 1620. made Lord Treasurer, and presently upon it Earl of Manchester, and before the year went about put off. After whom Sir Lyonel Cranfield, from Master of the Wards was made Lord Treasurer, and shortly after Earl of Middlesex: and then not only put off, but fined to pay the King fifty thousand pounds: After him, Sir James Lee from chief Justice of the Kings Bench was made Lord Treasurer, and soon after Earl of Marleborough; and then having made a good return of his Place put it off himself. After him Sir Richard Weston, from Chancellor of the Exchequer was made Lord Treasurer, and soon soon after Earl of Portland: so as within the compass of little more than four years, four Treasurers in a row were made four Earls; enough to make a prescription for all Treasurers hereafter, to claim a right of being made Earls, which yet I speak not as derogating from those worthy men, whose memories I reverence, but as observing, Fataque fortunasque Virum; so rare as that there was never any Precedent of the like.

Also the five and twentieth of June, 1612. the Lord Sanquer, a Nobleman of Scotland, having in a private revenge suborned Robert Carlile to murder John Turner a Master of Fence, thought by his greatness to have born it out; but the King respecting nothing so much as Justice, would not suffer Nobility to be a shelter for villainy, but according to the Law, on the nine and twentieth of June, the said Lord Sanquer having been arraigned and condemned by the name of Robert Creighton, Esquire, was before Westminster-Hall Gate executed, where he dyed very penitent.

A Lottery

of Virginia.

About this time, the King in special favour for the present Plantation of English Colonies in Virginia granted a Lottery to be held at the West end of Pauls; whereof one Thomas Sharplys a Taylor of London had the chief Prize, which was four thousand Crowns in fair Plate.

At this time also the Corps of Mary, late Queen of Scotland, the Kings Mother, was translated from Peterborough, to St. Peters Church in Westminster, and from thence was carried to the Chappel-Royal there; where it was interred in a Royal Tomb, which the King had erected for her.

About this time also Sir Robert Sherley, third Son of Sir Thomas Sherley of Suffex Knight, who sixteen years past had betaken himself to travel, and had served divers Christian Princes for the space of five years; but chiefly Rodolbus the Roman Emperour; who for his Service, made him an Earl of the Empire: he afterward went into Persia, and served the Persian ten years, who made him General of the Artillery; and held him in so great account, that he gave him the Lady Teresa in Marriage, whose Sister was one of the Queens of Persia, after which the Persian employed him to sundry Princes of Europe; and sent him in special Embassage into England to King James, to whom he delivered his Letters, and shewed his Commission; all which signified the Persians great love and affection to his Majesty: with frank offer of free Commerce to all his Highness Subjects through all the Persians Dominions: After a years stay here, in which time his Lady lay in of a Son, to whom the Queen was God-mother, and Prince Henry God-father; he left the child here in England, and then with his Lady departed into Persia.

Ar. Reg. to Frederick Prince Palatine
of the Rhine comes into England

It was now the year 1612, and the tenth of King James his Reign, when the Illustrious Prince Frederick Count Palatine of the Rhine, with whom a Treaty of marriage had been before with the Lady Elizabeth, on the sixteenth of October arrived at Gravesend; to whom the Duke of Lenox and divers other Lords were sent by the King, who conducted him to White-hall, and from thence into the great Banqueting-house, where the King, the Queen, Prince Henry, and the Lady Elizabeth entertained him in all kind manner, and after by Barge conducted him to Essex House, appointed for his lodging. It was many years since any Kings Daughter had been married in England; which now happening; and to so Illustrious a Prince, was just cause of Triumph and rejoicing; but see the misery of Humane Affairs; joy can no sooner be setting forth, but sorrow will be sure to follow her at the heels, as now indeed it happened: for on the nine and twentieth of October, the Prince Palatine, with all the great Lords of the Kingdom, in most jovial manner dining at Guild-hall; Prince Henry who was also invited and expected, could not come being newly fallen exceeding sick of a popular malignant fever, which reign'd that year in most parts of this Land: whereof on the sixth of November, between seven and eight a Clock at night, at his Court of St. James's he died: But he being infinitely beloved of the people; and one that had given great hope of proving an Heroick Prince, it caused suspicion in many mens heads; that death was not without violence offered to Nature; some said, by bunches of Grapes given him to eat: some by Gloves of a poysoned perfume, given him for a Present: but these were but idle rumours and conceits: It seems the Divine Providence had ordained it should be said of him; Hunc tantum terris ostendent Fata, nec ultra esse sinent: whose death would have given a great blow to the happiness of this Kingdom, if there had not been another Prince left, of a milder Spirit perhaps, but so accomplished with all excellent endowments, that there could be no great want of Prince Henry, as long as there was left Prince Charles. The Corps of Prince Henry, who dyed at the age of eighteen years; eight months, and seventeen days, was drawn in a Chariot to the Abbey Church at Westminster, and there interred in the Chapel-Royal, on the seventh of December following.

falls sick, and dies.

This Accident something appalled the general joy, but yet Triumphs went on. Upon Saint Thomas day, the Palsgrave and Grave Maurice were elected Knights of the Garter; and the seven and twentieth of December, the Palsgrave was betrothed to the Lady Elizabeth. On Sunday the seventh of February, the Palsgrave in person was enstalled Knight of the Garter at Windfor, and at the same time was Grave Maurice enstalled by his Deputy, Count Lodowick of Nassaw. On the fourteenth of February, being Shrove-Sunday, and Saint Valentines day, this happy marriage of the Palsgrave with the Lady Elizabeth was solemnized in the Chappel at White-hall: The Bride was led to Church by two Batchelors, her Brother Prince Charles, and the Earl of Northampton Lord Privy Seal: she was attired all in white, having a rich Crown of Gold upon her head, her hair hanging down at length, curiously beset with Pearls and precious Stones, her Train supported by twelve young Ladies in white Garments: The King gave her in marriage, the Archbishop of Caterbury married them, the Bishop of Bathe and Wells preached the Bridal Sermon: which ended, the Bride was led home by two married men, the Duke of Lenox, and the Earl of Nottingham Lord Admiral. This marriage was solemnized the first night with a stately Masque of Lords and Ladies: the second night with a magnificent Masque of the Gentlemen

Gentlemen of the Middle-Temple, and Lincolns-Inne: The third night with a sumptuous Masque of the Gentlemen of the Inner-Temple, and Graves-Inn, provided indeed then, but was not performed till Saturday night following, by reason the concourse of people was so great, it would have hindred the Show. After this, the Lord Major and Aldermen gave the Bride a Chain of Oriental Pearl, valued at two thousand pounds: now when all things had been done for honouring their Marriage, which either love and observance could devise, or art and magnificence could perform, on the tenth of April the Bridegroom with his Bride took leave of the King and the Queen at Rochester, (who had by Barge conducted them thither) and there taking Ship on the nine and twentieth of April they arrived at Flushing; from whence the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Arundel, the Viscount Lisle, and the Lord Harington waited upon them to their chief City of Heydelburg, in all places as they passed being received with all state and magnificence: but then on the fourteenth of June, the English Lords returning home, the Lord Harington died by the way at Wormes, whose Corps was brought over, and buried in England. And here it will not be amiss, to shew of what extent and largeness the Palsgrave's Country is, because of the iniquity of some that seek to disgrace it. It is in length about two hundred English miles, taking the lower and upper Country. In the lower he hath six and twenty walled Towns, besides an infinite number of fair Villages, and two and twenty Houses of residence. In the upper, not so many walled Towns, and Houses, but those that are, generally fairer than in the lower, especially Amberg and New-market.

But it is now time to look home; in the year 1609, the King having care for the quietness of Ireland, had granted to the City of London the present possession and Plantation in the Province of Ulster: whereupon, afterward in the year 1612, they sent thither about three hundred persons, of all sorts of handy-crafts men, chiefly to inhabit the two Cities of London-Derry and Colerain: where they ordained Alderman Cockain for the first Governour. And for their advancing of this, or the like Plantation in Ireland, King James about this time began a new Order of Knights, which are called Baronets, because they take place next to Barons younger Sons; and he appointed certain Laws, to make them capable that should be admitted. First, that they should maintain the number of thirty foot Souldiers in Ireland for three years, after the rate of eight pence a day, and to pay the wages of one whole year, upon the passing of their Patent: Then that they should be Gentlemen of Blood of three Descents; and lastly, should have land of Inheritance, in possession or immediate Reversion, to the value of a thousand pounds per annum: And to keep the Order from swarming, he stinted it within the number of only 200, and as the issue should fail the Order to cease. But he that will look how well the end of the Institution, and the Laws of it have been observed, shall perhaps find it to be here, as it was in the order of St. Michael in France, into which at first there were none admitted, but Princes and eminent Persons: but afterwards, all sorts of men, without any difference, were admitted, that it came almost to be doubted, whether the dignity of the Order did more grace the persons, or the meanness of the persons disgrace the Order: and indeed, when the Laws of an Institution are not in some measure observed, it seems to make a kind of nullity in the collation.

About this time, on Sunday the 24th of October, an exemplar penance was imposed upon Sir Pecksall Brockas Knight, which was to stand at Pauls Crosse in a white sheet, holding a stick in his hand, having been formerly convicted before the high Commissioners, for many notorious Adulteries with divers Women.

This year 1614, in the month of July, Christianus King of Denmark, (out of his love to his Sister and King James) came the second time into England; but as being now secure of himself, privately, and with a small company, so as he came to the Queen at Somerset House unexpected, and before any knowledge was had of his coming; but King James being then in Progress in Bedfordshire, and hearing of it, came presently back; and after he had entertained him here with Hunting, Hawking, running at Ring, Bear-baiting, Plays, Fire-works, and Fencing, on the first of August Prince Charles brought him aboard his Ship, who then took his leave, and returned home.

In October, this year, was a call of Serjeants at Law, being 11 in number, namely, George Wilde, William Towes, Richard Bawtry, Henry Finch, Thomas Chamberlain, Francis Moore, Thomas Atton, John Moore, Francis Harvey, Charles Chiburn, and Thomas Richardson; and in Trinity Term before there had been two other called, namely, Sir Randall Crew of Lincolns-Inn, and Sir Robert Hitchin of Graves-Inn, Knights.

About this time an Ambassador came from the young Emperor of Russia to King James, desiring his continual love and amity, and to be a means of making atonement between him and the King of Swedeland, and withall presented him with a rich Present of Furs: which was no small honour to the King of great Britain to have so great a Potentate as the Emperour of Russia solicit him to be his mediator.

Though King James out of a natural goodness was addicted to peace, yet out of providence he neglected not to be prepared for War, and thereupon in the year 1610, had granted privileges to a Society called of the Military Garden; and this year 1614, caused a Muster of Men to be presented before him; which was performed to his great liking, and to the great commendation of the City.

About this time a memorable Act was performed by Mr. Hugh Middleton, Citizen and Goldsmith of London, and born in Denbighshire, who having an Act of Parliament for his Warrant, with infinite cost and indefatigable labour, brought Water to the City of London, from the two great Springs of Chadwell and Amwell in Hertfordshire; having cut a Channel from thence to a place near Islington, whither he conveyed it to a large Pond, and from thence in Pipes of young Elms to all places of the City; for as the Poet saith:

Another memorable act was about this time, done on the North side of London, called Moorfields, which being before environed with deep stinking Ditches and noysome common Shoars, was now, not only made fair and sweet, but so levelled into Walks and set with Trees, that it is the pleasantest place in all the City.

The next year being 1615, another memorable act for the benefit and beauty of the City of London, was performed; for Smithfield which was before a rude dirty place, was now paved all over, and strong rails sequestering the middle part of it, were set up to make it a fair walking place, and fit for Market or any other use.

This year also in July were enstalled Knights of the Garter, Francis Earl of Rutland, Sir George Villers Master of the Horse, and Sir Robert Sidney Viscount Lisle; and in another kind of Honour the Earl of Arundel, the Lord Carews and Doctor Andrews Bishop of Ely, were sworn Privy Counsellours.

Prince of Wales.

Wales by the death of Prince Henry, had been a good while without a Prince, and now to supply that place Prince Charles is created Prince of Wales; In joy whereof, the Town of Ludlow in Shropshire, and City of London, performed great Triumphs: and the more to honour his Creation, there were made five and twenty Knights of the Bath; all of them Lords or Barons sons: and yet more to honour it, there were forty selected Gentlemen of the Inns of Court, that performed solemn Justs at Barriers, with great magnificence.

Sir Edward Coke, the Lord Egerton, and Sir Henry Yelverton, put from their places.

This year was a Censure of divers great Delinquents; for first Sir Edward Coke was upon displeasure discharged from being Lord Chief Justice of the Kings Bench; and two days after his discharge, Sir Henry Montague the Kings Serjeant at Law, was placed in his room: Next to him the Lord Egerton, whether disabled by sickness or age, to exercise the place, or upon displeasure also, had the Seal taken from him, which was delivered to Sir Francis Bacon the Kings Attorney; he made first Lord Keeper; and the Lord Egerton, dying soon after, Lord Chancellor: Not long after him Sir Henry Yelverton the Kings Attorney, for adding new Priviledges to the Londoners Charter, without the Kings privy, was in displeasure put from his place; and in his room was placed Sir Thomas Coventry, the Solicitor. But a while after, Sir Henry Yelverton, was made a puisny Judge of the Common-Pleas; having indeed the reputation of an excellent Lawyer.

And yet this work of Censuring stayed not here; for much about this time Thomas Earl of Suffolk Lord Treasurer of England, had the staff of his Office taken from him; which was soon after delivered to Sir Henry Montague, Lord Chief Justice of the Kings Bench. If Sir John Bennet, Judge of the Prerogative Court, had made a little more haste, he might have made one in this number of Delinquents: but he came short three or four years; and then being charged by his own servant with bribery, he was put from his place, and censured in the Star-Chamber to pay twenty thousand pounds: and in his room was placed William Byrde a man of more integrity.

Sir John
Bennet, Judg of the Prerogative Court put from his place; and why.

Though King James upon the death of Queen Elizabeth, came to reside in England, yet he forgot not that Scotland was his native Country; and therefore after he had spent some years in England, to acquaint himself with the State of the Kingdom, in March this year one thousand six hundred and sixteenth, he made a Journey into Scotland: for though he had left very able men to sit at the Helm there in his absence, yet he knew that it is the Masters Eye that makes the Horse fat: so it is the Princes presence sometimes that keeps out many distempers in a State, that would otherwise creep in; and now, when in his staying six Months there, he had seen all things well seled both in the Ecclesiastical State, and in the Temporal, and made it appear that he resided not in England out of any neglect of Scotland; but to the end he might be in the place of most conveniency to both Kingdoms: on the fifteenth of September he returned to London, not more to the grief of the Scots to leave him, than to the joy of the English to receive him; so much was King James as a just and wise Prince, beloved of both the Nations.

The 15th of February 1617, in the Fifteenth year of this King, Francis Ashley of the Middle Temple London Esquire, where he had been Reader the year before, was by a Writ called to be Serjeant at Law, eo tempore solus Serviens ad legem electus, and the fifth of July following was Knighted, and about that time was Steward of the Marthalsey of the Kings house, and by King Charles, the fifth of May, in the first year of his Reign, was by Letters Patents made one of the Kings Serjeants at Law, and so continued unto his death, which happened by the will of God the 28th of November, 1635, at Serjeants-Inne in Fleetstreet, and was Recorder of Dorchester in Dorsetshire, where together with his Lady in the great Church he lies Involted: leaving Dorothy his only Daughter and Heir (by the Lady Anne his wife, the eldest Daughter and Coheir of Bar-nard Samways of Wynterborne St. Martyn in the County of Dorset Esquire) married unto the Honourable Denzell Holles Esquire, whose only issue is Francis Holles of Wynterborn St. Martyn aforesaid Esquire.

Now comes to be related a matter of special observation; Sir Walter Raleigh had lived a condemned man many years in the Tower, and now his Destiny brought him to his end by liberty, which it could not do by imprisonment; for out of a longing for liberty, he propounded a project to the King, upon which (as he was a well spoken man, and of a great capacity) he set such colours of probability; especially gilding it over with the Gold he would fetch from a Mine in Guyana; and that without any wrong at all to the King of

Spain

He sacks and pillageth the Town of St. Thome.

This fact Gundamore aggravateth against him.

For which he is beheaded.

The King makes a Progress to Cambridge; where he stays three days.

An. Reg.
17 Queen
Anne dies.

Spain (if he might be allowed to go the Journey) that the King, if he gave not credit that he could perform it, at least gave way that he should undertake it: and thereupon with divers Ships, accompanied with many Knights and Gentlemen of Quality, he set forward on the Voyage; but when after long search or shew of search, no such place of Treasure, or no such Treasure could be found, whether it were, that he thought it a shame to return home with doing nothing: or that his malus Genius thrust him upon the Design, he fell upon Saint Thome, a Town belonging to the King of Spain; sacked it, pillaged it, and burnt it: and here was the first part of his Tragical Voyage acted, in the death of his eldest Son: the last part was acted in his own death at his return: For Gundamore the Spanish Lier, did so aggravate this fact of his to the King, against him, that it seemed nothing would give satisfaction but Raleigh's head, without which he doubted there would follow a breach of the League between the two Nations. Raleigh excused it, by saying that he was urged to it by the Spaniards first assaulting of him; and besides, that he could not come at the Myne, without winning this Town: but Gundamore was too strong an Adversary for him; and the King preferring the publique Peace, before the life of one man, already condemned, gave way to have the Sentence of his former Condemnation executed upon him; and thereupon, brought to the Kings-Bench Bar, he was not newly Arraigned or Indicted, as being already Mortuus in Lege, but only hath the former sentence averred against him, and so carried to the Gatehouse, and from thence the next morning to the Parliament Yard: a Scaffold was there erected, upon which after fourteen years reprimand, his head was cut off: at which time, such abundance of blood issued from his veins, that shewed he had stock of Nature enough left to have continued him many years in life, though now above threescore years old, if it had not been taken away by the hands of Violence.

And this was the end of the great Sir Walter Raleigh: great sometimes in the favour of Queen Elizabeth, and next to Drake the great scourge and hate of the Spaniard, who had many things to be commended in his life; but none more, than his constancy in his death, which he took with so undaunted a resolution, that one might perceive he had a certain expectation of a better life after it: so far he was from holding those Atheistical opinions; an aspersion whereof some traducing persons had cast upon him.

About this time King James made a progress to the University of Cambridge, where delighted with the Disputations and other Scholastical exercises, he stayed three whole days, and could have been content to have stayed as many years: for next being a King, he was made to be a Scholar.

In the year 1619, being the seventeenth year of King James his reign, that knot of love which above twenty years had been tyed, between him and his Queen, was by death dissolved; for on Tuesday this year the second of March, Queen Anne died at Hampton Court, whose Corps was brought to Denmark house, and from thence conveyed to Westminster: where in the Royal Chapel with great solemnity it was interred: a Princess very memorable for her virtue, and not a little for her Fortune, who besides being a Queen, was so happy as to be Mother of such admired Children, as she brought into the World. But the dissolving of this knot cast the King into an extream sickness; and after some recovery, into a Relapse: from which notwithstanding, it pleased God to deliver him, as having yet some great work to do.

This year on Munday the third of May, one Mr. Williams a Barrester of the Middle Temple, was arraigned at the Kings Bench, for libelling, and for writing Books against the King: and upon Wednesday following was hanged and quartered at Charing-Cross.

But an action of another nature was performed this year, the seventeenth of July, not unworthy the relating, which was this: that one Bernard Calvert of Andover, rode from St. Georges Church in Southwark to Dover, from thence passed by Barge to Calice in France, and from thence returned back to Saint Georges Church the same day, setting out about three a clock in the morning, and returned about eight a clock in the Evening, fresh and lusty.

In the year 1621, a Parliament was holden at Westminster; wherein two great examples of Justice were shewed; which for future terror are not unfit to be here related: One upon Sir Gyles Montpeyson, a Gentleman otherwise of good parts; but for practising sundry abuses in erecting and setting up new Inns and Alehouses, and exacting great sums of money of people, by pretence of Letters Patents granted to him for that purpose, was sentenced to be degraded, and disabled to bear any office in the Common-wealth, though he avoided the execution by flying the land; but upon Sir Francis Michell, a Justice of Peace of Middlesex, and one of the chief Agents, the sentence of Degradation was executed, and he made to ride with his face to the Horse rail through the City of London. The other example was of Sir Francis Bacon, Viscount St. Albans, Lord Chancellor of England, who for bribery was put from his place, and committed to the Tower: but after some few days enlarged, in whose place, Doctor Williams Dean of Westminster was made Lord Keeper.

The Count Palatine being now strengthened with the alliance of the King of Great Britain, was thought a fit man to be King of Bohemia, and accordingly was elected by the States of that Kingdom; but he was no sooner invested in the Crown, but the Emperor with great Forces assaulted him in Prague, and not only drove him with his wife and children from thence; but took from him also his own Patrimony the Palatinate, so as though now a King, he was fain to fly to the States of the Low-Countries for a place of residence. King James though he had never given his consent to the Palsgraves taking upon him that Kingdom, as fore-seeing in his great judgment what the event would be; yet in this distress he could not forbear to take care of his Daughter; and thereupon sent Sir Richard Weston, the same that was after Lord Treasurer, in Embassy to the Emperor, to sollicite the restoring of the Palatinate to the Palsgrave; but he returning without success, the K. had then conference with Count Gundamore Bernard Calvert, his speedy Journey from Southwark to Calice, and back again in one day.

Sir Gyles Montpeyson is sentenced to be degraded; and why.

Sir Francis Michell is degraded, and in what manner.

Sir Francis Bacon Lord Chancellor put from his Place for Bribery.

The Palsgrave is chosen King of Bohemia, but is soon driven out, and his Palatinate seized on.

The King hath Conference with Gundomar how the Palatinate might be restored. Gundomar advise by making a marriage between the Prince of Wales and the Infanta of Spain.

Gundomar the King of Spain's Leiger in England, what course might be taken to procure the restoring it: who made him answer, There could be no better course than to make a marriage between his son the Prince of Wales, and the Infanta of Spain, which he said would easily be effected, if the Prince might have leave to make a Journey into Spain. King James though he considered the inveterate grudges between Spain and England, and how dangerous it might be to put the Heir of the Kingdom into the Spaniards hands, yet grounding himself upon a saying, Fidelem si pu:averis, facies: and drawn on by the insinuating speeches of Count Gundomar, not perhaps without some inclination in the Marquess of Buckingham, was contented at last the Prince should go. And so Prince Charles sending his Ships about, and taking along with him only the Marquess of Buckingham (who in the time of his being in Spain was created Duke of Buckingham) Endymion Porter, and Mr. Francis Cottington; (two that were well acquainted with the language and affairs of Spain) he took his journey by the way of France, went to Paris, and secretly in disguise to the Court there, where he had the sight of that Lady, that might well have stayed him from going further, but yet on he went.

Hereupon the Prince is sent into Spain, and how accompanied.

Gundomar gets much money of Ladies, by persuading them of the certainty of the Match.

The Prince entertained in Spain.

What hindered the proceeding of the Match.

In the mean time Gundomar a cunning man, and one that besides his Master's had ends of his own, and could play his game no less for his own profit than his Master's Honour, as he had perswaded the King of the facility of the Match with Spain, so he perswaded a certainty of it, especially among Catholick Ladies, by which means he brought no small store of Grist to his own Mill, receiving from one Lady three hundred pounds to be made Groom of the Stool, when the Spanish Princess should come; of another a good round sum to be Mother of the Maids, and of divers other the like for other places.

But the Prince being arrived in Spain, was received indeed with all the demonstrations of love and kindness that could be devised, so as the charge of his entertainment was said to stand the King of Spain in nine and forty thousand Duckets: but yet his acquaintance with the Lady was much restrained; for in all the time of his staying in Spain, (which was no less than eight Months, being from February to October) he saw her but very seldom, and that at good distances, never spake with her but twice, and that before company, besides that his speeches were limited, how much and what he should say, far from any means of tying the Knot between them which was pretended. What the cause should be was much in obscurity; some thought that a difference between the Duke of Buckingham, and the Count Olivares, the King of Spain's great Favorite, was a great hinderance of the proceeding: but others, and more likely, that the Spaniard indeed never really intended the Match at all, but had drawn the Prince into Spain for other ends: but what those ends were, was no less uncertain; one thought it was done to hold the Prince in a Treaty of marriage with a Daughter of Spain, till the Daughter of France should be bestowed, thereby to keep him from that Alliance: but others and more likely, that the King of Spain entertained this Treaty with the King of Great Britain, meaning to spin it out till he had com-passed some designs in the Low-Countries, and the Palatinate, at least to make King James less vigilant for those parts.

But when much time had been spent in protracting, upon pretence of difficulties in obtaining the Popes dispensation, King James partly wearied with delay, but chiefly angry with delusion, sent to the Prince, with all speed to return into England, which the Prince presently signified to the King of Spain, and had his leave to depart; but upon promise to continue the Treaty of the marriage still. Though it was said, the Prince was gone but a few daies on his Journey, when a Post was sent to have stayed him, if he had been overtaken. But whether it was so or no, it was God's Providence that he came safely to his Ships, and in them safely into England; arriving at Portsmouth where he was beheld of the people, with no less gladness, than the Sun after a long Eclipse: and now his safe returning did both justify King James his judgement in suffering him to go, and the King of Spain's justice, in suffering him to come back: and was cause, that the people began to have a better opinion of the Spanish faith, than they had before. But now it presently breaks out, that this Match with Spain could never take effect: for King James having received Declarations of the Articles touching the Marriage, found very many strict and large for exercise of the Catholick Religion: but none at all for restitution of the Palatinate; which made him so much discontented, that he presently brake off all Treaty of the marriage, and signified as much, not only to the King of Spain, but to divers other Princes of Christendom: Upon which breach two great Points were presently had in consultation: One for preparing Forces, for recovering the Palatinate by way of Arms, which could not be done by way of friendship: and for this purpose, a Council of War was called, and a proposition resolved on both of men and money, for undertaking the enterprise: as also a great contribution by way of benevolence was collected; towards which, the compiler of this work, gave himself fifty pounds: as many other far greater summs, though the Collection went not through the whole Land; by reason there was hope given of a peaceable reconciliation: so as many that were not over-hasty in their payment escaped without contributing at all. The other point was for providing a fit Wife for the Prince, in some other place. It was said the States of Holland offered a very great portion in marriage to the Prince, if he would Match with some Lady of that Country, but Matches are made in Heaven, and there was a young Lady of France destined to his bed: and for this purpose, the Earl of Carlile, and the Earl of Holland were sent into France, to treat of a marriage with the younger Daughter of King Henry the fourth, King of France deceased, and Sister to the present King Lewis; which marriage afterward took effect, but was not accomplished in King James his daies, who died soon after the agreement.

The King sends for the Prince to return home.

The King breaks off all Treaty of the Match, and why.

A Consultation had to recover the Palatinate by Arms.

A Treaty of Marriage with a younger daughter of the King of France, which afterwards took effect.

It was now the year 1623. in which in Michaelmas Term, there was a Call of fifteen Serjeants at Law, who kept their Feast in the Middle Temple Hall.

A Call of fifteen Serjeants at Law.

Two things in this Kings daies grew to lose their Lustre. One, the exercise of Tilting; which in Queen Elizabeths time, was so much used, that no year passed without a special solemnity in that kind. The other, the Band of Gentlemen Pensioners and Yeomen of the Guard: which in her time consisted of the choicest persons both for stature and other good parts throughout the Realm; and was so great a grace to her Court, that no Prince of Christendom could shew the like: but King James was so intentive to Realities, that he little regarded Shews: and thereby both these in his time came utterly to be neglected: No solemnity of Arms but very rare, no regard had what persons were admitted into the other places.

We may here observe, how the Sirname of the Kings of England, hath at sundry times been changed. From William the Conquerour, to King Henry the second, what sirname they had or whether they had any or no, is most uncertain: but then King Henry the second brought in the French sirname of Plantagenet: which continued in all the succeeding Kings, till King Henry the seventh; and he brought in the Welsh sirname of Teuther, which continued the sirname of all the succeeding Princes, till King James the sixth of Scotland: and he brought in the Scottish sirname of Steward: in which it is likely to continue, (and God grant it may do so) to the worlds end.

Some passages of small moment I confess are omitted by me in this Reign of King James, as whereof for want of knowing the particulars, I dare not venture upon making the Relation: which if some men would have done, the Truth of our Chronicles should not have been mingled with so many falsities.

Of his Taxations.

The Customs of Merchandise raised.

In his second year, in the month of September, he sent Privy Seals to the wealthiest Citizens of London, for moneys to be borrowed of them: and in October following, the Customs of Merchandises, both outward and inward were raised, and then were letten out to Farm. In a Parliament holden at Westminster, the third year of his Reign, there were given him three entire Subsidies, and six Fifteens by the Temporality, and by the Clergy four entire Subsidies. This year also Henry Lord Mordane, convicted in the Star-Chamber, for divers misprisions, was fined to pay ten thousand Marks, and Edward Lord Sturton for the like offence to pay thirty thousand pounds, and some years after Sir John Bennet, Judge of the Prerogative-Court was fined to pay twenty thousand pounds. In his fourth year he repayed threescore thousand pounds to the Citizens of London, which the Londoners lent to Queen Elizabeth, three years before her death; an act by which he got more love, than he payed money. In his seventh year, he had aid throughout England, for making his eldest Son Prince Henry Knight: which though they levied with great moderation, brought him in great summs of money. In his eighteenth year, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, the Temporality gave him two Subsidies, and the Clergy three: and in another Parliament, in the year 1623. the Temporality gave him three Subsidies, and three Fifteens; the Clergy four Subsidies. Besides these Subsidies he sent abroad many Great Privy Seals, and had also a Benevolence throughout the Realm: not without some grudging, but without any just cause; for it should have been remembered, that he took it not of covetousness to gather wealth, but out of very necessity to supply wants: For by his imploying many Embassadors in Ordinary, many Extraordinary, by his necessary bounty to his followers, and by his charge of keeping several Courts; none of all which he could avoid: his Expences were far greater than any of his Predecessours had ever been.

Privy Seals sent out, and also a Benevolence.

The cause of the Kings great Expences.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

THE day of his removing from the Charter-House, at his first coming into England, he caused Proclamation to be made, That all Monopolies and Protections should cease; as likewise all oppressions done by Salt-Peter-men, by Purveyors and Carters. On the 26th of May following he set forth a Proclamation, restraining all persons under great penalties from killing of Deer, or any kind of Fowl used for Hawking. The seventh of May, Proclamation was made against Robberies on the Borders: and on the nineteenth of May, another for uniting the people inhabiting about the Borders of England and Scotland, to live in love and quietness. In this first year, in a Parliament then holden, it was Enacted, That neither Arch-bishop, nor Bishop should Alienate, Grant, or Demise, or in any sort convey to the King, his Heirs or Successors, any of the Honours, Lands, Tenements, or Hereditaments, being parcel of the possession of his Arch-bishop- or Bishoprick: or if any were, it should be utterly void, and of no effect, notwithstanding any former Law, Act, or Ordinance to the contrary. He then also caused himself by Proclamation to be entituled King of Great Britain, that the division of England and Scotland might be no more remembered. In his second year, by his Letters Patents he incorporated the Felt-makers of London, by the name of Masters, Wardens, and Commonalty of the Art or Myserie of the Felt-makers, granting them divers Priviledges and Liberties, for the good Government of their Corporation. In November, of his second year, were proclaimed in London certain new pieces of Coyn, both of gold and silver, with the true valuation and weights of them, according to the Mint of both Nations, English and Scottish. In a Parliament holden the third year of his Reign, the Oath of Allegiance was devised and ordained, and soon after ministred to all sorts of people.

Killing of Deer, or Fowl restrained.

No Bishop to alienate any Lands, not to the King himself.

He is entituled King of Great Britain.

The Felt-makers made a Corporation.

The Oath of Allegiance first devised and ordained.

Flags how to be born in Ships.

This year also he made Proclamation to redress the mis-employment of Lands, or Goods given to Charitable uses. Also this year, he set forth a Proclamation for bearing of Flags in Ships to be in this manner, that from thenceforth all the Subjects of Great Britain should bear in their main-top, the Red Cross commonly called St. George's Cross, and the White Cross, commonly called St. Andrew's Cross, joined together, and the Subjects of South Britain should carry in their Fore-top only the Red Cross as they were wont;

Inmates forbidden, and new Buildings restrained.

The Fore-fronts to be made of Bricks.

An Order for planting of Mulberry Trees for encrease of Silk-worms.

Coyns of Gold raised.

The Apothecaries made a Corporation.

Duels and single Combats restrained.

A Conference in matters of Religion is held before the King at Hampton-Court, and how the matter proceeded.

wont; and the Subjects of North Britain only the White Cross. In his fourth year on the tenth of June he set forth a Proclamation, commanding all Jesuits, Seminary Priests and Fryers to depart the Realm before the first of August following; and never to return upon pain of death, according to divers Statutes in that behalf provided. In his second year he had set forth a Proclamation against Inmates and increase of new buildings, which being little regarded, now in his fourth year he renewed the said Proclamation, adding withal, That the fore-fronts and Windows of all new buildings should be either of Brick or Stone; for disobeying whereof, many were called in the Star-Chamber, and there fined. In his fifth year, he gave order for planting of Mulberry Trees, and breeding of Silk-Worms, that England might be a Country as well of Silk as Cloth. In his eleventh year, he instituted the Order of the Barons, which hath much degenerated since his institution, and thereby having been devised for the benefit of Ireland, hath caused but little contentment unto England. This year also the King himself in Person came to the Star-Chamber, where he had appointed the Mint-men to meet, and there, for the better keeping of Coyns of Gold within the Realm, he raised the prices of them; ordaining the piece called the Unity, which went before but for twenty shillings, to be current now for two and twenty, the double Crown and all other pieces to increase in the like proportion. In his fifteenth year, he granted to the Apothecaries of London to be a Corporation for themselves, and their successors for ever; and by Letters Patents made them a Body Politick, and Corporate. In his time by his appointment a strict Decree passed in the Star-Chamber against Duels and single Combats, and a strict Law was made in Parliament against stabbing with a Dagger or Knife, making it to be wilful Murder.

Affairs of the Church in his Time.

THE King as a Religious Prince, desiring nothing so much as to settle Peace in the Church, and hearing of some dissension of his Divines in point of Religion, in the very first year of his Reign, appointed a Conference to be holden before himself at Hampton-Court, to which were called divers Bishops, Deans and Doctors of one side; and of the other, four eminent Divines; namely, Dr. Reynolds, Dr. Sparks, Mr. Knewstubs, and Mr. Chadderton: who all meeting before the King the 14th day of January: The King first signified the cause of his calling them together, and then told them he was there ready to hear what they could object or say against the present Government of the Church: whereupon Dr. Reynolds being their Fore-man, reduced all matters disliked, or questioned, into these four Heads.

1. That the Doctrine of the Church might be preserved in purity, according to Gods Word.
2. That good Pastors might be planted in all Churches to preach the same.
3. That the Church-Government might be sincerely administered, according to the Word of God.
5. That the Book of Common-Prayer might be fitted to more increase of Piety.

Out of these Heads, he drew and moved divers Points: One, that Confirmation might not be by Bishops only, but that every Pastor in his Parish might Confirm: But this was thought to trench too much upon the Jurisdictions of Bishops, and to be a step to bring in a Presbyterian Government, which the King much disliked; and the Bishop of Winchester challenged Dr. Reynolds with all his Learning to shew, where ever he had read, that Confirmation was at all used in ancient times, by any other than by Bishops. Another motion of Dr. Reynolds was, That there might be a new Translation of the Bible, because the present Translations were corrupt, and not answerable to the truth of the Original; whereof he alledged divers Examples; particularly that in the 105 Psal. 28. v. where it is said, They were not Obedient, when in the Original it is, They were not Disobedient: To this it was agreed, That a new Translation should be made: and accordingly soon after was performed by the most Learned Divines of the Kingdom; and is that, which is now used. After many other Points moved by Dr. Reynolds, he came at last to subscription: Intreating it might not be exacted, as heretofore; which many good men refused for these reasons: First, because the Apocryphal Books are by the Common-Prayer-Book appointed to be read; albeit in some of them there are manifest errors, directly repugnant to the Scriptures. To this, the King himself answered, That as he would not wish all Canonical Books to be read in the Church, unless there were one to interpret; so he would wish no Apocryphal to be read, wherein was any error: but for the other which were clear and correspondent to the Scriptures, he would have them read; seeing there was good use of them, to make up the story of the Persecution of the Jews; but withal he would have the people be taught, they were not to teach a man, either to sacrifice to the dead, or to kill himself. The next scruple against subscription was, That in the Common-Prayer-Book it is twice set down, Jesus said to his Disciples, when by the Original Text it is plain, He spake to the Pharisees. To which it is answered, That for any thing could be gathered by the place, he might speak as well to the one as to the other: But the King for more plainness sake, willed, That the word Disciples, should be omitted, and only the words, Jesus said, to be Printed in a different letter, that it might appear to be no part of the Text.

Another scuple was, concerning the Cross in Baptism, which Dr. Reynolds confessed to have ever been used since the Apostles time, at going abroad, or entering into the Church, or at their Prayers and Benedictions; but doubted of the ancient use of it in Baptism: to which the Bishop of Winchester answered, that in Constantine's time it was used in Baptism, and the Dean of Westminster shewed out of Tertullian, Cyprian, Origen, and others, that in their time it was used in Immortali lavacro, which could be nothing but Baptism: and this the King judged to be antiquity enough to warrant the continuance of it still. At last Mr. Knewstubs moved how far an Ordinance of the Church was to bind them, without impeachment of their Christian liberty: At which the King seemed much mov'd, and told him, him he would not argue that point with him, but answer therein as Kings are wont to speak in Parliament Le Roy's avisero; and therefore I charge you (said he) never speak more to that point, how far you are bound to obey, when the Church hath once ordained it. Dr. Reynolds added; that the Crofs should be abandoned, because in the time of Popery it had been superstitiously abused. To which his Majesty answered, That his very reason was an inducement to have it retained still: For in as much as it was abused (so you say) to superstition in time of Popery, it doth plainly imply, that it was well used before Popery.

Concerning the Wearing of the Sur-plice.

The next thing objected, was the wearing of the Surplice: to which the King answered, That seeing it appeared out of Antiquity, that in the celebration of Divine Service, a different habit appertained to the Ministry, and principally of white Linnen; he saw no reason, but that in this Church as it had been for comeliness and order sake, it might be still continued.

Last of all, Mr. Chadderton, and Mr. Knewstabs requested, That in regard of some tender Consciences, the Surplice and Crofs in Baptism might not be urged: To which the King himself answered, If after the Gospels preaching five and forty years amongst you, there be any yet in these points unsatisfied, I doubt it proceeds rather out of stubbornness of opinion, than out of tenderness of Conscience; and therefore let them conform themselves, or else they shall hear further of it.

Concerning the Ring in Marriage, and Bishops.

It was now observed, that in all their Objections, there was not a word spoken against Bishops, nor against the Ring in Marriage; for Dr. Reynolds himself confessed that the Ring was a very meer ceremony; and the King affirmed he should not think himself rightly married, if he had not been married with a Ring: And as for Bishops, he declared himself to be verily perswaded, they were Divine Ordinationis, and most necessary to Monarchy; and would often say, No Bishop, no King. Many other points were handled, as about Predestination Absolution and Remission of sins, Baptizing by women, about the words in Marriage, With my body I thee Worship, the Oath Ex officio, the high Commission and some other: in all which the King gave so good satisfaction, that they all jointly promised to be quiet and obedient, now they knew it to be his mind to have it so: and the King was so admired for his excellent Resolutions and Answers, that the Arch-bishop of Canterbury said, undoubtedly his Majesty spake by the special assistance of Gods Spirit. After this Conference, the King in his second year set forth a Proclamation, to confirm the Ecclesiastical Government, and the Book of Common-Prayer, in the Form and estate as Queen Elizabeth left them.

After this he sent divers learned Divines into Scotland, to have a Conference with the Divines there; and if it might be, to reduce the two Kingdoms to an uniformity of Religion, as he brought them to an union of Possession. And now entering into consideration of this Title, of being Defender of the Faith: he conceived it might extend not only to his own Dominions, but in some sort to Neighbouring Countries: if not in Authority, at least in care: and hereupon hearing that the States of the Low-Countries were determined to entertain one Vorstius to be publick Professor of Divinity in Leyden, and knowing him, though otherwise a learned man, yet tainted with many erroneous opinions, concerning the Essence and Substance of God, making him to be Quale ex quantum, changing Eternity into Eviternity: teaching Eternity to consist of a number of Ages, and denying God to be Purus actus, but to have in some sort aliquid Diversitatis, & Multiplicitatis in seipso; etiam Principium cujusdam mutabilitatis: He earnestly solicited the States, both by his own Letters, and by his Leiger, Sir Ralph Winwood, by no means to admit the said Vorstius into that place; lest his doctrine having once infected their Country might soon after spread it self into his Dominions. Which request of his, after much soliciting, the States at length granted, and expelled Vorstius from amongst them.

At this time a Synod was assembled at Dort in Holland, consisting of learned Divines, sent from the Count Palatine of the Rhine, from Hassia, from Switzerland, from the Church of Geneva, from Bern, Embsden, Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, Friezeland, and other Provinces; Some also sent from England, as namely, George Bishop of Landaffe, John Davenant Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge, Samuel Ward Master of Sidney Colledge in Cambridge, Thomas Good Doctor of Divinity, and Walter Belcanquell a Scottish-man Bachelor of Divinity: Which Synod was Assembled to examine and determine the Doctrine of Arminius; first concerning Gods Predestination, Election, and Reprobation; then concerning Christ's death and Man's redemption by it; then concerning mans corruption and conversion to God; then concerning the perseverance of the Saints. In all which points the doctrine of Arminius was rejected, as also of Vorstius, and the true Doctrine by a general consent, together with the Approbation of the Lords the States; which yet the Papists made so little reckoning of, that one of them in scorn, made Echo to censure it in this Distich:

But who knows not, that ill-will never speaks well, and that nothing is so obvious in the mouth of an adversary, as scandals and invectives.

In the year 1616. Mar. Antonius de Dominis, Arch-bishop of Spalato, in the Territory of Venice; came into England, leaving his Country (as he affirmed) for Religion; whereof he set forth in writing many Reasons, and being thereupon entertained by the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, was afterward made Dean of Windfor, and Master of the Savoy; in which time he preached publicly divers times before divers Lords of the Council, Printed in London the first four of his Ten Books, Intituled, Of the Common-wealth of the Church: wherein with great earnestness he maintained the Doctrine and Discipline of the Protestants: But after all this, whether all he had done was but dissimbling from the beginning, or whether out of remorse of conscience he repented him of that he had done: after five years staying here, he retracted all he had said or written before: which so incensed King James, that he commanded him (within three daies at his peril) to depart the Realm;

Realm; who thereupon went to Rome, and there inveighed as bitterly against the Protestants, as he had done in England against the Papists; hoping at least for Pardon, if not for Preferment: but notwithstanding his Recantation, according to the Law of the Inquisition (having once Revolted, though now Returned) he suffered the death of an Heretick, though not the shame; had the punishment of a Martyr, but not the honour; and was publicly burnt at Rome, yet not burnt alive, but dying in prison and then buried, it is said his body was afterwards taken up & burned.

In the Kings tenth year, two obstinate Arian Hereticks, Bartholomew Legat, and Edw. Wightman, were burnt for Heresie, Legat in Smithfield, and Wightman at Lichfield.

John Trask holding divers Judaical Opinions is censured, and after three years recants. In his sixteenth year, one John Trask a pretended Minister, was Censured in the Star-chamber, for depraving the Ecclesiastical Government, and for holding divers Judaical Opinions; as, that it was not lawful to do any thing forbidden in the old Law, nor to keep the Christian Sabbath; for which he was set on the Pillory at Westminster, and from thence whipt to the Fleet, and there to remain prisoner: but three years after he writ a Recantation of all his former Heresies and Schismatical Opinions.

George Abbot Archbishop of Canterbury, being a hunting in a Park, and shooting at a Deer; his Arrow by mischance glanced and kill'd a man: upon which fact it was much debated, whether, by it he were not become irregular, and ought to be deprived of his Archiepiscopal Function, as having his hands imbrued (though against his will) in blood: but Andrews Bishop of Winchester standing much in his defence as likewise Sir Henry Martin, the Kings advocate, gave such reasons in mitigation of the Fact, that he was cleared from all imputation of crime; and thereupon adjudged Regular, and in state to continue his Archiepiscopal charge: yet himself (out of a religious tenderness of mind) kept the day of the year, in which the mischance happen'd, with a solemn Fast, all his life after.

Structure of Piety King James made none at all, nor many of magnificence, only the great Banqueting House at White-Hall, a wall of Brick about his Park at Greenwich, another at Theobalds, and some little buildings at Royston, and such like. His greatest charity was expressed by largesses and Pensions: as first were the Gentlemen of his Chapel, being 33 in number, had each of them but 30 pounds a year fee, he made it up 40. Then he enlarged the Pensions of his Alms Knights of Windsor, being 13 in number, from twelve pence a day to two shillings. Then as he increased the number of the Yeomen of the Guard, from seven score to two hundred, so he increased their Pensions from two shillings a day for three months in the Summer, to seven groats a day for six months in the Summer. Then, whereas at his coming, he found but only four Judges in each Court of Law at Westminster, he addeth a fifth, with the like allowance as the former had; besides many other Pensions of like nature. But the works of Piety done by others in his time, were very many, whereof we may justly set in the first place, the repairing of Pauls Church, begun in his time, though not finished till many years after; a work of as great cost and labour, as the first founding of it: towards the furtherance whereof though many well devoted persons contributed liberally, yet none was more industrious, than the Learned Doctor Laud, first Bishop of London, and after Archbishop of Canterbury; who also was a bountiful Benefactor to the Colledge of Saint Johns in Oxford, where he had his Education. Next to him his Predecessor next before him, the worthy George Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury, founded a fair Almes-house at Guilford in Surry where he was born, as likewise Robert the second Earl of Dorset, founded another in Sussex; to the maintenance whereof, he gave Lands to the value of three hundred pounds a year. But of all the Almes-houses that ever were founded in Christianity, there is none I think can parallel that of Thomas Sutton, Esquire. This man born at Snayth in Lincolnshire, having always lived a Bachelor, and by sundry employments, and parsimony, being grown to great wealth, bought of the right Honourable Thomas Earl of Suffolk, his Mansion house, called the Charter-house, near to Smithfield in London, and out of a pious mind converted it into an Almes-house, by the name of Suttons Hospital, endowing the same with above three thousand pounds of yearly rent: wherein are maintained four score poor men, with convenient lodging, diet and allowance of money for apparel: also forty poor children with the like provision, and a Grammar-School, with a Master and Usher to teach them: over all whom, he ordained a Learned man to be Master of the household, and to be chosen by the Governours, whom he appointed for the present, by the Authority of the Kings Letters Patents, to be George Archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Lord Elsemore Lord Chancellor, Robert Earl of Salisbury Lord Treasurer, John Bishop of London, Lancelot Bishop of Ely, Sir Edward Cook Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, Sir Thomas Foster, a Judge of the Common-Pleas, Sir Henry Hubbard the Kings Attorney-General, Doctor Overall Dean of Pauls, Doctor Mountain Dean of Westminster, Henry Thursby Esquire, Master of the Chancery, Richard Sutton Esquire, Auditor of the Imprests, Jeffery Nightingall Esquire, John Low Gentleman, Thomas Brown Gentleman, and Master of the Household for the time being, to be always one: and as any of these sixteen Governours should die, the Survivors to make present addition of others. Next to this was a fair Colledge in Oxford founded by Nicholas Wilbe Esquire, and called after his name. About this time also Edward Allen of Dulwich in Surrey founded a fair Hospital at Dulwich for six poor men, and six poor women, and for twelve poor Children, from the age of four or six years, to be there maintained and taught till the age of fourteen or sixteen, and to have a School-master with dyet, and a convenient stipend. This man may be an example, who having gotten his wealth by Stage-playing, converted it to this Pious use, not without a kind of reputation to the Society of Players. In this Kings time also William Cambden King of Arms, founded an History Professor in Oxford, to which he gave the Mannor of Boxley in Kent, which some years years expired, will be worth four hundred pounds a year. In his tenth year Sir Baptist Hicks, one of the Justices of Peace in Middlesex, who was afterwards made Viscount Cambden, built a fair Sessions-house of Brick and Stone in St. Johns-street, which by the Justices was called after his name Hicks, a great convenience for the Justices; who sat before in a common Inn called the Castle. He also founded a fair Hospital of Free-stone, at Cambridge in Gloucestershire, for six men and six women, allowing each of them a yearly Gown, and two shillings six pence a week, with two Rooms and a Garden. In this Kings time, George Patyn Citizen and Grocer of London, gave to good uses, three thousand and six hundred pounds, whereof twelve hundred pounds to the two Universities, nine hundred pounds for an Alms-house, and a certain sum of money to buy two Bells, and make a Chyme in Bow-Church. Also Thomas Teasdale of Glympton in the County of Oxford Gentleman, gave five thousand pounds to purchase Lands for perpetual maintenance of seven Fellows, and six Scholars, to be placed at Balyoll in Oxford, and to be chosen thither from time to time, out of the Free School of Abbing-ton in Berkshire, to which School he also gave Lands for the maintenance of an Usher. In this Kings time also, Sir Marmaduke Darrell, being Lord of Fulmer, being a Town in Buckinghamshire, where was an old ruinous Church, standing a mile distant from the Town, pulled down that old Church, and at his own charge builded a fair new one in the Town, and furnished it with a Font, a Pulpit, and all Ornaments necessary. Also Thomas Watson of Halstead, in the County of Kent Esquire, new builded a fair Chapel on the North side of the Parish Church of Halstead, of Free-stone from the ground, and gave to the Church four new Bells, and two Pulpits. In his time also Doctor Alymer Bishop of London, and Elizabeth Countess Dowager of Shrewsbury, gave certain sums of money towards the better maintenance of Sermons at Pauls Cross: As likewise Thomas Russell Draper gave ten pounds a year for ever, to be given to unbefitted Ministers, that should preach there; and to the same use, George Bishop Stationer of London, gave ten pounds a year more. In this Kings time also, the Citizens of London new builded Aldgate, where pulling down the old Gate, they found many ancient Roman Coyns. John Whitgift Archbishop of Canterbury, founded a fair Alms-house in Croydon.

On the fifteenth of June, 1614. died Henry Earl of Northampton, who built from the ground a house near Charing-Cross; and dying, was buried in the antient Chapel of Dover Castle, who in his life-time founded three fair Hospitals, and endowed them with large maintenance for ever, one at Rising in Norfolk for twelve poor women and a Governess, a second at Clun in Shropshire, for twelve poor men and a Governor: The third at Greenwich in Kent, for a Governour and twenty poor Alms-men. In this Kings time also, Master Robert Dows of London Merchant-Taylor, gave a competent maintenance for ever unto Sepulchers Parish, for the tolling of the great Bell, and for finding some Divine to come to the Prison of Newgate, the midnight before Execution, and there to ring a hand Bell, and to put the prisoners in mind of their approaching death, with a Christian remembrance and exhortation; and the next morning to toll the great Bell from six a clock till ten, and then to ring it out when the Execution should be past. He also established a free singing School in Christs Hospital for the better education of the poor children there: besides many other good deeds of Alms. About the same time Robert Peake of London Goldsmith, gave to Sepulchers Church a Communion-Table of two yards long, and three quarters and a half broad, richly gilded over, and at every corner imbossed with plates of silver. In this Kings fourteenth year, William Jones of London Merchant, gave about eight thousand pounds to found a Free School in Wales, where he was born, with Alms-houses and Pensioners in London, and a hundred pounds a year for ever to a learned Preacher in London, ordaining all things to be ordered by the Company of Haberdashers whereof himself was free. This year also the old ruinous Gate called Aldersgate, was taken quite down, and new builded from the foundation, towards the building whereof, William Parker, Merchant-Taylor of London, gave a thousand pounds. In this Kings time also, was erected a Building near Chelsey, with a purpose to be a Colledge for Divines to study the Controversies of Religion, but upon second thoughts, the Cage indeed stands finished, but no Birds have ever yet been brought to sing in it; and perhaps never will. If any other deeds of Alms, or publick benefits were done in this Kings time, as perhaps there were many, the Reader may be pleased both here and in other King Reigns, to add them, as he meets with them: for partly to this end, I have digested this Cronicle into such several Heads and Chapters.

Of Casualties happening in his time.

In his first year, on the seven and twentieth of April, thirteen persons were slain by misfortune with Gun-powder, at the Gunpowder Mill in Redriffe, and much other hurt done in divers places. This year also, the Plague in London was so great, that from the three and twentieth of December 1602, to the two and twentieth of December following, there died in London, and the Liberties, eight and thirty thousand, two hundred and four and forty, where of of the Plague thirty thousand, five hundred threescore and eighteen, of them in one week three thousand fourscore and ten, where the next year after, though the City were increased with great number of strangers, yet there died that year of all diseases, within London and the Liberties, but only four thousand two hundred threescore and three persons. In the second year of his Reign, a strange accident happened, to the terrour of all bloody Murtherers, which was this; one Anne Waters enticed by a Lover of hers consented to have her husband strangled, and then buried him secretly under the dung-hill in a Cow-house; whereupon the man being missing by his neighbours, and the Wife making shew of a wondering what was become of him; It pleased God, that one of the Inhabitants of the Town dreamed one night, that his

And now what hope can murderers have of being concealed, when they are subject to be discovered by any mans dream? The 19th of January in his third year, a great Porpus was taken at Westham, in a small Creek, a mile and a half within the Land, and within a few days after a Whale came up within eight miles of London, whose body was seen divers times above water, and judged to exceed the length of the largest Ship in the River: But when she tasted the fresh water, and scented the Land, she returned into the Sea. In his fourth year, being the year 1607, a mighty West wind brought in the Sea into the River of Severn, with such violence, that in some places of Somersetshire and Gloucestershire, the Waters in divers Towns and Villages, grew higher than the tops of their houses; so as (notwithstanding all courses that could be taken) there were drowned in Somersetshire 80 persons, and damages done to the value of twenty thousand pounds. At Coventry also the seventh of April, so sudden a flood came into the Suburbs and City, that in one hour it rose in some places above three yards in height, to the great Damage and hurt of many; and that which is as much strange, as it suddenly came, so it suddenly abated: so as in four hours and a half, it both came and went away. In his 6th year being 1609, a Frost began in December, which continued till April following, with such violence, that not only the Thames was so frozen, that Carts laden were driven over it as on dry land, but many Fowls and Birds perished, as also much herbage in gardens, especially Artichocks and Rosemary were destroyed. This year also the 11th of April a Malt-house in the Town of St. Edmondsbury, being by chance set on fire, continued burning till it had consumed 160 houses: but by the Kings bountifulness, (giving 500 loads of Timber) and the City of *London*s relief, the Town was forthwith new builded, in a fairer manner than it was before. In the year 1613, on the seventeenth of April in the Parish of Standish in Lancashire, a Maden-child was born, having four legs, four arms, two bellies joyned to one back: one head with two faces, the one before, the other behind, like the Picture of Janus.

This year also the 26th of June, in the Parish of Christs Church in Hampshire, one John Hitchel, a Carpenter, lying in bed with his wife and a young Child by them, was himself and the child both burn'd to death with a sudden lightning, no fire appearing outwardly upon him, and yet lay burning for the space of almost three daystill he was quite consumed to ashes. This year also on the seventh of August, the Town of Dorchester was quite consumed with Fire, begun in the house of a Tallow-Chandler, destroying all the houses, except a few near the Church, and all their wares and goods, to the value of two hundred thousand pounds, yet not any man or woman perished. About the same time also the Play-house called the Globe upon the Bank-side near London, was quite consumed with fire by discharging a piece of Ordnance, and yet no man hurt: and about four years after, a new built Play-house, near Golding-lane called the Fortune, was by negligence of a Candle, clean burnt down to the ground. In the year 1614, the Town of Stratford upon Avon, was burned. And lest the water should be behind in doing of mischief, so great Inundations were at this time in Norfolk and Lincolnshire, that the Sea entred twelve miles into the Land. In the year 1612, on the 18 of November a blazing Star began to be seen in the South-east about five a clock in the morning, the flame or stream whereof enclined towards the West. This Comet, in the opinion of Dr. Bembridge, the great Mathematician of Oxford, was as far above the Moon, as the Moon is above the Earth: what it portended is only known to God; but the sequel of it was, that infinite slaughters and devastations followed upon it, both in Germany and other Countries. In the year 1623, on Friday the 24 of October, a Roman Catholick Priest preached in the afternoon, at Hunsdon-house in the Black friers in London, in an upper chamber, where there were assembled above 300 men and women, when about the middle of the Sermon, a great part of the Floor brake, and fell down with such violence, that it brake down the next Floor under it: in the fall whereof were slain the Preacher, and almost 100 of his Auditors, besides as many more hurt. In this Kings time course paper commonly called white brown Paper was first made in England, specially in Surrey, and about Windsor.

Of his Wife and Children.

HE married Anne, the Daughter of Frederick the second, King of Denmark, whose marriage was there solemnized in the year 1589. By whom he had born in Scotland, two Sons, Henry who died before him, and Charles who succeeded him in the Crown; and one Daughter named Elizabeth, married to Frederick the fifth of that name, Count Palatine of the Rhyne, by whom she had many children, both Sons and Daughters. King James had also by his Wife Queen Anne two other Daughters born in England, the Lady Mary, and the Lady Sophia, who both died young, the Lady Mary at about three years old, the Lady Sophia the next day after she was born; and were both of them buried with great solemnity, in the Chapel-Royal at Westminster.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was of Stature somewhat higher than ordinary, of a well compacted body, of an auburn hair, of a full and pleasing visage; in his later days inclining to be fat and burly; of bodily exercises, he took most delight in hunting; which yet (some thought) he used rather as a retiring himself from the importunity of State-affairs, than for any great pleasure he took in it. It is said, that he had such a fashion in riding, that it could not so properly be said he rid, as that his Horse carried him; for he made but little use of his Bridle, and would say, a Horse never stumbled, but when he was reined. He was of an admirable pregnancy of wit, and that pregnancy much improved by continual study from his childhood: by which he had gotten such a promptness in expressing his mind, that his extemporal speeches were little inferior to his premeditated writings. Many, no doubt, had read as much, and perhaps more than he, but scarce ever any concocted his reading into Judgment as he did: by which he became so judicious, that though he could not Prophecy, yet he could presage; and his conjectures were little less than Oracles. In all the Liberal Sciences, he was (we may say) a Master of Arts: but in Divinity, a Doctor, as he made it appear in the Conference at Hampton-Court, and is seen still by the learned writings he hath left behind him. And as for that part of the Politicks, which concerns Monarchy, Regere Imperio populos, which himself used to call King-craft: In this he excelled. He knew how to take the inclinations of the people at their first bound, and never suffer them to rise higher than he could well reach them: nor to grow stronger, than he could either alter or divert them. He would be sure to keep his Subjects in a temper of contentment; which if he could not do by preventives, he would by lenitives. He was so wise that he could dissemble without seeming a Dissembler: be free in opening his mind, and yet keep Counsel. He was a provident Pilot, that in a calm would provide for a storm: and you should never find him committing the fault of Non putâram. He was both Marti & Mercurio; but not tam Marti, quam Mercurio, as being of his temper who said, Cedant Arma Toga: and indeed seeing Peace is the end of both, it were not wisdom to seek it by Arms, if it may be had by the Gown, as it is in the Aphorism, Consilio omina experiri prius, quam Armis sapientem decet. That which was bounty in him being a King, would have been frugality, if he had been a private person, there being of both one radical reason. Of all the Moral virtues, he was eminent for chastity; in which the Poet seems to include all virtue: where he saith,

His wisdom.

His Chastity.

Nulli fas casto sceleratum insistere limen.

By nulli casto, meaning no virtuous person; it was a manifest argument of his being an excellent Prince, that coming next to the admirable Queen Elizabeth, which was in a manner to compare them together, yet there appeared no inequality, that it might not untruly be said, King James was but the continuation of Queen Elizabeth, the same virtue, though different sexes: And now to express his Character in a Word, which worthily might be matter for many volumes: He was to his Wife a most loyal Husband, to his children a most loving Father, to his Servants a most bountiful Master, to his Subjects a most just Prince, to all Princes near him a most peaceable neighbour; that more justly it may be said of him, than of whom it was said; Quæ te tam læta tulerunt sæcula? a Prince after Plato's own heart, for his Learning, and which is infinitely more worth, after God own heart, for his Religiousness and Piety.

OF his death were many scandalous rumours spread; and some were so impudent, as to write that he was poisoned, as the Duke of Richmond, and the Marquess Hamilton had been before: but King James being dead, and his body opened, there was found no sign at all of poyson, his inward parts being all sound, but that his Spleen was a little faulty, which might be cause enough to cast him into an Ague: the ordinary high way, especially in old bodies, to a natural death: of this Ague after a Months languishing, notwithstanding all the remedies that could be applied, he departed this life at Theobalds, on the 27th of March, in the year 1625, in the 59th of his age, when he had Reigned two and twenty years compleat; His body for the greater State, was conveyed by Torch-light from Theobalds to Denmark house, where having rested from the 23d of April, to the 7th of May, it was carried to Westminster, and there interred in the Chapel Royal, with great solemnity, but with greater lamentation: there being scarce any of the infinite multitude that was present, of whom it might not be said,

Men of Note in his time.

Military Men of Note, in a time of Peace, as the whole Reign of King James was, we have no reason to expect; yet if we look amongst the Voluntaries that went to the School of War in the Low-Countries; we shall find a pair of brothers, that may stand in comparison with the greatest Souldiers in the most Martial times, Sir Francis Vere, who as another Hannibal, with his one eye, could see more in the Martial Discipline, than common men can do with two; and Sir Horatio Vere, who was another Philopœmen, contained in a very little body, a very great both skill and courage. But for men of Note in learning, as being in the time of a most learned Prince, there was never greater store; of whom these for example. In Curiousness of Preaching, there was Doctor Andrews Bishop of Winchester: who hath left to posterity, a Century of such golden Sermons, that shews, he as well deserved the name of Chrysostom, as he that had it. In multiplicity of reading, there was Doctor Reynolds of Corpus Christi Colledge in Oxford; who seemed, as it were, a Living Library; and one would have thought his Memory to be a perfect Index of all the Books had ever been written. In knowledge of Law, there was Sir Edward Coke, Chief Justice of the Kings Bench; who hath written such excellent Commentaries of the Law, that he seems as another Bartholus or Baldus amongst us. In elegancy of Writing, there was Sir Francis Bacon, Viscount Albans, who besides his profounder Books of Novum Organum, hath written the Reign of King Henry the Seventh, in so sweet a style, that like Manna, it pleaseth the taste of all palates. In the skill of Antiquities, there was William Camden, King at Arms; who hath set forth the Description of Britain, and the life of Queen Elizabeth in so lively colours, that he seems to have brought Britain out of darkness into light, and to keep Queen Elizabeth alive after death. And to speak it in a word, the Trojan Horse was not fuller of Heroick Grecians, than King James his Reign was full of men excellent in all kinds of Learning. And here I desire the Readers leave to remember two of my own old acquaintance, the

Two eminent Lawyers, Sir Edward Coke and Sir Francis Bacon.

Two eminent Wits, Dr. Donne, and Sir Henry Wotton.

the one was Mr. John Donne, who leaving Oxford, lived at the Innes of Courts, not dissolute, but very neat; a great Visiter of Ladies, a great frequenter of Playes, a great Writer of conceited Verses; until such time as King James taking notice of the pregnancy of his Wit, was a means that he betook him to the study of Divinity, and thereupon proceeding Doctor, was made Dean of Pauls; and became so rare a Preacher, that he was not only commended, but even admired by all that heard him. The other was Henry Wotton, (mine old acquaintance also, as having been fellow-Pupils, and Chamber-fellows in Oxford divers years together.) This Gentleman was imployed by King James in Embassy to Venice; and indeed the Kingdom afforded not a fitter man, for matching the Capriciousness of the Italian Wits: a man of so able dexterity with his Pen, that he hath done himself much wrong, and the Kingdom more, in leaving no more of his Writings behind him.

Of the English Plantations in the Indies, that were in King JAMES his Time.

And now we are come to a time, wherein we may very near say as much of King James as was said of Augustus Caesar; Super & Garamantas & Indos proferre Imperium. In this better, that where Augustus did it by the violent way of Arms, King James did it by the civil way of Plantations: for in his dayes began the great Plantation of the English in the Indies; and must be acknowledged the proper effect of his peaceable Government. The first Plantation of the English in the Indies, was that which is now called Virginia, in memory of the Virgin Queen Elizabeth: but called before Wingandacoa. It was first discovered by Sir Walter Raleigh, in the year 1584; to whom the first Letters Patents were granted for making a Plantation there: but yet no Colony was sent thither, till the year 1606. It is a Country in America, between the degrees of 34 and 45 of the North Latitude: but that part of it which is planted by the English, is under the Degrees of 37, 38, and 39. It is no Island, as many have imagined, but a part of the Continent adjoining to Florida. The first and chief Town made here by the English, is called James Town, in honour of the Kings most excellent Majesty. It is a Countrey abounding with all sorts of Fish and Fowl; so fruitful, that it yields thirty, and sometimes forty Bushels of Corn upon an Acre; and that (which is to us more strange) hath three harvests in a year, the Corn being sowed, ripe and reaped, in little more than two months. Many Plantations had been attempted here before, but came to nothing: the first to any purpose was in the year 1607, under the Conduct of Captain Gosnoll, John Smith, and Mr. Edward Maria Winkfield, who carried a Colony thither of a hundred persons; but of these, many dying of sickness, or slain by the Savages, a new supply came in the year 1608, of a hundred and twenty persons, under the conduct of Captain Nilson. After which, was sent another supply of threescore and ten persons; and in the year 1609, a third supply came of five hundred persons, under a Patent granted to Sir Thomas West, Lord de la Ware, but conducted thither by Sir Thomas Gates, Sir George Summers, and others. In the year 1611, was a fourth supply of three hundred men under the conduct of Sir Thomas Gates. In the year 1612, two other supplies were sent of forty men in each, and now was the Lottery, spoken of before granted by the King, for further Supplies of this Plantation. After this Master Samuel Argall being appointed Governour in the year 1618, the Lord de la Ware came thither with a supply of two hundred people; but in his stay there died: After this in the year 1620, were sent thither eleven Ships, with twelve hundred and sixteen persons, and now they founded themselves into Corporations: In the year 1621, Sir Francis Wiat was sent thither Governour, with thirteen hundred men, women, and children, and now they founded Schools, and Courts of Justice; and the Plantation was extended a hundred and forty miles up, on the River of both sides. But now when the English were secure and thought of nothing but peace, the Savages came suddenly upon them, and slew of them three hundred and seven and forty men, women, and children. For repairing of which loss, the City of London sent presently over a supply of a hundred men. This massacre happened, by reason they had built their Plantations remote from one another, in above thirty several places, which made them now upon consultation, to reduce them all to five or six places, whereby they may better assist each other: since which time they have alwayes lived in good security. And thus much for Virginia.

Upon their security, 200 of them slain by the Savages.

Next was the Plantation of the Island called Bermudas, so called of a Spanish Ship, called Bermudas, which was there cast away, carrying Hogs to the West-Indies, that swam ashore, and there increased. The first English man that entered this Isle, was one Henry May in the year 1591. but in the year 1610, Sir George Somers was sent thither, who dying there, in memory of his name, the Isles have ever since been called Somers Isles. In the year 1612, one Mr. Moor landed there with 60 persons, and then builded the chief Town there called S. Georges, together with 8 or 9 Forts. The same year a supply of 30 more persons was sent thither, and the year after 60 more, under one Mr. Barlet; with a shew to survey the Land; but with a purpose indeed to get from thence a great lump of Ambergris, and no less than 80 pound weight that had been found and taken up in the Island some few years before, and was still retained. A while after this, came a Ship called the Blessing, with 100 passengers; and two days after came the Star, with 180 more; and within 14 dayes after that again came thither the Margaret and two Frigats, with 130 passengers: So as now they began to divide the Country into Tribes, and the Tribes into shares. In the year 1616, Captain Daniel Tuckard was sent from Virginia to be Governour there, and now it began indeed to be a Plantation; for now they began to build them Houses: and now was sent from thence into England, a Ship freighted with 30000 weight of Tobacco, valued there but at 2 s. 6 d. the pound, though sold here oftentimes for Verino's at great rates. In the year 1619, Captain Nathanael

Butler was sent Governour with new Supplies, in whose time they built them a Church; held Assizes for Criminal causes, twice a year, and began to have Parliaments as in England: and now in the Ship called the Magazin, came divers Gentlemen of good fashion, with their Wives and Families: so as now their number was no fewer than fifteen hundred people, dispersed twenty miles in length. In the year 1622, came Governour Mr. John Bernard, bringing with him a supply of 140 persons; but he and his wife dying presently upon their coming, Mr. John Harrison in the year 1623, was chosen Governour. These Isles of Bermudas are in 32 degrees of Northern latitude: so as they are distant from Virginia at least 500 Leagues, and from England above three thousand three hundred. This Countrey is of a most healthful Air, abounding with all sorts of Fowls, Birds and Fish; and where great pieces of Amber-griese are oftentimes found, which is valued there at no less than three pounds an ounce. And thus much concerning the state of Bermudas, till the year 1624.

The Plantation of New-England: and the Commodities of the Country.

Next comes the Plantation of New-England; concerning which, we must first know, that King James in the year 1606, granted two Letters Patents for Plantations in Virginia, one to the City of London; another to the Cities of Bristow, Excester and Plimouth; with power to plant Colonies any where between the Degrees of 38 and 44, provided there should be at least 100 miles distance between the two Colonies. So as the first Colony was from the City of London, and is that which is called Virginia; The second Colony was from Bristow and the other Towns, and is that which is now called New-England, and is situate between the degrees of 41 and 45: the very mean betwixt the North Pole and the Line. And now to speak a little of the Countrey, there are on the Sea Coast, 25 excellent good Harbours, in some whereof there is Anchorage for 500 sail of Ships of any burthen. The Earth is fruitful, and the Air as healthful as any part of the World: abounding with all sorts of Grain, Fowls and Fish: Many of such kinds as are to us unknown, yet excellent meat: Many Voyages had been made for the perfect discovery of the Countrey: Many attempts for settling a Plantation there: Many Miscarriages and Disasters in making the attempts: but all at last came to this, that in the year 1624, (which is the limit of our Narration) there was a Plantation settled, though but a small one: but a few years after (by the sending forth of new Supplies) increased to so many thousands, that if God continue to prosper it, as he hath begun, the New-England in a few Ages may prove as populous as the Old; and the King of England likely to have as many and greater Crowns in the Indies, than he had in his Realms of Great Britain and Ireland. But seeing of these and all other English Plantations in the Indies, whereof there are many, large discourses are written by divers Authors, it should be more than superfluous to speak more of them in this place: It is sufficient to have shewed that King James had the honour to have them settled in his time; and under the influence of his peaceable Government.

Of the Earls and Barons made by King JAMES.

IN former Kings Reigns, the making of Earls and Barons was but rare, and therefore they are fitly set down at the several times of their making; but in King James his Reign, there were so many made, that it may not be unfit to set them down in a Catalogue together.

In his first year were made four Earls and nine Barons: namely, Henry Howard younger Brother of the last Duke of Norfolk, was made Earl of Northampton: Thomas Sackville Lord Buckhurst, was made Earl of Dorset; and shortly after Charles Blunt Lord Mountjoy, was made Earl of Devonshire, and Thomas Howard Baron of Walden, was made Earl of Suffolk: Henry Grey was made Lord Grey of Groby, (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Stanford) Henry Danvers was made Baron of Danby, (afterwards by King Charles made Earl of Danby) Sir John Peter of Essex, was made Baron of Writtle: Sir William Russel was made Baron of Thornough: Sir Thomas Gerard was made Baron of Gerard Bromley in Staffordshire: Sir Robert Spencer was made Baron of Normelayton in the County of Warwick: Sir Robert Egerton was made Baron of Elsemere: Sir Robert Cecil was created Baron of Henden in Rutlandshire; and Sir John Harington was made Baron of Exon.

In his second year on the twentieth of May were made four Barons and one Viscount: Sir Robert Sidney was made Baron of Penhurst: Sir William Knowles Baron of Graves: Sir Edward Wotton Baron of Martley: and Mildmay Fane Lord de Spencer: and in August the same year, Sir Robert Cecil Baron of Essenden, was created Viscount Cranburn.

In his third year, on the fourth of May, were created three Earls, and one Viscount, and four Barons; namely, Sir Robert Cecil Viscount Cranburn, was created Earl of Salisbury: Sir Thomas Cecil his elder Brother Lord Burghley, was created Earl of Excester: and Sir Philip Herbert younger brother to the Earl of Penbroke, was created Earl of Montgomery: Robert Sidney Baron of Penhurst, was created Viscount of Lisle: Sir John Stanhope was made Baron of Harington; Sir George Carew Baron of Clopton; Mr. Thomas Arundell of Devonshire, Baron of Warder; and Mr. William Cavendish Baron of Hardwick.

In his ninth year, upon Easter Munday, Sir Robert Carre was created Viscount Rocheester; and

In his tenth year, on the fourth of November, was created Earl of Somerset.

In

In his eleventh year, Lewis Steward Duke of Lennox was made Earl of Richmond, and after Duke of Richmond.

In his thirteenth year, on the 29th of June, Sir James Hay of Scotland was created Baron of Sawley, and about three years after, was made Viscount Doncaster; and Sir Robert Dormer was created Baron of Wyngham, (afterward by King Charles was made Earl of Carnarvan.)

In his fifteenth year, on New-years day, Sir George Villiers Earl of Buckingham, was created Marquess of Buckingham; and on the 12th of July, Sir Francis Bacon Lord Chancellor of England, was created Baron of Vermulam, and not long after Viscount St. Albans. Also in the Summer of this year, the King created four Earls and one Countess: namely, the Viscount Lisle was made Earl of Leicester, the Lord Compton was made Earl of Northampton, the Lord Rich was made Earl of Warwick, the Lord Cavendish was made Earl of Devonshire, and the Lady Compton, wife to Sir Thomas Compton, and Mother of the Marquess of Buckingham was created Countess of Buckingham.

In his sixteenth year, on the 25th of November, Sir John Digby Vice-chamberlain to the King, was created Baron of Sherbourn, by Patent to him and his heirs Males.

In his seventeenth year, in the month of June, Esme Steward Lord d' Aubigny, younger Brother to the Duke of Lennox, was created Earl of March, James Marquess Hamilton was created Earl of Cambridge, and Sir John Villiers Brother to the Marquess of Buckingham was created Baron of Stock and Viscount Purbeck.

In his eighteenth year, William Cavendish was created Viscount Mansfield; (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Newcastle) and on Munday the fourth of December, Sir Henry Mountague, being first made Lord Treasurer, was created Baron of Kimbolton, and Viscount Mandevile, and not long after Earl of Manchester, and Sir John Ramsey Viscount Haddington of Scotland was created Earl of Holderness; and William Fielding was created Baron of Newhaven, and Viscount Fielding.

In his nineteenth year, Henry Cary was made Lord Cary of Leppington, (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Monmouth) Sir Edward Montague, elder Brother to the Viscount Mandevile was made Baron of Boulton, the Lord Darcy of Essex, was created Viscount Colchester (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Ryvers) the Lord Hunsdon was created Viscount Rochford, (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Dover) Sir Lyonel Cranfield, Master of the Wards, was created Baron Cranfield in Bedfordshire, and Sir Tho. Howard second son to Thomas Earl of Suffolk, was created Baron of Charleton, and Viscount Andover, (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Barkshire.)

In his twentieth year, in the month of September, the Viscount Doncaster was created Earl of Carlisle, the Viscount Fielding was created Earl of Denbigh, the Lord Digby was made Earl of Bristol, the Lord Cranfield was created Earl of Middlesex, and Sir Henry Rich was made Baron of Kensington.

In his one and twentieth year, the Marquess of Buckingham being then in Spain with Prince Charles, had his Parent sent him to be Duke of Buckingham; William Grey was created Baron of Wark, Elizabeth the widow of Sir Moyle Finch of Kent, was created Viscountess of Maidstone, (afterward by King Charles made Countess of Winchelsey.)

In his two and twentieth year, the Earl of Clanriccard of Ireland, was created Viscount Tunbridge in Kent (afterward by King Charles made Earl of St. Albans) Sir John Hollys, Knight, Baron Haughton of Haughton was created Earl of Clare, Sir Henry Rich, Baron of Kensington, was created Earl of Holland; the Lord Fines, Baron of Say and Seale, was made Viscount Say and Seale: Sir Francis Fane was created Earl of Westmorland, Oliver Lord St. John of Bletsho was made Earl of Bullingbrook, Sir Christopher Villiers, Brother to the Duke of Buckingham, was made Earl of Anglesey, and Sir James Ley was made Lord Ley (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Marlborough.) Also this year, Sir Francis Leak was made Baron of Deincourt, and Sir Richard Roberts was made Lord Roberts of Truro in Cornwall.

And this was the number of all the Earls and Barons made by King James; but in his time also began another sort of Nobility to be made in England, which had none of the privileges of English Barons, but had only Title to be called Lords of some place either in England or Ireland, although they possessed not a foot of Land in either: Of which sort, the number being great; I forbear to rehearse them, lest I should be tedious, or otherwise be thought to encroach too much upon the Heralds Office. It is sufficient to have shewed, that King James advanced so many in honour, that in a kind it might be said of him, as was said of Augustus Caesar, That he left Rome of Marble, which he found but of Brick.

THE REIGN OF King Charles the First.

King Charles proclaimed.

King James being deceased on the 27th of March in the forenoon, the same day in the afternoon, Charles Prince of Wales, his only Son, then living, was proclaimed King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, with the general Acclamation of all sorts of people, as being a Prince of admirable endowments both of Mind and Body. He was now about the age of 25 years, whereof the most part of one he had spent in Spain; where, although he was frustrated of the end for which he went, yet it gave him a tincture of Travel and Experience, more worth, perhaps, than that he went for.

The celebration of the Funeral of King James.

The Funerals of the deceased King were celebrated on the seventh of May, his body being brought from Somerset-House to Westminster, where in St. Peter's Church he was with great magnificence interr'd, the King himself being principal Mourner; which though it was contrary to the custom of his Predecessors, yet he chose rather to express his Piety, in attending the Body of his Father at his Funeral, than to stand upon any old niceties and points of State.

The King and Queens espousals at Paris.

The first thing he did after the celebration of the Funeral, was to hasten the coming over of the Queen, to whom on Sunday the first of May, he was by his Proxie, the Duke of Chevreux, espoused at our Ladies Church in Paris; where the Espousals were performed by the Cardinal of Richlieu.

A while after the Queen began her journey towards England, accompanied to Amiens, with the Queen her Mother, the Duke of Orleans her Brother, and the Duke and Duchesse of Chevreux, with others of the Nobility of France, and she was attended by the Duke of Buckingham, and the Earls of Carlisle, Holland, and Montgomery, and many of the English Gentry, who were sent over for that purpose.

The Queen staid for a fortnight at Amiens, and there she parted with her Mother; from thence she went to Boloigne, where a Fleet of one and twenty of the Kings Ships attended her, with the Countess of Buckingham, and a Noble Train of Ladies.

On Trinity Sunday, late at night, she arrived at Dover, which being signified to the King (then at Canterbury) he went to her early the next morning, and received her with the greatest demonstrations of affection; and the same day they came to Canterbury, where their Nuptials were with all possible magnificence completed, and the Duke of Chevreux surrendered his Royal Charge to the King. On Wednesday the fifteenth of June, they went by Coach to Gravesend, and the next day they came from thence to Somerset-House in their Royal Barges, attended with a very numerous Train of Lords and Ladies, and welcomed as they passed, by the great Ordnance from several Ships in the River, and the Tower of London, and accompanied or met by most of the Barges and Boats which could be found on the River of Thames.

arrives at Dover.

The King and Queen came to Somerset-House.

The third day after their arrival, their marriage was declared at White-hall, with great acclamations of joy, the King and Queen presenting themselves in that Ceremony, on Royal Thrones before the Nobility: but the Pestilence began to rage in London at this time, which abated much of the Pomp of the Solemnity; though neither that, nor any thing else did divert the King from the Consideration of the other concerns of the Kingdom; for, having summoned a Parliament to meet on the eighteenth of June; at the first assembling thereof he spake to them in these words:

The King's
marriage declared.

My Lords and Gentlemen:

You are not ignorant, that at your earnest intreaty, March 24. 1623. my Father (of happy memory) first took up Arms for the recovery of the Palatinate; for which purpose, by 1625. by your assistance, he began to form a considerable Army, and to prepare a goodly Armado and Navie-Royal. But Death intervening between him and the Achievement, the War with the Crown is devolved upon me; to the prosecution whereof, as I am obliged both in Nature and Honour, so I question not, but the same necessity continuing, you will cherish the Action with the like affection, and further it with a ready contribution. True it is, you furnished My Father with affectionate Supplies, but they held no Symmetry or Proportion with the Charge of so great an Enterprize. For those your Donatives are all disbursed to a peny; and I am enforced to summon you hither, to tell you, That neither can the Army advance, nor the Fleet set forth, without further aid. Consider, I pray you, that the eyes of all Europe are fixt upon me, to whom I shall appear ridiculous, as though I were unable to outgo Muster and Ostentation, if you now desert me. Consider it is my first attempt, wherein if I sustain a foil, it will blemish all my future Honour. If Mine cannot, let your reputation move you, deliver and expedite me fairly out of this War, where-with you have encumbered Me. (Let it never be said whereinto you have betrayed Me.) I desire therefore your speedy supply. The Sun, you know, is entring into his declining point, so it will be soon too late to set forth, when it will be rather not too soon to return. Again, I must mind you of the Mortality regnant in this City, which should it, (as so it may, and no breach of Priviledge neither) Arrest any one Member of either House, it would soon put a period, both to the Consultation and Session, so that your own Periclitation necessitates an early resolution. In summe, Three of the best Rhetoricians, Honour, Opportunity, and Safety, are all of a Plot, and plead, you see, for Expedition. Perhaps it may be expected I should say something in way of account of My Religion, as also of the temper and tenour of my future Government. But as I hope, I have not been guilty of anything which may justly start the least question in either, so I desire you would repose in this assurance, that I will in neither vary from those Principles, wherein I have been instituted at the feet of that eminent Gamaliel My late Father.

This Speech was very well receiv'd, and though it did not produce so great a Supply, as the exigence of affairs required, yet the Commons gave two Subsidies without any Condition, and the Clergy three; and in the Grant of the Laity the Papists were to pay double.

The King very graciously accepted the gift, as an earnest of the good affections of his people, in reference to greater sums which he expected to follow: but the Plague encreasing in London, the Parliament, on the eleventy of July, was adjourned to Oxford, to be held there on the first of August. The Commons had sent up a Bill for Tonnage and Poundage to the Lords before the Adjournment; but because it was limited to a year, they thought it unfit to pass: for that most of the former Grants to the Kings Predecessors were for term of life. The cause of this restraint was, because the Customs had been raised by King James, by advice of his Council, in the eighteenth year of his Reign, and the Commons had a purpose to reduce them to the rate settled in Queen Maries time.

August the first, the Parliament assembled at Oxford, and in the fourth of the same Month, both Houses, by the King appointment, attended him in Christ-Church-hall, where he briefly acquainted them with his wants for setting out the Fleet; adding, that the eyes of the Confederates were fixt upon it.

The Commons upon their return from the King to their House, had several long Debates upon the substance of his Speech, and the present Condition of the Kingdom, all tending to an Arraignment of the Government. Some urged that our Necessities arose by providence; That the Kings designs were guided by evil Counsels, and, that though a former Parliament engaged the King in a War; yet if things were managed by contrary designs, and the Treasure misemployed, this Parliament was not bound to be carried blindfold in designs not guided by sound Counsel; and that it was unusual to grant Subsidies upon Subsidies, before Grievances were redress'd, and before they would agree to any answer to what the King proposed (upon some jealousies that the Popish Religion was too much countenanced) they framed a Petition against Popish Recusants, which was presented to him by their Speaker, attended by all the House of Commons. The King seemed not displeased at this delay, and the Parliament received from him a very gracious and satisfactory answer to their Petition; nevertheless this kindness did not produce answerable effects: For, when the matters of supply came to be again debated by the Commons, great division arose, some would give, and others would not, and the majority were prevailed on by many passionate instances of mis-government, to insist on redress of Grievances before Supply, and to have a Remonstrance thereof drawn up, and presented to the King, inveighing in their Speeches against the Duke of Buckingham, as the chief occasion of all miscarriages in Government. Nothing more than this could shew the mutability of humane Affairs, and how little dependance is to be laid on the affections of the people; for in the last Parliament of King James, this Duke of Buckingham, against whom they now exclaimed, was extolled for the great Ornament and Honour of the English Nation, and the chief preserver of the Kingdom from the Spanish practices; nay, no Honour was thought large enough to requite his Merits. The King, from those of his Council in the House of Commons, had advice from time to time of the matter of this Remonstrance, in the debates of it, which tended chiefly to discredit the Duke, and remove him from his Counsels and Affection; but the expressions were so sharp, and the style so unusual from Subjects to their Prince, that the King determined rather to dissolve the Parliament, than admit of it; and thereupon he came to the Lords House, to put an end to it. The House of Commons were Resolved into a Grand Committee, when the Usher of the Black Rod came to 1625. to call them up to the Lords House, in order to a Dissolution, but before they would admit the Speaker to resume the Chair, to sit as a House, one Glanvill stood up and declared the sence of the House in these words :

First, to give his Majestie thanks for His Gracious Answer to our Petition for Religion.

Glanvil declares in the Name of the House of Commons.

Next, for his care of our Health, in giving us leave to depart this dangerous time.

Lastly, a dutiful declaration of our Affection and Loyalty, and purpose to supply His Majesty in a Parliamentary way, in a fitting and convenient time.

This being done the Usher was called in, and declared his Message, and the dissolution of the Parliament immediately ensued.

Soon after this, a Proclamation was set out, to put the Laws in execution against Popish Recusants, commanding the return, by a prefixed time, of children of Noblemen and others, sent to be educated in Popish Schools, or Seminaries abroad; and all the Kings Subjects under the pay of the Emperour, the King of Spain, and the Arch-Duchies who then governed the Spanish Netherlands, were speedily enjoined to return to their Native Countries, to be employed in the Kings Service.

Term kept at Reading

The Term, because of the Plague in London, was kept at Reading, and special Instructions were given to the Judges, to put the Laws in execution against Recusants.

And now the War with Spain, for the recovery of the Palatinate, which was resolved on in the last year of his Fathers Reign, was vigorously prosecuted; and the Duke of Buckingham and the Earl of Holland were sent Embassadors to the United Provinces, where they met at the Hague the Embassadors of France and Denmark, and concluded a League with them and the States, for restoring the Liberties of Germany. The King of Denmark, in conformity with the League, took up Arms, but was unfortunate therein, which he imputed to the Kings not performance of what was promised on his part, and that was occasioned by the Parliaments failure of supplies of money. And for the same reason the Fleet, which should have been set out in the beginning of Summer, to attempt something on the coast of Spain, were not out till October following. In which expedition the Viscount Wimbleton was General of the Land Forces, and the Earl of Essex Vice-Admiral of the Navie.

The Fleet, with the addition of some Dutch Vessels, consisted of Eighty good Ships; at their first setting forth, they were encountred with so violent a Storm, that the greatest part of them were dispersed and scattered for seven days together, and a gallant Ship, called the Long Robert of Ipswich, with an hundred and seventy persons in it, were lost. After this Tempest, the Fleet met at the Southern Cape, where they entered into Consultation what they should attempt; the Earl of Essex, out of a great desire to equal the glory of his Father gotten at Cadiz, proposed the assailing of the Spanish Fleet, which then lay in that Harbour, but there were so many difficulties in the Enterprize, and so long time spent in the debate of it, that the whole Coast of Spain was thereby alarm'd, and the Spaniards had opportunity to prepare for their defence: so that when it was concluded, that they should sail to Cadiz, they landed their men there with great danger and opposition. The first place they attempted was Puntol Castle, under the shelter whereof the Spanish Ships rode; for the taking of which, twenty English and five Dutch Ships were ordered; but they, after the spending of two thousand great Shot against it to little purpose, came off again. This not succeeding, Wimbleton sent Sir John Borroughs, with a select Regiment of Foot, to attack the Fort on the land side, but these, at their first appearance, were encountered by some Spanish Forces, which were drawn together for the defence of the Country, and after a sharp Engagement, they worsted the Spaniards in sight of the Castle; whereupon the Commander within it, hung out a white Flag; and after a short Parley, surrendered the place, with fifteen Barrels of Powder, and eight pieces of Ordnance; whilst this was doing, the Spaniard haled most of their best Ships, under the Port-Royal, so that Sir Samuel Argale, who was set to fire the Ships was disappointed of his purpose. But that which might have been very fatal herein, was the misgovernment of the Souldiers, who by the avarice, or negligence of their Commanders, were permitted to fill themselves so much with the Wine they found in the Cellars, and other places where they plundered, that they were more like to beasts than men, and if the Spaniards had had good intelligence, they might have been all cut off; for by this means they were so ungovernable, that the General fearing the consequence thereof, speedily caused them to be imbarqued and left behind him the hopes only of Renown and Victory. From thence they sailed to the Southern Cape, where they staid twenty days, in expectation of the Plate Fleet, but by the inclemency of the Air, and the intemperance of the Souldiers and Mariners, so great a Contagion happened in the Fleet, that they wanted men to manage the Sails; and where some Ships had a greater number of infected persons than others, to remedy this, a most pernicious course was taken; for every Ship was ordered by lot, to take in two sick in exchange for so many sound men, which propagated the Pestilence, and forced the General to an untimely return, four days before the Plate Fleet came.

The unprosperous success of this Fleet displeased the King very much, and Wimbleton was some time prohibited his presence, but he excused himself, laying a great part of the miscarriage on the stubbornness of the Earl of Essex. Yet, though all where blamed, none were punished for the ill managery and conduct of the Expedition.

The War became now very chargeable, and since the King could not be supplied in a Parliamentary way, he was advised by his Council, to use other means, and it was resolved to borrow what money could be got by Letters of Privie Seals, sent to several of the ablest persons in all parts of the Kingdom; in each of which Letters, the King promised in the name of himself, and his Successors, to repay the money in eighteen moneths after the payment thereof to Money borrowed by Letters of privy Seal.

To be repaid in 18 Months.

1625. the Collector, and the Collectors of this Loan were ordered to pay the sums received into the Exchequer, and to return the names of such as went about to delay, or excuse the payment of the money required of them.

This manner of proceeding was thought very improper, unless it had been resolved not to call a Parliament so soon after; for if the King in that conjuncture had clapt up a peace with Spain, (which the Spaniard had as much reason to accept, as he to offer) he might have freed himself from the necessity of calling Parliaments, (till by the goodness of his Government he had no necessity for a Parliament to work upon) and likewise prevented a following unluckly rupture betwixt him and France. The King, however, was resolved to try his fortune in another Parliament, which was summoned to meet at Westminster on the sixth of February; but first the Solemnities of the Coronation were to be performed, which was celebrated on the second of February (commonly called Candlemas day.) In the external pomp whereof the King omitted his triumphant riding through the City, from the Tower to White-hall, partly to save the Charges thereof, and partly to prevent the danger of popular concourse; for the Plague was not quite decreased, but some dregs remained of it. In the Sacred part there was a clause added, which had been pretermitted in the time of King Henry the Sixth, which is this that followeth, viz. "Let him obtain favour of the people, like Aaron in the Tabernacle, Elisha in the Waters, Zacharias in the Temple; Give him Peters Key of Discipline, and Pauls Doctrine. Which clause had been omitted in time of Popery, as intimating more Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction to be given to our Kings than the Popes allowed of.

A Parliament summoned to meet Feb. 6.

The Kings Coronation

The Coronation Oath, though the contrary was suggested, was the same which had been taken by his Predecessors, as appears by the Records of the Exchequer.

The solemnity being over, he began his second Parliament on the sixth of February, in which he had no better success than in his first. Sir Heneage Finch was chosen Speaker by the Commons, and approved by the King, a Person of great prudence and moderation. The House of Commons began where they left at Oxford, with matters of Religion and publick grievances; they made strict enquiry into what abuses had been of the Kings grace since that time, and who were the Authors and Abettors thereof, for they had been informed of many Pardons and Reprieves to Jesuits and Priests, and their grievances were stated under four Heads.

Grievances stated.

1. The state of the King in the constant Revenue of the Crown.
2. The condition of the Subject in his Freedom.
3. The cause of the Nations good success in former times.
4. The present condition of the Kingdom.

Under the first head was considered the great dispositions of Lands and Pensions mero motu and other exorbitant expences: In the second the bringing in of new Impositions, the multiplying of Monopolies, and the levying of Tonnage and Poundage without an Act of Parliament. Under the third, they ascribed the great renown and reputation of our Nation in former times, to the wisdom and gravity of the Counsellors, when nothing was ordered but by publick debate; and whence arose a readiness in the Subject to assist their Sovereign in purse and person. In the fourth was represented the loss of the Nations wonted Reputation in the Expedition of Cadiz, and others; which was imputed to the want of such Counsels as were heretofore used; For as much as men through difference in success were backward to adventure either their persons or their purses.

Whilest these debates were agitated by the Commons, the Earl of Arundel was by the King committed to the Tower, because of a Marriage consummate betwixt the Lord Maltravers his Eldest Son, and the Eldest Sister of the Duke of Lenox, one near allyed in blood to the King; for the King had designed to marry her to the Lord of Lorne, eldest Son to the Earl of Argyle, a man of great power in Scotland, meditating thereby to reconcile those two Families, who had been antiently in feuds.

The Earl of Arundel committed by the King.

The Earl besought the Kings pardon, and protested his innocency, as no way privie to the business, being contrived by the Dukes Dowager, and his Countess, without his knowledge; but the King would not hear him.

This commitment of the Earl was resented by the House of Peers, who petitioned the King, That it is their undoubted Right, that no Peer sitting in Parliament is to be imprisoned, without Order from the House of Peers, unless it be for Treason, Felony, or refusing to give security for the Peace. And they insisted the more on this Priviledge at this time, because the Earl had six Proxies deputed to him, which would be of no validity during his restraint.

Upon this Petition many debates passed in the House of Lords upon several Messages of the King about this Priviledge, which lasted from the fourteenth of March, to the eighth of June, ere he was satisfied with Reasons of the Peers; and then the Earl was released from his imprisonment.

Whilest these matters were agitated at home, to make the difference greater between the Dutch and the Spaniard, and for further promoting that War, the King of France did conclude a Little Treaty in the Hague, by the Baron of Coupet, concerning the equipping of a Fleet of twenty Ships under the Admiral Hautain, upon a design to straiten Genna by Water, whilest the Constable des Deguiers should be able to do the same by Land; and the English Ambassador then Resident at London, had obtained of the King the Vanguard, one of the Navie-Ships, and six Merchant-Ships to be employed in the same Expedition; but shortly after these English Ships were received into the pay of France. Monsieur de Soubize, taking advantage of the French Armies advance towards Italy, incited those of Rochel to stir against the King, and he with some Ships he had got together, seized on the Isle of Rhee, and some of the King of France his Ships in the Harbour. At this the King was so incensed, that he turn'd his design for Italy upon Rochel; and that occasioned another Treaty at the Hague, with the Hollanders, 1025. landers betwixt d'Espeffes the French Embassador and them; which was concluded the Twelfth of April, New Style; whereby the Twenty Ships under Hautain, were agreed to be employed against Soubise, and against Rochel. In the mean time many of the French Protestants took great offence at his assistance from Holland against Rochel; but their Alliance with France, and interest of State prevailed above all other considerations. Montmorancy the French Admiral being thus strengthened with the Dutch Fleet, and the seven English Ships, quickly chased Soubise into the Isle of Oleron, and reprinted most of the Ships he had taken; and strengthened Rochel by Sea, whilst the French Army was marching to block it up by Land. The King was much offended, that the English Ships were employed in this Action, having not consented they should be used in any other Expedition, than against Genua; and thereupon he sent an expostulatory Message to the King of France, to have a reason thereof, and to demand restitution of the Ships; and when satisfaction was not given herein, the King caused a rich French Ship of New Haven to be seized on. This occasioned great clamour in France, and the French by way of Retaliation arrested the English Merchants Ships and Goods in their Harbours; but after a while a reconciliation was made, The King had his Ships again, and their Ship restored, and the English Ships and Goods were delivered back: and thus all was calm for the present, but it continued not long so, as shall be shewn hereafter.

The Traverses in the House of Peers about the Earl of Arundel, rather heightened, than allayed, their intention towards the Duke of Buckingham, and encouragement is given to all that would to inform against him. One Doctor Turner a Physician proposed Six Queries in the House of Commons, touching his ill Conduct in affairs, which reflected much upon the Kings Government, and was so resented by him.

Dr. Turner's Queries.

1. Whether the King hath not lost the Regality of the Narrow Seas, since the Duke became Admiral?
2. Whether his not going as Admiral in this last Fleet, was not the cause of the ill success?
3. Whether the Kings Revenue hath not been impaired through his immense Liberality?
4. Whether he hath not engrossed all Offices, and preferred his Kindred to unfit places?
5. Whether he hath not made sale of places of Judicature?
6. Whether Recusants have not dependance upon his Mother and Father-in-law?

Sir Richard Weston's Message for Money.

Neither was this the only thing which displeased the King, at this Time in the proceedings of the Commons. They had sent Committees to the Signet-Office, to search for Originals of his Letters for relieving some Priests condemned at York; and when Sir Richard Weston Chancellour of the Exchequer, brought a Message to them from him for supply, acquainting them, that the Fleet was returned, Victuals spent, and the men in great necessity, and ready to mutiny for want of pay, and that a Fleet of 40 Ships which were ready to go out, could not move without money, and that the Army on the Sea Coasts, was in want both of Victuals and Cloaths; They were not prevailed on, but one Mr. Clement Cook amongst other Invectives, said, It was better to dye by a foreign Enemy, than to be destroyed at home.

This high temper of the Commons House was a Subject of much discourse at this time; it was said, The Parliament is a very excellent constitution, but is not without its inconveniences, as all others are; and amongst these, the great licence of Speech in the House of Commons is not the least; for though it be even necessary, that they should not be debarred of Liberty, yet that in the intention seems not to be boundless; for at all times the Zeal for Reformation of abuses in that House, being very great, those amongst them that have a facility of Eloquent Speaking, may do great hurt, if they be not well inclin'd to the Government. But, those that thought the Court, by long plenty and ease, somewhat too exorbitant, believ'd this freedom of Speech very necessary.

And at this time whether it were out of a general Envy against the Duke, because of his sudden exaltation to Greatness, or a particular disgust of some that thought they merited (as well as he) a greater share than they had in the Kings favour; the Tide against him in both the Houses (but especially in the House of Commons) ran so high, that nothing would be granted to the King at a lower rate than his ruine. In the mean time the King manifested a great displeasure at those proceedings, and sent Sir Richard Weston to demand satisfaction; in which they not answering his expectation by so sudden an inquisition as he required, he called the Lords and them together, and by the Lord Keeper Coventry (who lately had the Seal given to him, upon the disgrace of Williams Bishop of Lincoln who was displaced) he acquainted them with his mind.

MY Lords, and you the Knights, Citizens and Burgeses of the House of Commons, His Majesties Command hath summoned you hither, and the same Command hath put me upon the service of signifying his Will to you. His Will was, That both Houses should be called together; You, my Lords, as Witnesses of the Justice of his resolutions, and of his Addresses to the House of Commons. His Majesty would have you know, there never was King, who better loved his People, or was more sincerely affected towards the right use of Parliaments, or more ready to redress what shall be represented to him, in the quality of Grievances (provided it be in a regular and decent way,) than Himself: but he would also have you know, That, as He loves His People, so he regards his Honour; and if he be sensible of his Subjects Grievances, of his own he is much more, especially when they flow from offences of such a nature, as not only blast his Reputation, but impede the progress of his Weighty Affairs.

Lord Keepers Speech.

To come to Particulars, His Majesty saith, That whereas Doctor Turner, and Mr. Cook spake very SEDITIOUS WORDS in your House, they were so far from being 1625. questioned or censur'd for them by you, that others were animated to the like rudeness by their impunit. And though Dr. Turners Articles were pretended against the Duke, it was in truth a libelling his Majesties Government. And when his Majesty did not only by Sir Richard Weston, but in his own person declare his just displeasure, and demanded Justice against those Exorbitants, yet have you not only halled in your obedience to him, but have followed the very steps of this Doctor, and upon false-bottom'd suggestions endeavoured to stain his own and his Fathers honour.

He also complaineth, that you have taken upon you to search his Signet Office, and to examine the Letters of his Secretary of State, leaving him nothing free from their Discovery: a thing not formerly practised.

As concerning the Duke, whom you seem to persecute with such asperity of disgust, I am also commanded to tell you, That his Majesty knows (none better) he acted nothing of publick Employment, without his special Warrant, that he hath discharged his Trust with abundance of both Care and Fidelity; That he merited that Trust, both from his now Majesty and his late Father, by his personal hazard both at home and abroad, and that since his return from Spain, he hath been sedulous in promoting the Service and Contentment of your House. It is therefore his express Command, that you absolutely desist from such un-Parliamentary disquisitions, and resign the Reformation of what is amiss to his Majesties Care, Wisdom, and Justice.

I am also to speak about the business of supply, you have been made acquainted with the posture of his Majesties Affairs, both forrain and domestique, and with his necessitous condition; the charge of all Martial preparations both by Sea and Land, hath been calculated to you, and you promised a supply both speedy and suitable to his occasions, but his Majesty complaineth, that as yet you have not performed either, failing both in the measure, and in the manner. In the measure, by granting only Three Subsidies, and three fifteens, a proportion vastly short of what is requisite. In the manner, being both dilatory, and dishonourable to the King, as arguing a distrust of him; for you have order'd a Bill not to be brought into the House, until your grievances be both heard and answered: which is such a tacite condition, as his Majesty will not admit of.

Therefore his Majesty commands you, to take it into your speedy consideration, and to return your final answer by Saturday next, what further addition you will make; and if your Supplies commensurate and equal the demands of the cause, he promiseth to continue this Sessions to your just content; else he must, and will entertain thoughts of your dismissal.

Lastly, I am commanded to tell you, That his Majesty doth not charge the distempers upon the whole Body, and Assembly of the House; but as he is confident, the greater Number are Persons of a quiet dispose, so he hopeth their influence, and this his Majesties Admonition, will prevent the like for the time to come.

This Speech caused great emotion in the House of Commons, and produced a Remonstrance, to this effect; (viz.)

That with extreme joy and comfort they acknowledge the Favour of his Majesties most gracious expression of Affection to his People, and this present Parliament. That concerning Mr. Cook, true it is, he let fall some few words, that might admit an ill construction, and that the House was displeased therewith, as they declared by a general Check at the very time he spoke them; and though Mr. Cooks explanation of his mind more clearly, did somewhat abate the offence of the House, yet were they resolved to take it into further consideration, and so have done, the effect whereof had appear'd ere this, had they not been interrupted by this his Majesties Message; and the like interruption befel them also in the business of Doctor Turner.

A Remonstrance.

As concerning the examination of the Letters of his Secretary of State, as also of his Majesties own, and searching the Signet Office, and other Records; they had done nothing therein, nor warranted by the precedents of former Parliaments upon the like occasions.

That concerning the Duke, they did humbly beseech his Majesty to be informed, That it hath been the constant and undoubted usage of Parliaments, to question, and complain of any person of what degree soever; and what they should do in relation to him, they little doubted but it should redound to the Honour of the Crown, and safety of the Kingdom.

Lastly, as to the matter of Supply: That if addition may be made of other things, importing his Service then in consultation amongst them, they were resolved so to supply him, as might evidence the truth of their intentions, and make him safe at home, and formidable abroad.

To this the King answered briefly, That he would have them in the first place consult about matters of the greatest importance, and that they should have time enough for other matters afterward. But this staid not their progress against the Duke, to which the Earl of Bristol also contributed in the Lords House.

The Kings Answer.

This Earl had been secluded from the presence of both King James, and King Charles, ever since his return from his Embassy in Spain; and taking advantage of the time, he petitioned the Peers; That whereas being a Peer of the Realm, he had not received a Writ of Summons to the Parliament, he prayed he might enjoy the Liberty of a Subject, and the Benefit of Peerage, after two years restraint, without being brought to Tryal; and if any charge were brought in against him, he might be tryed in Parliament. Upon the reading this Petition, the Lords referred it to their Committees of Privilege; from whence, after due considerations thereof, a Report was made to the House by the Earl of Hertford.

That it was the Opinion of the Committees, That his Majesty should be moved to grant a Writ of Summons to the Earl, which was agreed to by the House. And upon Request made to the King, a Writ was issued accordingly, but accompanied with a Letter from the Lord Keeper to him, That though his Majesty had given way to the awarding of the Writ, yet notwithstanding his pleasure was, that his Lordship should continue still under the same restraint, as he did before, and that his personal attendance was to be forborn.

The Earl sends this Letter to the House of Lords, and a Second Petition with it, offering to them, how much this might trench upon the Liberty and Safety of the Peers, to be in this sort discharged by a Letter missive of any Subject, without the Kings hand, beseeching them he might be heard, both as to his wrongful Restraint, and what he hath to say against the Duke.

Earl of Bristol summoned to the Lords Bar as a Delinquent.

This alarm'd the Duke to begin first with him, and by his perswasion the King commands the Attorney General to summon the Earl to the Lords Bar as a Delinquent.

Bristol appearing May the first, the Attorney acquainted the Peers, that he came to accuse him of high Treason, and exhibited Eleven Articles against him. But before they were read, the Earl said, My Lords, I am a Free-man, and a Peer of the Realm unattainted, I have somewhat to say of high Consequence to his Majesties Service, and I beseech your Lordships give me leave to speak.

Earl of Bristol accuses the Duke of Buckingham of high Treason.

The Lords upon this, bid him go on. Then said he, I accuse that man the Duke of Buckingham of high Treason; And immediately he presented 12 Articles against him.

The House after having read these Articles, committed the Earl of Bristol to the Custody of the Usher of the Black-Rod, and order'd that the Kings Charge against the Earl should be first proceeded on, before that of the Earl against the Duke; which the King took very well.

The Articles on both sides concurred in one design, which was to render each other suspected in matters of Loyalty and Religion; though by so doing they made good sport to their enemies, and the World besides, but in neither of them was any fact that amounted to Treason; and because no proceeding was made on them, it is not very requisite to describe them at large. But there being an endeavour to take the Earls cause out of the House of Lords, and to proceed by way of Indictment thereon in the Kings Bench, the Lords resented this, and gave five Reasons why they could not give way to that manner of proceedings; which were these following, (viz.)

The Lords Reasons why the Earl of Bristols cause should not be taken out of their House.

1. He could have no Counsel.
2. He could use no Witness against the King.
3. He could not know what the evidence against him would be in a convenient time, to prepare for his defence.
4. The liberties of the House would thereby be infringed.
5. This Earl being indicted, it would not be in their Power to keep him from arraignment, and so he might be disabled to make good his Charge against the Duke; and therefore it was judg'd the most proper, and most legal way of proceeding; First to have the Charge delivered into the House of Peers in writing, and the Earl to set down his answer to it in Writing, and that the Witnesses might be examined, and Evidences on both sides heard; and if upon full hearing, the House should find it to be Treason, then to proceed by way of Indictment; if doubtful in point of Law, to have the Opinion of the Judges to clear it; if doubtful in matter of fact, then to refer it to Regall fait.

The Commons to load heavier upon the Duke, did also, about this time, send up some of their Members, (viz.) Sir Dudley Diggs, Sir John Elyot, Mr. Selden, Mr. Glanvil, Mr. Pym, Mr. Wansfort, Mr. Herbert, and Mr. Sherland, with thirteen Articles of high Offences and Misdemeanors against him, containing several Encroachments on the Royal Favour, and some miscarriages, which at another time, and in another man might have been connived at. Nevertheless he put in his answer to them, which was inlayed with so much modesty and humility, that many who expected a more disdainful defence, were converted to a good opinion of him, and in regard there was nothing considerable in them, but what was acted and happened in the time of King James, and not legally cognoscible at this time, he claimed the benefit of Pardon in the 21 of King James, and the present Kings Coronation Pardon. But this being contrary to the expectation of the Commons, upon the 14 of June they had drawn up a Declaration of the same mould of their Impeachment, which was not without difficulty preferred before a Bill of Subsidy, then ready to be read; At which the King was so dissatisfied, that the next day, by a Commission under the great Seal, directed to certain Lords, He dissolved the Parliament. No sooner was he freed from this, but the necessity of his Affairs involved him in another Imbroyment. The French Priests and Domesticks of that Nation, which came into England with the Queen, were grown so insolent, and put so many affronts upon the King, that he was forced to send them home; in which he did no more than what the French King had done before him, in sending back all the Spanish Courtiers, which his Queen brought with her. But that King not looking on his own Example, and knowing on what ill terms the King stood, both at home and abroad, first seized on all the Merchants Ships, which lay on the River of Burdeaux, and then the Peace lately patcht up, was turned into an open War, so that the King was fain to make use of those Forces against the French, which were designed to have been used against the Spaniard, and comply with the desires of the Rochellers, who humbly sued to him at this time for his protection and defence. But the Fleet, which he designed for their assistance, not going out till after Michaelmas, found greater opposition at the Sea, than they feared from the Land, being encountered with strong Tempests, and thereby necessitated to return, without doing any thing, but only shewing the Kings good will, and readiness to help them.

The Commons prepare a Declaration of the matter of their impeachment against the Duke.

The Fleet designed to relieve Rochel, is distressed by Tempest.

Whilest this dispute betwixt the two Kings continued, very sad News came hither from Germany, That the King of Denmark, who had armed (as was before mentioned) on behalf of the Elector Palatine, and the Protestant Princes of Germany, 1626. Germany, notwithstanding the late Aid sent from England, of Six thousand men, under the Conduct of Sir Charles Morgan, had on the seventeenth of August received a total overthrow by Tilly, and was reduced to such distress, that if present Succour came not, he was ruined for ever; That the Sound was like to be lost, the English Garrison at Stoad, straitly besieged, and our East-Land Trade and Staple at Hambrough almost given up for gone.

The King was much perplexed at this, and the more because of his inability in the condition he was to send further Succours to him.

That which chiefly was wanting, was Treasure, and the present use of it could not admit of so much delay, as to call a Parliament, which is the ordinary means of supply. The King was therefore in this strait advised by his Council, That forasmuch as the Commons in Parliament, at their late sitting, had passed a Bill of Subsidies, and that the Parliament was dissolved before the Bill passed into an Act, he might require these Subsidies of the Subject, which the House of Commons, in their names, had assented to, and yet not by the name of Subsidies, but in the way of Loan, till the next Parliament should enable him to make payment of it, or to confirm the levying thereof, by a subsequent Act. In pursuance of this advice, Commissions were issued out under the Great Seal to divers Commissioners in all parts, for the levying these moneys, who had the Instructions following, to direct them in the execution thereof.

A Commission is passed for a Loan.

Instructions to the Commissioners.

1. That for a good example to others, they should themselves lend His Majesty the several Sums required.

2. To go according to the Rates at which people were assessed in the Book of the last Subsidy.

3. To stir up every man to a cheerful lending, by declaring the unavoidable necessity of taking this course, and using other the most prevalent Arguments they could devise; as the honour of the Nation, the defence of true Religion, the Safety of Prince and People.

4. That they appoint the dayes of Payment to be within fourteen dayes.

5. That they treat with every one apart, and not in the hearing of others.

6. That they begin with such as are like to shew best examples.

7. That they endeavour to discover, whether any by under-hand persuasions, or otherwise, go about to hinder the good intentions of others, and if any such be found, to certify their names, qualities, and habitations to the Council.

8. That they signify His Majesties pleasure to remit, upon the lending of these Sums, whatsoever hath been desired upon the late Benevolence, or Privy Seals.

9. That they admit of no suit to be made, or reasons to be given, for the abating of any sum.

10. That upon their Faith, and Allegiance to his Majesty they keep these Instructions secret to themselves, and not discover them to any others.

And besides these private Instructions, they were to represent to the people the deplorable estate of Rochel, then closely besieged by the Duke of Guise; which, if not speedily relieved, would fall into the hands of the Enemies of the Protestant Religion. But though these Commissioners brought in good sums of money, yet many, and some of good quality refused, and were therefore committed to several prisons.

This Year died two of the most eminent Men for Learning, that ever the Nation had, Doctor Andrews Bishop of Winchester, and Sir Francis Bacon, Viscount St. Albans.

1627. It was now the Third year of His Majesties Reign, when Rhee Action was agreed on: and though money came not so plentiful as was hoped, yet the Duke of Buckingham High Admiral of England, desirous to wipe away the imputation of Negligence, in relation to his Admirallship, had, with much ado, compleated his Naval Forces, consisting of Six thousand Horse and Foot in Ten Ships-Royal, and Ninety Merchant-men; with which he sets Sail from Portsmouth the 27th of June, and published his Manifesto the Twenty first of July following, declaring at large the Kings Affection to the Reformed Churches in France, and his displeasure at the last misemploying of his Ships against the Rochellers. The first design of this Fleet was intended against Fort Lewis, wherein being prevented by the Duke of Angoulesme, they resolved upon the Isle of Rhee; Twelve Ships therefore were sent to guard the entry of Port Breton, the rest sailed on to a Fort of the Isle of Rhee, called De la Price, making their approaches with their Canon so near, that Monsieur Toiras, Governour of the Citadel of St. Martin, perceiving their intention, sent out his Forces, to the number of one thousand, in seven partitions, Horse and Foot, to impede their coming on shore: These were encountered by Twelve hundred English, whom Sir John Burrough, Sir Alexander Brett, Sir Edward Conway, and Sir Charles Rich, had landed by the advantage of their great Ordnance. The fight was sharp and quick, wherein many brave Gentlemen lost their lives on both sides; of the French, Monsieur Restringler, Brother to Toiras, Chascalois, Canfes, Naval, Tatlian, Mountain, Heasteby, Boisoncer, and Candamine. Of the English, Sir Thomas York, Sir William Hegden, Sir Thomas Thornay, Sir George Blundel, Courtney, Glin, Whaley, Powel, Woodhouse, Goring, &c. and a Kinsman of Sir George Blundels, with Monsieur de Blancart, Agent for the Duke of Roan, and the Protestants. And of the wounded were, Rich, Conway, Hawle, Greenville, Abraham Rainford, Wellome, Thorp, Maryles, and Bennet: The Victory uncertain. The English General removed his Camp, and intrenching, dispatched Soubize, and Sir William Beecher to Rochel, who returned with five hundred Foot, and found the Duke before Saint Martins Castle (the chief strength of the Island) notwithstanding the dissuasion of his Council, who advised him first to attempt the other Castle, called the Mede, which they might in all likelihood have carried, and would have proved an handsome, and safe place of retreat in their future necessity. Buckingham falls to Circumvallation, ordering the Ships to encompass the Island without, to hinder all provision and supply from Toiras; by which means the besieged were for the space of two months greatly distressed, in which time there hapned a hot conflict between both Parties, and that with equal success; and by a Letter of Toiras to Monsieur Bellamount, their their extremity appeared to be such, that (as he there said) the Mills could not long stand, all their Corn was spent, which enforced their Souldiers to feed on their Store of Bisket, not lasting above ten days: hereupon the Duke of Buckingham summons Toiras, who refusing to falsifie his Trust, the English now strengthened with fresh Auxiliaries from England and Ireland, under the Command of Sir Ralph Bingham, and Sir Pierce Crosby, set themselves to invent new sorts of Engines to batter the Citadel; all which were rendred fruitless by Wind and Waves. And one Abbot Marscilane procured Monsieur Valin to undertake the conveying of twelve Pinaces laden with provision, to the relief of Toiras and his Souldiers, which he prosperously achieved, and at his return carried back with him their sick and wounded.

In the mean time scarcity afflicts the English Camp, and Sir John Burroughs viewing the Works, was shot through, whereof he shortly died. The French King came from Court to the Camp, and thrice in ten days attempted to send over some Aids to the Castle, but the English Ships repelled them, and three days after another Brother of Toiras was slain, and his Squadron put to flight. And now the Souldiers of the Castle were reduced to greater hardship than before, not being furnished with Bread for above four days; whereupon having no other way left, Toiras resolved to win time by treating with the Duke of Buckingham about surrender, hoping in the interim to have some better news from his Associates, which accordingly fell out; for Monsieur Manpaile, who with other Pilots, heretofore had sounded the Shelves, and designed the Station for some Ships, for the relief of the Island, contrived a way to bring them, in despite of the English: It was now the Winter, and the nights long & dark, by which advantage he had opportunity to pass by them with a Fleet of 35 Sail, 150 Mariners, 300 Souldiers, 160 of the Chief Nobility, and many Noble Commanders, with great store of all sorts of Provision, having before sent some dissembling Renegado's, to tell the English that he passed a contrary way: so that when the Duke of Buckingham expected a surrender, they boldly shewed him their Rundlets of Wine, and Turkies and Capons upon the points of their Pikes and Spears.

The Duke hereat dismayed, spends the night in Council, and determines with all speed to raise the siege, and be gone; but the Rochellers intreaties, and Dolbiers arrival from England, with assurance of Auxiliaries, unhappily prevailed with him for a longer stay, during which, the fame of fresh Supplies to the besiegers published over all France, to be coming, under the Command of the Earl of Holland, hastned the French to send forth another Fleet, consisting of fifteen good Ships, and other smaller Boats, part to St. Martins, and the rest to the Meadow Castle, besides seven others which got to the Meadow Fort under Bellamouns command. And now the French King resolved to dislodge the English, and dispatched over for the Service, an Army of four thousand Foot; and two hundred Horse, besides Volunteers, under the Command of the Marshal of Schomberg, with Marylane his Lieutenant General, to whom came all the besieged, and greatest part of the Islanders, being in all above eleven thousand men; after which another party under the Command of Bassompierre and Halliere, consisting of eight hundred of their Kings Life-guard, an hundred and fifty of the Country thereabout, 30 of the Kings Horse, and 3 great Brass Pieces, landed at the Meadow Castle. Against these last, the Duke of Buckingham marched with 500 Foot, and 40 Horse, and forced them to retreat to the Castle, but returning to his Camp, he finds the Trenches possessed by another party of the French Army; Stanley is ordered to beat them out again, which he doth by main force, though not without loss; and the Lord Montjoy seized a small Troop of French: him they endavoured to surprize with six Horse in shew; whom he chased so far, that he had almost come in danger of their Ambuscade. One dark night a party of the English fell upon a party of the French, and not well discovering one another, so mingled, that by mistake, the English falling into the French Camp, became a prey to them.

Nor did War only afflict the English, but also Sickness and Want, whereby their Souldiers and Seamen were generally enfeebled, which put the Duke upon his final resolution of taking his farewell of the Island, with one more Assault to Saint Martins Castle. Toiras had intelligence of it, & therefore he managed his business accordingly, and gave them so hot a welcome, as, being oppressed and fell'd to the ground with shot, they dropt in heaps: so that after a great loss received, the Duke commanded a retreat to be sounded, and soon after demolished his Works, filled his Ditches, and levelled his Trenches, in order to his departure. Schomberg and Marylane pursued, hollowing to them in a Bravado, and brandishing their Swords. The English thinking the Enemy would then have charged them, drew up in Battalia; but they knowing what advantage the way would shortly give them, made a halt, whereupon the Duke marched on in Military Order, until he came to the Village Curda, where they made another stand, and by an Ambuscade of Musqueteers placed behind the old Walls, Walks, Hedges, and Ditches, compelled the French to retreat; but the whole Army coming up, followed them slowly for 3 miles, till they came to Anserine Causeway, which was so narrow, that they could only march six abreast, with Ditches on either side, mostly ending in Saltpits: and now Schomberg espying his expected opportunity, poured forth a great volley of shot against them, and then the English began to march as fast as possibly; but the Lord Montjoy's Troops unable to endure the charge of the French Horse, turned tail, and riding in amongst the other Ranks, put them into such a disorder, as inabled the French easily to break in upon them and rout them, with no small slaughter, overthrowing some into the Ditches and Saltpits, and piercing others as they lay in the dirt. Nor was flight any whit more auspicious to them, for those who confusedly ran away, and casting away their Arms, leaped into the Water, were also cut off. Cunninghams Horse fought it out nobly unto the last man. The Lord Montjoy was taken Prisoner, and civilly used. Some Reformadoes, by uneven, and turning paths, made their way to the further bridge, with much danger, there joyning with Conway, Crosby, Fryar, and Hackvil, and their forces, they made good that Pass by the repulse of the enemy, and leaving a guard of Musqueteers there all day, set the Bridge on fire, and lodged that night stragglingly up and down. The next day the Duke demanded and obtained the dead bodys, and went on board. Great was this days loss, viz. about fifty officers, among whom were Sir William Cunningham, Sir Charles Rich, and Sr. Alexander Brett, and near two thousand common Souldiers were slain, thirty prisoners of note, and forty four Colours were taken: of the French not above three hundred were lost. The Duke hoised Sail, and met the Earl of Holland, with his unseasonable Recruits, near the Western Coast of England; and at his return finding a favourable reception at the Kings hands he laid the loss of the design upon the Earls not timely seconding the Expedition. But at Sea things went somewhat better, where Captain Treitor, in his return from Hambrough, seized by command a great French ship at the Texel in Holland, named the Saint Esprit, with twenty brass Culverines, two brass Semi-culverins, two other brass Guns, sixteen large Iron Guns & two lesser, & in the hold for ballast twelve great Guns, and Arms for eleven hundred Souldiers, and eighteen Barrels of Powder. And Sir John Pennington, Vice-Admirall, took thirty four of their rich merchant men, homewards bound, all which were safely brought into England, to sweeten though not countervail the loss received at Rochell. The ill Success of this Enterprize did much incense the People against the Duke of Buckingham, but the King did not discover any discontent towards him; only he told him, that Sr. Sackville Crow had written to him of a far greater loss, than he acknowledged. During this expedition, Abbot, Arch-bishop of Canterbury, by letters Patents of the 9th of October was suspended from all his Metropolitan Jurisdiction, and confined to his House at Ford in Kent, and the exercise thereof was committed to the Bishops of London, Durham, Rochester, Oxford, and Bath and Wells, or to any four, three, or two, of them. The occasion of this Commission was not discover'd otherwise than by what was express'd in the Commission it self, (viz.) That the said Arch-bishop could not at that present, in his own person attend those Services, which were otherwise proper for his cognisance and Jurisdiction, and which as Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, he might and ought in his own person have performed, and executed. But the true reason was, for that the King was perswaded, the Non-conformists to the Discipline of the Church, too much increased by the remissness of his Government.

The Arch-Bishop of Canterbury is suspended and confined to his house.

This Michaelmas Terme there was a grand debate in the Kings-Bench, concerning some of those imprison'd, for refusing the Loan, who moved for an Habeas Corpus, and had it. The Attorney Generall, Sir Robert Heath, upon their appearance alledged, they were not baileable, and their Counsell the contrary, and the Court agreed with the Attorney, so that they were continued in Prison, till an order pass'd in Council, for a general release, which was shortly after.

The French King, encouraged by the Success he had against our forces, resolv'd upon a more formidable siege against Rochell, and having made a Line about it on the Lands-side, with three forts, by the advice of Cardinal Richieu, and the loan of many Merchants ships, belonging to the Subjects of the United Netherlands, he attempted a Baracade, fourteen hundred yards in length, cross the Channel, to hinder all relief by Sea; whereby the Rochellers expected nothing but ruine, unless they could prevent it, so that they with great haste sent Monsieur Soubize and their Deputies to England, to sollicite the King for Supplys, before the work should be compleated; who was so affected with their miseries, that he promised them all the assistance he could; and to enable him thereunto he borrowed an hundred and twenty thousand Pound of the City of London, for which and other Debts, they had lands, to the value of one and twenty thousand Pounds a year assured to them. He also borrowed of the East-India Company thirty thousand pounds, and what money else he could get by privy Seals. Moreover it was resolved to levy money by Excise, and a Commission, under the great Seal, was pass'd on the third of February to authorize it, but the execution thereof was suspended by the King, who never was guilty of any irregular action, by the impulse of his own nature, nor perswaded by others but by extreame necessity, & at this time, in compliance with his own good inclinations, he chose rather to call a Parliament, which was summon'd to meet on the 17th of March, than proceed in extraordinary ways, for he was much troubled at the general discontent of the People; and he hoped by their counsels to beget a good understanding betwixt himself and them.

On the 17th of March, the Parliament assembled at Westminster, and the King having sent for the Commons to the Lords-house expressed himself in these words to both Houses.

My Lords and Gentlemen,
These times are for action, for action, I say, not for words; therefore I shall use but a few; and (as Kings are said to be exemplary to their Subjects, so) I wish you would imitate me in this, and use as few, falling upon speedy consultation. No man is, I conceive, such a stranger to the common necessity, as to expostulate the cause of this meeting, and not to think supply to be the end of it; and as this necessity is the product and consequent of your advice, so the true Religion, the Laws and Liberties of this State, and just defence of your Friends and Allies, being so considerably concern'd, will be, I hope, arguments enough to perswade Supply; for if it be (as most true it is) both my duty, and yours, to preserve this Church and Commonwealth, this exigent of time certainly requires it.

The Kings speech to both Houses of Parliament.

In this time of common danger, I have taken the most ancient, speedy, and best way, for supply, by calling you together. If (which God forbid) you do not your duty, in contributing what may answer the quality of my occasions, it shall suffice, I have done mine; In the Conscience where, 1627. whereof I shall rest content, and take some other course, for which God hath empowred me, to save that, which the folly of particular men might hazard to lose.

Take not this as a menace (for I scorn to threaten my inferiours) but as an admonition from him who is tyed, both by nature and duty, to provide for your preservations; and I hope, though I thus speak, your demeanors will be such, as shall oblige me in thankfulness to meet you oftner, than which nothing shall be more pleasing to me. Remembering the distractions of our last meeting, you may suppose I have no confidence of good success at this time; but be assured I shall freely forget and forgive what is past, hoping you will follow that sacred advice, lately inculcated, To maintain the Unity of the Spirit in the bond of Peace.

The Parliament seemed very much affected with what the King said, and the Commons freely voted, to grant him five Subsidies, whereof when Secretary Cook informed the King, he asked him, by how many voices it was carried, who replied by one, at which perceiving the Kings countenance to change; Sir, said he, your Majesty hath the greater cause to rejoyce, for the House was so unanimous therein, as they made but one voice. At which the King was exceedingly pleased, and bid the Secretary tell them he would deny them nothing of their Liberties, which any of his predecessors had granted. But whilest a Bill was in preparation for these Subsidies, they considered of the publick grievances of the Kingdom.

1628. The Kings extraordinary wants put him, as you have heard, upon some unusual courses for levying of Money, not very warrantable by our ancient Laws, and some that were unwilling to countenance such courses, or otherwise disaffected to the Government, upon refusal were imprisoned; and because no legal cause could be assigned for such restraint, the Warrants, whereby they were imprisoned, had no cause specified in them, which was exclaimed against, as not legal, and a great Grievance. There is scarce any thing short of death, more grievous than imprisonment, and though by our Laws no man can be imprisoned without a legal cause expressed; yet those that are in the exercise of power, in tumultuous times, upon extraordinary emergencies, are constrained to pass over those bounds; for no such provision hath yet, or can be made, to exclude all manner of arbitrary exercise of Government; but whoever they be, that exceed in this tender point, it will become their prudence to do it with extraordinary caution.

Upon the return of the Fleet after the late actions at Sea, the Souldiers, for want of pay, were billeted in private houses, which was alledged to be against the Law; and to aggravate this, the rudeness of their persons, and their Countrey (being Scotch and Irish) did much contribute. Nevertheless though their Actions were bad, and their persons worse, the Commons liked not that they should be punished by Law Martiall. For there being a Commission issued to try offences of the Souldiers by Martial Law, they exclaimed at it, and it was urged as a grievance; yet till that time the Kings Prerogative, in making and establishing Martial Laws, was never questioned, though since the Petition of Right, there is doubt of it. Magna Charta and six other Statutes explanatory of it, were express against illegal levies of Money, and imprisonments; and though those Statutes were in force, whether the Parliament thought them antiquated, and therefore less regarded, or for what other reason it is not said, to provide against the Grievances complained, &c. they drew up that memorable Law, called, The Petition of Right, and presented it to the King, to which he gave the Royal Assent in full Parliament, to the very great liking of the people. And it was now thought there was so sweet an Harmony betwixt the King and the Parliament, that nothing could hinder the Nation of as much happiness, as it could be capable of; but this concession inflamed the zeal of many of the House of Commons, to press a little further, and they immediately framed a Remonstrance of several late miscarriages in Government, in the conclusion whereof, they said, The excessive power of the Duke of Buckingham, and the abuse of that power is the principal cause of all the evils and dangers, therein mentioned; and therefore they humbly submit it to his Majesties Wisdom, whether it can be safe for himself, or for his Kingdom, that so great power, both by Sea and Land as rests in him, should be trusted in the hands of any one Subject whatsoever.

1628. Conclusion of the Remonstrance against the Duke of Buckingham.

On the 17 of June, this Remonstrance was presented to the King, with the Bill of Subsidies, in the Banqueting-House at Whitehall, who when he had heard it read, told them he little expected such a Remonstrance, after he had so graciously passed the Petition of Right; and for the Grievances, specified therein, he would consider of them, as they should deserve.

The King had levied the duties of Tonnage and Poundage, ever since the first of his Reign, which the House of Commons alledged he ought not to have done, or at least that they could not now be taken, since the passing of the late Petition of Right; and they prepared a Remonstrance against it; but the King unwilling to hear of any more Remonstrances of such a strain, resolved to frustrate it, by proroguing the Parliament, from the 26 of June, to the 20 of October, and calling both Houses together to that end, he delivered his mind as followeth.

My Lords and Gentlemen,
It may seem strange, that I come so suddenly to end this Session, therefore before I give my assent to the Bills, I will tell you the cause; (though I must avow, I owe an account of my actions to none, but God alone.) It is known to every one, that a while ago, the House of Commons gave me a Remonstrance, how acceptable, every man may judge, and for the merit of it, I will not call that in question, for I am sure, no wise man can justify it. Now since I am certainly informed, that a second Remonstrance is preparing for me, to take away my profit of Tonnage and Poundage (one of the chief maintenances of the Crown) by alledging, that I have given

The Kings Speech.

PPP

1628. given away my Right thereof, by my answer to your Petition.

This is so prejudicial to me, as I am forced to end this Session, some few hours before I meant it; being willing not to receive any more Remonstrances, to which I must give an harsh answer.

And since I see, that even the House of Commons begins already to make false Constructions of what I granted in your Petition, lest it be worse interpreted in the Country, I now make a declaration, concerning the true intent thereof.

The profession of both Houses, in the time of hammering this Petition, was no wayes to trench upon my Prerogative, saying, they had neither intention, nor Power to hurt it.

Therefore it must needs be conceived, that I have granted no new, but only confirmed the ancient Liberties of my Subjects. Yet to shew the clearness of my intentions, that I neither repent nor mean to recede from any thing, that I have promised you, I do here declare, that those things, which have been done, whereby men had cause to suspect the Liberty of the Subject to be trenched upon (which indeed was the true and first ground of the Petition) shall not hereafter be drawn into example for your prejudice; And in time to come (on the word of a King) you shall not have the like cause to complain.

But as for Tonnage and Poundage, it is a thing I cannot want, and was never intended by you to ask, never meant (I am sure) by me to grant. To conclude, I command you all that are here, to take notice of what I have spoken at this time, to be the true intent and meaning of what I granted you in your Petition; but especially you, My Lords the Judges, for to you only under me belongs the interpretation of the Laws, for none of the Houses of Parliament, joynt or separate, (what new doctrine soever may be raised) have any power either to make or declare a Law, without my consent.

The D. of Buckingham slain at Portsmouth.

During this Sessions, the Duke was not discouraged by the former Remonstrance, as to hinder his activity, in preparing a new, for the relief of Rochel, both by Sea and Land; but being ready to set sail, he was suddenly cut off, being slain at Portsmouth, in the 36 year of his age, by the hand of one John Felton, a discontented Officer of the last years Army.

The first News of this fact came to the King (then about four miles distant) at his publick devotion, whose intentions were so steady upon that sacred duty, that he received it without the least emotion of Spirit, or discomposure of Countenance. He sent Dr. Hutchinson (one of his Chaplains in ordinary, and then in the course of his attendance) to try, if he could learn out of him, by what inducement he committed that horrible murder; who told him, his only motive was, That the Duke had been declared an enemy to the Commonwealth in the late Remonstrance, tendred to the King by the Parliament, and afterwards said the same again, and again, both at the time of his examination before the Lords of the Council, and at his execution. Nevertheless, when he was made sensible of the foulness of the Act, he manifested great sorrow and contrition for it. But that, which excited this miserable man to so great a mischief, had likewise influenced the people in general, who rejoiced at his death, as one of the greatest enemies of their Countrey.

But those that knew him, and observed his actions, deliver him to posterity as one of the most generous and accomplished persons of that time. His outward form was a great masterpiece of Nature, exact in every part, nor was his mind without his ornaments, being of a very affable and courteous disposition, and though advanced to as great dignity as a subject could be capable of, he did not leave those qualities. He was said to be addicted more than was fit, to the love of women, but it is not said, that his passion that way, reached to the ruine, or publick defamation of any particular person, or family. He had less studied books than men, and if he had lived a few more years, to have seen through the temptations of greatness, he might have proved as a great Pillar of this State, as any that went before him. He was very bountiful to his kindred and servants, most of which he advanced to honour and wealth; and to all to whom he professed friendship. He was constant in it, in so much, that there rarely passed a day in Court whilst he was there, wherein he did not some good Office to one or other; and as I have heard from one near him, every morning, before he went to the King, he collected in paper, what publick matters he had to acquaint him with, and the suits he had to make in behalf of those that solicited him. But as he was kind to his friends and dependants, so he was formidable to his enemies, especially to such as deceived him under a guise of friendship. His courage was very great, and did too much transport him; for if he had a little yielded to the times, and withdrawn from those storms, he could neither prevent nor allay, he might perhaps have found a milder fate.

His Character.

His bowels were interr'd in Portsmouth, and his body was brought to York-house, from whence after some time it was entomb'd at Westminster in St. Edwards Chapel, and a stately Monument was erected over it by his Executors. And Felton being arraigned, and found guilty at the Kings bench-bar at Westminster, was hanged at Tyburn, and afterwards his body was sent to Portsmouth, where without the Town it was hanged in chains, till it was consumed.

The Dukes body entomb'd at Westminster at St. Edwards Chapel.

The sad accident of the Dukes death made little or no stop in the proceedings of the Fleet, which at the last set forward under the Earl of Lyndsey; but before he could get to Rochel, the Haven was so barr'd, that it was impossible for his ships to force their way (though it was gallantly often attempted) so that the Rochellers seeing this hope to fail, sent out some of the principal of the Town, to make their submission to the King, and set open the gates, to receive him.

The time now drawing near for the meeting of the Parliament, the King for many weighty reasons, put off their Assembling to the twentieth of January, and in the meantime Archbishop 1628. Abbot was admitted to kiss his hands, and commanded not to fail of his attendance at the Council Table : which was done at this conjuncture, to moderate the heats of certain Ecclesiasticks ; who made great disturbance in the Church, by some Scholastical controversies, in the points of Predestination, grace and perseverance. Both parties were abetted by several Bishops, and each of them would pretend the opinions they held, to be the Doctrine of the Church, when in truth they were but the opinions of private men ( for nothing can be called the Doctrine of the Church, that is not so declar'd by the whole Clergy, lawfully assembled in Convocation ) These were distinguished by the names of Calvinists and Arminians. The first countenanced by the Commons in Parliament, and some few of the Bishops ; the latter justified by most of the Bishops, and not discountenanced by the King. The first of these were likewise somewhat remiss in exacting a rigid conformity to the Ceremonies ; the latter perhaps more earnest than was needful therein at this time, but withal they were great Assertors of the Prerogative Royal. The King was very intent for the Peace of the whole, and caused the Nine and thirty Articles of the Church to be published, with a Declaration to restrain all disputes, in the points controverted ; and now also a book, writ by one Montague ( in King James his time ) of these Controversies, called Appello Cæsarem, was called in, and Dr. Potter a Calvinist, is made Bishop of Carlisle ; but these Acts did not mollifie the minds of those, for whom they were intended, for a while after (viz) the 20th of January the Parliament Assembled, and the Grand Committees, which are usually the first things settled at the opening of that Assembly, were very busie and Active. That of Religion made great complaints of the invasions upon Religion, which they pretended was much endangered, by the increase of Poperie and Arminianisme, and many instances were made to heighten the apprehensions of the people therein, whilst the House was not less active in their inquisitions into the miscarriages in civil affairs, concerning which diverse Petitions were presented, importing that many Merchants had their goods seized, and informations preferr'd against them in the Star-Chamber, for refusing to pay the custom of Tonnage and Poundage against the tenour of the Petition of Right ; and one of these Merchants, named Rolls, being a Member of the House of Commons, what was done towards him, was judged a breach of Privilege, for which the Customers were summoned to the House, to answer their misdemeanour therein : The King interposed in this matter, and informed the House, that what they did, was done, as by men addicted to his command, adding, he did not commissionate them, to take it as of Right belonging to him, but out of a firm presumption, that the House of Commons, suitable to their large professions, would grant it him by Bill, which he desired they would dispatch to put an end to the dispute. This gave no satisfaction, but debates in the House ran very high, and they resolved to proceed to a Remonstrance against the levying the Subsidies of Tonnage and Poundage, not being granted by Act of Parliament.

Abbot

The Protestation of the Commons:

1. Whosoever shall bring in an Innovation of Religion, or by favour seek to introduce Popery, or Arminianisme, or other opinions, disagreeing from the true and Orthodox Church, shall be reputed a Capital enemy to the Kingdom and Commonwealth.
2. Whosoever shall counsel, or advise the taking or levying of the Subsidies of Tonnage and Poundage, not being granted by Parliament, or shall be an Actor or Instrument therein, shall be likewise reputed a Capital enemy to this Commonwealth.
3. If any man shall voluntarily yield or pay the said Subsidies of Tonnage or Poundage, not being granted by Parliament, he shall be reputed a Betrayer of the Liberties of England, and an Enemy to this Commonwealth.

Two daies after a Proclamation was issued to declare the Parliament dissolved, though the dissolution was not formally executed, till the tenth of March, at which time the King came to the Lords-House, and being set on his Throne, with his Crown on his Head, and in his Robes, and the Lords in their Robes also, he bespoke them thus :

My Lords,

I Never came here upon so unpleasant an occasion, it being the dissolution of a Parliament : therefore men may have some cause to wonder, why I should not rather chuse to do this by Commission, it being a general Maxim of Kings, to leave harsh Commands to their Ministers, themselves only executing pleasing Commands ; yet considering that Justice as well consists in the reward and praise of vertue, as punishing of vice, I thought it necessary to come here to day, to declare to you, and all the world, that it was meerly the undutiful, and seditious Carriage of the Lower-House, that hath made the dissolution of the Parliament. And you My Lords are so far from being causes of it, that I take as much comfort in your dutiful demeanours, as I am justly distasted with their proceed-

1628. dings. Yet to avoid mistakings let me tell you, that it is so far from me, to adjudge all that house guilty, that I know there are as dutiful Subjects, as any in the World; it being but some few Vipers amongst them, that did cast this mist of undutifulness before their eyes; yet to say truth, there was a good number there, that would not be infected by this Contagion, insomuch that some did express their duties in speaking, which was the general fault of the House the last day. To conclude, as these Vipers must look for their reward of Punishment, so you, My Lords, must justly expect from me that favour and protection, that a good King oweth to his loving and dutiful Nobility.

The King was highly provoked, as is evident by this Speech, at the disorder and tumultuous carriage of many of the Members of the Commons-House of Parliament, who strain'd all things beyond their natural length; a little moderation and obsequiousness might have obtain'd of him, whatsoever was desired; and if he had not had better intentions towards his Subjects, than some of those discontented Spirits would have made the world believe he had, the dissolution of this might have been the end of all Parliaments, and we might have been deprived of that Spring, from whence the blessings of Peace, and happiness have formerly been derived on this Church and State. And this there wanted not some, to infuse into him, by the example of the King of France then Reigning. For whereas in an Assembly of the three Estates (which is in the nature of our Parliament) some years before this time, the Commons (being their third Estate) entrenched too busily upon the Liberties of the Clergy, and some Priviledges, which the Nobility enjoyed, by the favour of the former Kings; it gave the King so great offence, that he dissolved them, and their constitution together, and ordained another kind of Assembly in place thereof, which he called L'Assemblee des Notables, That is to say, The Assembly of principal Persons, which are composed of select persons out of all orders of Estates of the Kings nomination, to which is added a Counsellor out of every Court of Parliament in France, and the Acts of this Assembly are no less obliging to the People, than the others were. The King would receive no impressions of this nature, but yet he was very earnest to vindicate his Authority, and Commandment, which in his proclamation, before mentioned, He alledged to have been so contemned, as his Kingly Office could not bear, nor any former age parallel. He had on the fourth of March, six daies before his coming to the Lords (by the advice of the Privy Council, and by their warrant) sent for several Members of the Commons-House to appear the next day at the Council-Table, (viz.) Denzill Hollis, Esquire; Sir John Elliot, Sir Peter Hayman, Sir Miles Hubbart; John Selden, Will. Coriton, Benjamin Valentine, William Stroud, and Walter Long, Esquires, who were the principal authors of the late Disorders, at which time Hollis, Elliot, Coriton, and Valentine appearing, and refusing to answer out of Parliament, what was said and done in Parliament, they were committed to the Tower; The rest not then appear-ring, were afterward apprehended, and committed to several other Prisons.

But lest those distempered Spirits, that had by imprudence caused so much disquiet at Westminster, should to excuse themselves, disperse abroad in their Countries, some of their malignities, to asperse the Government, and alienate the hearts of the good Subjects from the King, he published a Declaration, setting forth his Reasons and Motives for dissolving the Parliament, with brevities of all transactions, in this and the former Session, the heads whereof we think it not improper to insert in this place;

He professed therein, To maintain the true Religion and Doctrine, established in the Church of England, without admitting or conniving at any Back-sliding, either to Popery or Schism, having been ever desirous, to be found worthy of that Title, which he accounted the most glorious in his Crown, DEFENDER OF THE FAITH; nor would he ever give way to the authorising of any thing, whereby any Innovation might creep into the Church, but to preserve that unity of Doctrine and Discipline, established in the time of Queen Elizabeth, wherein the Church had stood, and flourished ever since. He shewed also how careful he had been to command the execution of the Laws against Popish Priests, and Popish Recusants, and if his commands were not duly executed, the fault ought to be laid on the remissness of the Officers and Ministers, to whom it belong'd; for it was his part to direct and order well, but the part of others to perform the ministerial Offices.

The Substance of the King's declaration.

Next to Religion, his care of settling the Right and Liberties of the People, was manifested in his answer to the Petition of Right, which since that time had not been infringed.

Nor was he less careful in the provident ordering of the Supplies, given to him the last Session, wherein no part had been put to any other use than to what it was granted.

But he could not but take notice of some glances in the House, and rumours abroad, as if his answer to the Petition of Right, had not only given away his imposition upon goods exported and imported, but the Tonnage and Poundage also, whereas in the debate thereof there was no mention in either House, concerning those Duties, but concerning Taxes, and other charges within the Land; for though in the matter of Tonnage and Poundage, his necessities pleaded strongly for him, he was resolved to guide himself by the practice of his Noblest Predecessours, and therefore he caused Records to be searched, where it was found, that the Subsidy of Tonnage and Poundage was not granted to King Edward the fourth, till the third year of his Reign, yet he received it the first day of his accession to the Crown, until it was granted by Parliament; and in the succeeding times of Richard the third, King Henry the seventh, King Henry the eighth, King Edward the sixth, Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth, the Subsidy of Tonnage and Poundage was not only enjoyed by every one of those Kings and Queens, from the death of each of them deceasing, until it was granted by 1628. by Parliament unto the Successour; but in all those times, the Parliament did most readily and chearfully, in the beginning of every of those Reigns grant the same, as a thing most necessary for the guarding of the Seas, safety and Defence of the Realm, and supportation of the Royal dignity. And in the time of his Royal Father, of Blessed Memory, he enjoyed the same a full year, wanting very few daies, before his Parliament began; and above a year, before the Act of Parliament, for the grant of it was passed; and yet when the Parliament was Assembled, it was granted without difficulty. And in his own time he quietly received the same three years, and more, expecting with patience in several Parliaments, the grant thereof, as had been made to many of his Predecessours, the House of Commons still professing that multitude of other Businesses, and not want of Willingness on their part had caused the settling thereof to be so long deferred.

And when the grant of an Act came to be treated of, all expressed a great Willingness to grant it, but a new strain was found out to puzzle the business, that it could not be done without peril to the Right of the Subject, unless he would disclaim his Right therein, and put himself out of the possession thereof; whereas it was evident, all the Kings before named did receive that duty, and were in actual possession of it before, and at the very time, when it was granted to them by Parliament. Nevertheless he did declare, That it was his meaning by the gift of the people to enjoy it, and that he did not challenge it of Right, but took it De bene esse, wherein he said he descended, for their satisfaction, far beneath himself, being confident never any of his Predecessours did the like, nor was the like required of them, but yet for all this the Bill was laid aside. Whilst the Duke of Buckingham lived, he was intitled to all the ill events of Parliament, but now he is dead, no alteration was found amongst those envenomed Spirits, which troubled the Harmony betwixt him, and his Subjects, and continue still to trouble it; So that the Duke was not the Mark they shot at; but as a meer Minister of his, taken up in their passage to more secret designs, to cast his affairs into a desperate condition, to abate the Power of the Crown, and to bring the Government into obloquy, that in the end all things might be overwhelmed with Anarchy and confusion. And then concludes, That all wise, and discreet men, might judge of the Rumours and fears maliciously bruited abroad, and discern by examination of their own hearts, whether in respect of the free passage of the Gospel, indifferent and equal Ministration of Justice; Freedom from oppression, and the great peace and quietness which every man enjoyeth under his own Vine, the happiness of this Nation can be parallel'd by any of our Neighbours Countries; and if it cannot be, acknowledge their own Blessedness, and for the same be thankful to God, the Author of all Goodness.

On the seventh of May, the Attorney General preferred an Information in the Star-Chamber, against Sir John Elliot, and the rest of the imprisoned Members, and they issued a Process against them; to answer his allegations in that Court; To which they demurr'd; and the King had several Communications with the Judges about it, but they moved for Writs of Habeas Corpus, and had them granted, but had no returns to them as was desired, till the King had received the Resolution of the Judges in the Matter, which he did the 30th of September, at Hampton-Court; where the King calling them aside (after he had proposed several matters to them, by way of advice, and had heard the answer, which was, That their offences were not capital, and that by the Law they ought to be bailed, giving security for their good behaviour;) he told them, he purposed, to proceed against them, by the Common-Law in the King's Bench, and to decline his proceeding in the Star-Chamber, and was contented they should be bailed, notwithstanding their obstinacy, that they had not given him a Petition to express their sorrow for offending him; adding, that he was pleased with them for dealing plainly with him; or words to that effect.

In pursuance of this advice, as soon as Michaelmas Term began, the Court of Kings-Bench was moved to bail the prisoners; To which the Judges with one voice said, they were content, they should be bailed, but that they ought to find Sureties for their good Behaviour; To which Selden answered (and all the rest agreed to it) that they had Sureties ready for the Bail, but not for the good Behaviour, for that was a point of discretion meerly, and they could not assent to it, without great offence to the Parliament, where the matters surmised were acted. To this the Judges replied to this effect, That the return did not mention anything done in Parliament, and the surety of good Behaviour is a prevention of Damages to the Common-wealth, and an Act of Government and Jurisdiction, and not of Law, and would be no inconvenience to the prisoners for the same Bail should suffice, and all should be written in one piece of Parchment. But they refused, and were remanded, and the same Term an Information was exhibited by the Attorney General in the Kings-Bench, against Elliot, Hollis, and Valentine, for words spoken by them in the fore-going Parliament, said to be false, malicious, & seditious, as well versus Regem, Magnates, Prelatos, Proceres & Justitios suos, quam Magnates, Proceres & Justitios, & reliquos Regis Subditos, & totaliter deprivare & avertere Regimen, & Gubernationem Regni Angliae, tam in Domino Rege, quam in Consiliariis, & Ministris suis, cujuscunque generis, & inducere tumultum & confusionem, in all Estates and partes, & ad intentionem, that all the King's subjects should withdraw their affections from the King.

Then the words were expressed at large, and at the end of the information it was urged, that Sir John Finch the Speaker endeavouring to go out of the Chair according to the King's Command, Information in the Star-Chamber against Mr. Long.

Sentence in the Star-Chamber against Mr. Long.

To this Information, the Gentlemen put in a Plea; Forasmuch as these Offences are supposed to have been done in Parliament, they ought not to be Punished in this Court or any other, unless in Parliament. Upon this the Court gave day to adjoin in demurrer that Term, and on the first day of the next Term the Record to be read, and within a day after argued at the Bar.

Against Mr. Long particularly, an Information was preferred in the Star-Chamber, which was agreed the first day of Hilary Term; It was not for any thing said in Parliament, but to this effect following, (viz.) For that he being high Sheriff of the County of Wilts, had the charge and Custody thereof committed to him, and had taken his Oath according to the Law to abide within his Bailiwick all that time of his Sheriffrick, and his trust and employment requiring his personal attendance therein, did contrary thereunto suffer himself to be chosen a Citizen for the City of Bath, to serve in the last Parliament, and did attend at Westminster in Parliament without his Majesties Licence, He being Sheriff at the time, which was done in contempt of his Majesties pleasure signified to him under his great Seal, when he granted him the Office of Sheriffrick: And after hearing his Counsel upon his demurrer, and plea, and other Arguments and reasons used in that behalf by his Counsel, the whole Court agreed in a sentence against him in these or the like words: For the fore-mentioned offences in breach of his Oath, neglect of his trust, and contempt of his Majesty, it is decreed and adjudged, that he shall be committed to the Tower during his Majesties pleasure, and pay a Fine of two thousand Marks to his Majesty, and make a submission and acknowledgement of his offence in the Court of Star-Chamber, and to his Majesty before his enlargement.

The same Term, the Counsel of Sir John Elliot, and the other Gentlemen (inform'd against in the Kings-Bench) argued also against the information, and the jurisdiction of the Court; but the Judges hearing both parties for and against it, unanimously agreed, That the Court as the Case is, shall have jurisdiction, although these offences were committed in Parliament, and that the imprisoned members ought to answer, and that they were by the Court ruled to plead further; but they not putting in any Plea, the last day of the Term judgement was granted against them upon a Nihil dicit, and they were sentenced by the Court,

The opinion of the Court of King's-Bench.

1. To be imprisoned during the Kings pleasure.
2. None of them to be delivered out of prison until security given in Court for the good behaviour, and submission, and acknowledgement made of the Offence.
3. Sir John Elliot fin'd to pay to the King, two thousand pounds, being the greatest offender;

Mr. Hollis a thousand Marks, and Mr. Valentine five hundred pounds, and in like manner the rest were proceeded against, and several Fines were accordingly imposed upon them, most of which were paid, and the Gentlemen afterwards released from their imprisonments. If any of them did refuse to pay such fines, as were set upon them, they were men either of decayed or of small estates, and so not able to make payment of the fines imposed.

Heylin's observations in his History of the Reign of K. Charles.

Many weighty and learned arguments were made in the Case of these Gentlemen, before the judgement given, both by the Kings learned Counsel and their Counsel also, who objected all that could be thought of in the matter, some of which we shall mention for the better understanding of the matter in Question.

That this was a privilege of Parliament, whereof the Court were not competent Judges. Obj. 1.

To which was answered, in 8 Eliz. it was the opinion of Dyer, Carlin, Welsh, Brown and Southcot, Justices, that Offences committed in Parliament are punishable out of Parliament; and Plowden, in the time of Queen Mary, was fined for words spoken in Parliament against the dignity of the Queen; and in 6 H. 6. a judgement given in a Writ of Annuity in Ireland, the said judgement was reversed in Parliament there. Upon which Writ of Error was brought in this Court, and the judgement reversed. Ans.

This is an inferiour Court to Parliament, and cannot meddle with matter done in it. Obj. 2.

To which was answered, the Court Questions not the judgement of Parliaments, for what is done in Parliament by consent of all the House shall not be questioned elsewhere, but the particular offences criminally committed there, are punishable here; for if particular members of a superiour Court offend, they are punishable in an inferiour. As if a Judge shall commit a Capital offence in this Court, he may be arraigned thereof at Newgate. Ans.

The Parliament Law differs from the Law by which this Court judgeth in sundry Cases, as for instance, by the Statute none ought to be chosen Burgeses for a Town in which he doth not inhabit, but in that the usage of Parliament is contrary. Obj. 3.

The reply to this was, That they are the judges of Acts of Parliament, and if Information be brought upon the said Statute against such a Burgesse, the Statute is a good Warrant for the Court to give judgement against him. Ans.

In the Spring of this year the Queen being affrighted, aborted of a Son, which added something to the King's troubles at home; though abroad matters succeeded well, for the King of France being in a Transalpine expedition at Suza, for the relief of Casall, was so intent on that War, that he was very inclinable to peace with us, and by the intervention of the States of Venice, a Peace was concluded upon the ensuing Articles.

The Queen miscarried of a Son.

The King of France desirous of Peace. The State of Venice mediate the Peace with France.

1. That the two Kings shall accord to renew the former Alliance between the two Crowns, and to preserve it inviolable with free Commerce, and in reference to the said Commerce, liberty is given, that such things be proposed as either part shall judge convenient either to add or diminish.

2 That

2. That considering it is very difficult to make restitution of what hath been taken as Prize, as well on one side, as the other, during the late Wars: It is agreed between the two Crowns, that for what is passed no satisfaction shall be demanded on either side.

3. As to the Articles and contract of marriage of the Queen of Great Britain, they shall be confirmed, and for what concerneth her domesticks, it shall be lawful to propose what shall be thought expedient to be either added or diminished.

4. All former Alliances shall stand good between the two Crowns, saving wherein they shall be changed by this present Treaty.

5. The two Kings being by this present Treaty remitted to the affection they formerly had, shall respectively employ this correspondence toward the assistance of their Allies (so far as the restitution of Affairs, and the general good will permit) for the procuring repose of the troubles of Christendom.

6. The premises being established on both sides, persons of Eminency shall be reciprocally dispatched as Ambassadors on either part for ratification of the accord, and for nomination of Agents ordinarily resident at either Court, for the better preserving this Union.

7. And because many Ships are now at Sea, with letters of Marque, who cannot suddenly take cognisance of this peace; it is agreed, that what shall occur in the name of Hostility for the space of two moneths on either side, shall not prejudice or derogate from this agreement. Provided notwithstanding that what shall be made prize of within the space of two moneths, after signature shall be resolved on either side.

8. Lastly, The two Kings shall respectively sign the present Articles the 14. of this present moneth of April, and at the same time they shall be consigned into the hands of the Lords Ambassadors of Venice, to deliver reciprocally to the two Kings at a day prefixt. And from the day of signing, all Acts of Hostility shall cease, to which end proclamation shall be issued out in both Kingdoms the twentieth day of May.

And for a confirmation of this League, in September following the Marquess of Chateau Neuf, was sent in Embassy from France, and Sir Thomas Edmonds was sent thither from hence.

About the month of July, there hapned a great Fray in Fleet-street, upon the rescue of one Captain Bellingham (an officer in the late expedition to the Isle of Rhee) which was attempted by some students in the Temple, wherein some were hurt and carried to prison. But this drew together many of the Gentlemen to rescue the prisoner who made a Barracade against St. Dunstons Church, and beat back the Sheriffs Officers, and released their friends; of which the Lord Mayor being inform'd, he and the Sheriffs with a band of trained Souldiers came down to keep the Peace, and disperse them; who were now encreased to the number of five hundred, and armed with swords and pistols: The Lord Mayor made Proclamation, That on pain of rebellion they should dissolve themselves, but prevail'd not, he then tryed other means, and the souldiers fired their Muskets on them charg'd with powder only; but the gentlemen provok'd at this, shot bullets, and very fiercely attack'd the Train-bands, kill'd five outright, and wounded near a hundred; yet the City souldiers were so reinforced, that in the end the gentlemen, were subdued, and one Ashurst and Stamford two Captains, with some others were taken and committed. The King was much offended at the uproar, and immediately sent for the Lord Chief Justice, by whose advice a special Commission of Oyer and Terminer was issued out, and about a fortnight after the malefactors were arraigned in the Guild-Hall of London, and Ashurst and Stamford being found guilty of murder, were condemned and executed at Tyburn. Stamford was a relation and servant to the last Duke of Buckingham, and much intercession was made for him: but the King would not pardon him, but said he had murdered a watch-man before, and was pardon'd, and hath now kill'd another, and he would take order he should not kill a third.

In the month of January, Don Carlos de Colomas, sent Ambassador from Spain arrived at London, and had audience six dayes after; his business was to treat of a Peace, betwixt the two Crowns, which was a while after concluded, all things being left on both sides in the same condition in which they were before the War, and the Spaniard did engage that he would make use of all his interest with the Emperour for restoring the Prince Elector Palatine to his lost estate.

This Peace, and that with France brought a great encrease of Trade to us, the Spaniards sent hither yearly in English Bottoms, no less than 600000 Crowns in Bullion, for the use of the Army in the Netherlands, redounding very much to the Kings benefit in the Coinage, and no less to the profit of the Merchants also, most of the money being return'd into Flanders in Leather, Cloth, Lead, Tin, and other the Commodities of this Kingdom. The Dutch, and Easterlings being great Traders, lookt upon London as the safest bank not only to lodge, but increase their treasure; so that in a short time, the greatest part of the Trade of Christendom was driven upon the Thames.

On the tenth of April, this Year William Earl of Pembroke, Lord Steward of the Kings Household died suddenly of an Apoplexy, he was the Son of Henry Earl of Pembroke, Son of William Herbert created Earl of Pembroke, and Lord Herbert of Cardiffe in the fifth year of King Edward the sixth, whose great Grandfather was William Earl of Pembroke taken prisoner in the Battle of Banbury in the year 1467. in the quarrel of the House of Lancaster, and beheaded in the ninth year of King Edward the fourth.

He was a comely Person, of a very generous mind, and one that in all his actions, appeared to be of the true ancient stock of English Nobility; He was competently learned, and a great lover of his Prince and Country without flattery or faction, which made him be ever esteemed by the first, and loved and respected by the later: He married Mary, the eldest Daughter, and Co-heir of Gilbert Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, by whom he had not issue. The King was somewhat touched at the death of so good a Counsellor. But to qualifie that loss, God blest him with

After this joyful Ceremony was performed, the King was intent on the Business of the Prince Elector, and having intelligence of a Dyet to be kept this Summer at Ratisbone, he sent Sir Robert Anstruther, his Ambassadour to the Emperour, taking that opportunity, when the Estates of the Empire were assembled, to treat of his brothers restitution to the Palatinate. Sir Robert went in very noble Equipage, and was very well received, when he came thither, and at his first audience he delivered his Message to this effect.

His Speech to the Emperour.

That nothing did affect his Master, the King of Great Britain, more, than the daily Calamities, undergone by his Brother the Prince Elector, his Wife and Children: that he deem'd no place more convenient, where to treat of their Reconciliation, and re-establishment, than in this Dyet; therefore he made it his most ardent Request to his most Imperial Majesty, that having regard to the many Intercessions of his late Father, and other Kings and Princes, he would remit the displeasure conceived against his Brother, and recall the proscription issued out against him. True it is, his Brother had offended, and was inexcusably guilty (unless the Rashness and precipitation of youth may somewhat plead for him) But others had been as culpable as he, whom yet his Imperial Majesty received into Grace and favour; and would he be pleased to extend to him the same clemency, it would oblige his Master to demonstrations of greatest gratitude, and raise a glorious imitation in others to imitate so Majestick a Pattern. That the Palgrave would entertain this favour with an heart so firmly devoted to his service, as all the intention of his Spirit should be disposed to compensation and reparation of his by-past miscarriages. That his Master held nothing so dear, as the affection of his Imperial Majesty, and establishment of a durable peace between them; and as upon all occasions he hath been forward to represent himself solicitous of it, so at this time he is ready to give more ample testimony, if his Imperial Majesty be pleased to incline to a treaty.

The Emperours Answer.

The Emperour and Estates did not answer the Kings expectation, for besides the Complements which the Ambassadour receiv'd, all the answer to this Business was, That the present affairs of Germany, which call'd them thither, were of that important concernment, as would not admit of any forain debate. But when leisure served, his Master should have such satisfaction, as they hoped would give content. The Emperour was the colder in this matter, because he had some intimation of the Kings Correspondence with the King of Sweden, who was at this time ready to enter into Germany with an Army. And he was not much deceiv'd in his intelligence, for ever since the King of Denmark was by Count Tilly driven out of Germany, The eyes of all this part of the World were upon Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden; as the fittest person, to check the greatness of the House of Austria. Him therefore, two years ago, the King elected into the Noble Order of the Garter, wherewith he was solemnly invested in the midst of his Army, at the Siege of Darsaw, a Town of Pomerella, belonging to the Crown of Poland, and then the grounds were laid, which (being seconded by the French, the States of the United Provinces, and the distressed Princes of the Empire) brought that King into Germany. For which Expedition on the thirteenth of June, he imbarqued himself, and all his Army, in Seventy men of War, and two hundred lesser Barques. He had made great preparations the year before for this design, and had entertain'd many Scottish and English Commanders and Souldiers, lately in the Service of the King of Denmark, (after the Peace at Angle in Holstein, made the year before with that Crown) and had dispatch'd some of them to raise Recruits, to compleat their Regiments in Scotland and England, and likewise he entertained Germans, who had return'd from the Cesarean Army, and from that Army that was sent to assist the King of Poland, under the conduct of Harven, and from those who had been disobliged by Wallestein, the Emperours General; he receiv'd good intelligence of the State of the Empire, and gave them Commissions to raise forces with all speed: So that with some of these and the remainder of the Army, which was brought from the wars of Livonia, he had got together above Twelve thousand horse and foot of old Souldiers; But time was very favourable to the Enterprize, for the Princes of Germany had been much oppress'd by the late Military Government, which Wallesteyne had introduced amongst them. Who had under his command a hundred thousand foot, and 30000 horse of divers Nations, dispersed over all Germany, whereby the Princes of Germany were not treated as free Princes, but Subjects. Whereupon for that the excessive Authority of private men, and over-greatness of Neighbouring Potentates is never lik'd by great ones, The Electors, which pretend to keep the Imperial condition within its limits, could not suffer either the burthen they lay under upon this former occasion, nor that so many Souldiers should be maintain'd in Germany, in the time of Peace, to the peoples so great Grievances, nor that the Throne of Caesar should be raised so high: They therefore privately sought out all opportune means, how they might disarm him, and take from the Empire such a support; To which the Spanish Ministers at Vienna willingly concurr'd, to moderate the greatness of Wallesteyne, and prevailed with the Emperour to the disbanding of the supernumerary Forces, to please the Electors, and to oblige them thereby, to adhere to favour the King of Hungary, at Election of the King of the Romans. Wallestein was hereupon immediately laid aside, which made him exclaim that the Emperour was betray'd; and certainly there was some grounds for it. But if he had been more complacent

pedition in-

1636. complacent in his behaviour, his authority had not been so easily taken away, nor so many of the forces disbanded, which whilst they were kept together made the Emperour so powerful, that the King of Sweden could never have made that impression he did into his Dominions. Wal- lestein thus removed retired into Bohemia, and lived there till he was call'd again to employment.

Thus Germany became weakened, being not only divided by the dissonancy of Religion, but exasperated by the late pressures upon them, whereby the King of Sweden had a very easie entrance into Pomerania, for in a very little time he had taken the Islands of Rugen, and Usedom, and all the forts therein, and Wolgast and the strong Town of Stetin in Pomerania, and restored Bogislaus Duke of Pomerania to his authority.

The news of the Success of the King of Sweden, made our King very willing to send aids to him, and the Marquess of Hamilton had Commissions to levy six thousand men, for the service against the next spring, which were most of them to be of the Scottish Nation: For the encouragement of the Marquess in this expedition, the King gave him the impost of wines in Scotland, which amounted to twenty thousand pounds Sterling a year: but for the raising of those men, and an intended supply of moneys to the King of Sweden greater sums were required. And therefore the King by the advice of his Attorney General and other his Counsel, learned in the Law, was forced to use all ways by the Law allowable to furnish himself.

By the Common Law every man of full age that could dispend a Knights fee, was compellable by the Kings writ to take the Order of Knighthood, or else to make fine for the discharge or respite of the same: but because of the uncertainty of the quantity of lands that made a Knights fee, K. Edw. the second in the first year of his Reign granted a writ in the time of Parliament, and caused it to be there entered of record, (which is therefore stiled by some a statute) wherein no man was thereafter to be distrained for Knighthood, that had not twenty pounds a year in Fee Simple or Fee tail, or for term of life, which Sir Edward Coke explains to be tenant by courtesie; and almost in every Kings Reign till the time of Edward the 4th. men were summon'd by proclamation to take the order of Knighthood, but the value of land was seldom limited so low as twenty pounds a year, for in the 18th. of King Henry the 6th. which perhaps is the last time before this wherein proclamations of this kind were issued, the same was express'd to be 40. l. a year. The King having this warrantable way to supply his necessities, did cause several writs to be issued out of the Chancery for Proclamations to be made in every County, to summon all persons of full age, and not Knights, being seized of lands or rents of the yearly value of 40. l. or more, to appear in the Kings presence at a certain day therein limited, to take upon them the Order of Knighthood, upon return of which writs and transmitting the same with their returns into the Exchequer, and upon other writs for enquiring of the names of such as did not appear, process by Distingas was made against them, and they were fined for the same, which brought a hundred thousand pounds or more into the Exchequer.

But this money would not answer the Kings occasions, wherefore Mr. Walter Montague was sent over to Negotiate the payment of the moiety of the Queens portion (being four hundred Thousand Crowns) behind, and to require satisfaction for such rich Ships, taken from us by the French, since the last peace concluded; and with him Philip Burlamach a Merchant, was sent to receive the money, and make it over by Exchange or otherwise. The French King received the message with kindness enough, but complain'd that one Captain Kirk had two years before, taken the fort of Kelech in Canada, which was in possession of the French, and put an English garrison into it; this after a little consideration was found so equitable, that the King gave order to have the Fort deliver'd, and thereupon his full and just demands were satisfied.

During the sitting of the last Parliament, one Leighton a Scotchman, writ a Book called Zions Plea, which he presented to them; it was of a very fiery nature, exciting the Parliament and people to kill all the Bishops, and to smite them under the fifth Rib, bitterly inveighing against the Queen, calling her a Daughter of Heck, a Canaanite, an Idolatress, for which he was this year sentenc'd in the Star-Chamber, to be whipt and stigmatiz'd, to have his ears cropt, and nose slit, but betwixt the pronouncing and inflicting of this censure, he made his escape into Bedfordshire, but by the diligence of the Warden of the Fleet, he was quickly recover'd, and the punishment to which he was sentenc'd inflicted upon him. The Romish recusants were about this time very active in England, and their Religion begun to encrease by the industry of their Priests, who needed not now to fetch their Ordination from abroad, by reason that the Pope had sent his Doctor Smith, the Titular Bishop of Calcedon to ordain Priests, who took also upon him to approve of such regular Priests as were to be standing Confessors, which the General of the Jesuites thought an usurpation upon his Jurisdiction, and that Order by their insinuation being more powerful in England, prevail'd with many of the most eminent of their Religion, to remonstrate against his authority, asserting all sufficient power in the Regulars to whatever was pretended by the Bishop, and the necessity of having a Bishop in England; The Spanish Ambassador favoured the Jesuites in this contest, to which the Kings Proclamation for the Bishops banishment concurring, he was frighted into France. Nor were this sort of men insolent in England only, but in Ireland also, for at Dublin whilst the Lords Justices were hearing divine service in Christs Church, they had as publick resort to Mass as is sometimes in London, to the houses of Ambassadors of that Religion; which the Lords Justices taking notice of, they sent the Archbishop, the Mayor, Sheriff, and Recorder of the City to apprehend them, which they did, taking away their Crucifixes, Chalices, and Copes, and delivering the Fryers and Priests into the hands of the Pursivants, whom the people threw stones at, and had rescued them, but that a Guard was sent to defend them: nevertheless the Justices were so careful to prevent the like disorders, that most of their houses of Religion were immediately seized into the Kings hands, and such Inquisition after the rest, that two Priests hang'd themselves at the apprehension of this (as they then call'd it) persecution.

The Marquess of Hamilton was at this time under some umbrage at Court, though his power with the King quickly broke through it. The occasion thereof was this; He had sent a creature of his own David Ramsay into Germany, on pretence to notify his coming thither to the King of Sweden, and to inform himself of the condition of the Scots then in that Service, but by what appear'd after, it was suspected he had another intention than the King of Sweden's assistance. There were at this time eight and twenty Colonels of the Scotch nation in the Swedish Service, amongst which, there were four of the name of Hamilton, with whom Ramsay had made a near acquaintance, for he lived at a great expence; he had also endeav'd himself to Colonel Alexander Ramsay Governour of Creutzenach, a person of good esteem and interest both with the Swedes and those of his own nation; Amongst these Officers, there was the Lord of Rhees Mackay, who commanded a Brigade of Scots, a person of great honour and reputation, who having discovered by some expression of Ramsay, that the Marquess had a deeper design than the present expedition to Germany, he insinuated into him to find out the bottom of it, and was told by him in much secrecy, that the Marquess would convert these Forces which he was by the Kings authority to raise in Scotland for foreign Service against England, That their Friends had provided arms and ammunition, and more were expected from Sweden and other parts, and he and Colonel Alexander Hamilton solicited him to be of their party; to this the Lord of Rhees made a cold answer, but thought himself bound in duty to come into England and make it known to the King, which he did the rather because Ramsay was then return'd also; but he upon this accusation denied the whole matter, and the Lord having no proof thereof (as in such secret practices it could hardly be) more than a confident aspersion and the engagement of his honour, the King thought good to refer the controversy to the tryal of the Constable and Marshal with the assistance of other Lords in Commission with them according to the ancient law of the Land; The Earl of Lindsey being made Constable to that end and purpose, many days were spent accordingly in pursuance of it. But when most men expected that the matter would be tryed by Combat, as had been accustomed in such cases, the business was hush'd up at Court, the Lord Rhees dismiss'd to his employment in the war, and the Marquess did not only continue in the Kings great favour, but Ramsay was permitted to hold the place of a Gentleman of the privy chamber which had formerly been procured for him.

On the 25 of April this year, Mervin Touchet Lord Audley was indicted and arraigned of Rape and Sodomy before his Peers in Westminster-Hall, Tho. Lord Coventry Lord-keeper of the great Seal, was for that day constituted Lord High Steward of England, and the Peers joyned with him were; The Earl of Portland Lord Treasurer, The Earl of Manchester Lord Privy Seal, The Earl of Arundel Lord Marshal, and the Earls of Pembroke, Kent, Worcester, Bedford, Essex, Dorset, Salisbury, Leicester, Warwick, Carlisle, Holland, Bark-shire, and Denbigh, The Viscounts Wimbleton, Conway, Dorchester, Wentworth, The Barons Percy, Strange, Clifford, Peters, North, Goring, where divers unnatural and bestial actions being prov'd against him, he had sentence to be hang'd; but by the clemency of the King to him that sentence was chang'd to a beheading, which was executed on him at Tower-Hill on the 14 of May; and in the same Month of May, Sir Giles Allington of Cambridgeshire, married his own Niece the Daughter of one Mr. Dalton, for which he was questioned in the high Commission Court, but he declined the Jurisdiction, and moved the Court of Common Pleas therein, from whence he obtain'd two rules; one requiring the Commissioners to shew cause why a prohibition should not be granted; The other, That if they proceeded further before cause shewn, a prohibition should be awarded; This gave great offence to the Bishop of London, who complain'd to the King thereof, and he by the Lord Keeper signified his displeasure to the Judges for their proceeding herein, whereat they desisted, and the Court consisting of eight Bishops, and four other Commissioners gave the sentence following against him, to be Fined to the King twelve thousand pound; to stand obliged in the penalty of twenty thousand pound, never to cohabit or come near his Niece any more: and to be committed to Prison, or put in sufficient bayl, till both he and his Niece shall have done penance at Pauls-Cross and at great St. Maries at Cambridge at a day appointed by the Court. Never was delinquent censured there, by a more solemn and venerable Consistory: many spake excellent well, but Sir Henry Martyn, whose custom it was before to out-go others, did then surpass himself.

About the midst of July the Marquess of Hamilton arrived in the Oder with six thousand foot, well arraigned and furnished of Artillery for the Service of the King of Sweden, and with three hundred thousand Dollars in money, he himself came to the King at his Leaguer at Werben on the Elbe; The King received him very respectfully, and shewed him all the fortifications, and the preparations he had made against the Count de Tilly, who was marched as far as Wolmestadt towards him; so that he had no leisure to entertain him as he would, but after he had form'd his instructions he was dismiss'd, and his forces were appointed to joyn with General Baviera, he told him he was very sorry his Army arrived in such parts of the Country that were ruined, in that both the Armies had lain there above a year before, but within a while, he said, they shou'd have better quarters, but the men were almost all lost whilst they were there, finding not only famine to consume them, but the Plague also, which did so rage that two hundred a week of them dyed, and they were much weakned, but those that survived did good service, and their coming at this time was great furtherance of the King of Sweden's cause, for thereby a good part of the Enemies forces were for fear of them diverted Sr. Henry Vane sent Ambassador to the King of Sweden.

Our King immediately after the dispatching the Marquess Hamilton, sent Sir Henry Vane his Ambassador to the King of Sweden, who arrived at Wertzburg on the Main, a fortnight after the Battel of Leipsigh, about which time Magdeburgh was block'd up by the Forces under the Command of Marquess Hamilton and General Bannier, who had a little before took in the Town of Vausleber in Pomerania. The Embassadour after some refreshment, went to the King of Sweden at Frankford on the Main which had open'd his Gates to him; on the 17 of November, hither also came the Marquess of Hamilton with a very Magnificent Train, and the French Embassador, and a little before them the Palsgrave arrived, and the Queen of Sweden also came thither attended by the Rix Chancellor Oxenstern, and Sir Patrick Ruthen the eldest Colonel of the Scotish Nation: here the King gave audience to our Ambassadour, and many Treaties were in agitation both for the prosecution of the War the next year, and the restitution of the Palatinate, but the shortness of the Kings Stay hindred the bringing of any Counsels to Maturity, for he was not here a week when upon advice that divers troops of Spaniards and Flemings raised in Luxemburg were marching towards the Palatinate to recruit the Garrisons of Mentz, Wormes, Frankendal, Heidleberg and other Towns in those parts, he broke off the negotiations for that time, and hasten'd to his Army, with a purpose to pass over the Rhine, in order whereunto he first lay down before a Sconce lying on the Rhine over against Oppenheim: it was a place very well fortified with deep and broad Fosses full of water, with a draw-bridge over, and well provided of Victuals and Ammunition, and it was so situated that the men had free passage to the Town and back again without any danger; after the Batteries were made, the King left the old Scotish Brigade Commanded by Colonel Hepburne, and the blew Regiment Commanded by Colonel Winckles before it, and he gave order to have some Boats that the Spaniard had sunk, taken up and emptied of water, by which means he passed over two thousand Scots of the Lord Rhees Regiment, Sir James Ramsays Regiment, and old Spense his Regiment, and with these he secured the landing place, till he passed over a good part of his Army, and unexpectedly came before Oppenbrine; and the next day these in the Sconce (hearing the King had pass'd the Rhine,) capitulated and surrendered the place to Colonel Hepbeim: Oppenheim was also after a while surrendered to the King of Sweden, and from thence he made a farther impression on the Palatinate with so great success, that he quickly took

About five years since certain Feoffees were intrusted to purchase in Impropriations with their own and the money of other well disposed persons, and with the profit thereof to set up and maintain preaching Ministers in places of greatest need, where preaching was much wanting, whereupon in a short while many great sums were advanced. There are in England Nine thousand two hundred and eighty four Parish-Churches endowed with Glebe and Tyth, but of these when these Trustees entred on their work, three thousand eight hundred forty and five, were either appropriated to Bishops, Cathedrals, and Colledges, or impropriated as lay-fees to private persons, as formerly belonging to Abbies; to purchase which last sort, they had made such progress, that it was believed in fifty years rather purchases than money would have been wanting to them. The King was perswaded that this project would prove dangerous to the Church, and Noy the Attorney General at the later end of the year exhibited a Bill in the Exchequer Chamber against the Feoffees.

It was charged against them, that they diverted the charity wherewith they were intrusted; for being by their Feoffment directed to settle preaching Ministers in distant obscure places where preaching was most wanting, they first settled a morning Lecture at St. Antholines in London: To this they answer'd, That London being the chiefest place from whence their charity derived, it was fit they should have some benefit of their own bounty, and that they were not so confined to the uses in their Feoffment, but that in their choice they might reflect as well on the eminency as necessity of the place; That they expended much of their own as well as other mens charity, and hoped they might do with their own as they pleased: It was urged against them, that they generally prefer'd Non-Conformists to the Lectures of their erection: To which they said, none were placed therein, but such whose sufficiency and conformity was approved by the Ordinary; and moreover, that one of the Feoffees acquainted the Bishop of London at his house at Fulham, that if he either disliked the persons who managed, or the order they took in the work, he would submit the alteration to his discretion. In conclusion, the Court condemned their proceedings as dangerous to the Church and State, pronouncing the Gifts and Feoffments to be illegal; and so dissolved the same, confiscating the money to the Kings use; their criminal part was referr'd to the Star-Chamber, but never prosecuted, because many discreet and devout men were rather desirous of the regulation, than ruine of so pious a design.

Duke Hamilton in September this year came from Germany, his men being by Famine, Plague and the accidents of War drawn to so small a number, that they were not fit for his care. The King of Sweden had many communications with the Palsgrave and our Ambassador about the affairs of the Palatinate, in which the French Ambassadour, and de Pauch the Ambassadour of the United Provinces, did mediate so as matters were near drawn to a good Conclusion, when all was again made desperate by the death of the K. of Sweden, which hapned at that memorable battel of Lutzen on the sixth of Novemb. old Stile: the Pallgrave was in hopes of recovery, when news came to him of the death of the King of Sweden, which resented him with so intense a passion that he dyed on the 29 of the same Month, nor could the rendition of Frankendal then ready to be surrendered to the English Officers then before it any whit moderate his grief; the Earl of Leicester was now sent Ambassador to the K. of Denmark to condole the death of our Kings Grand-Mother Sophia Queen Dowager of Denmark, and to demand the dividend of a sixth part of what she left as due to him and the Q. of Bohemia in the right of Queen Anne their Mother, which sixth part amounted to 15000 l. Sterling; The K. of Denmark told the Ambassador when the accompt was stated of what was due to him in arrear of thirty thousand pound a moneth from the Crown of England upon the contract made in the year 1625. towards the support of his Army, he would make up the rest, so that the Earl was fain to return re infecta. The King having had great experience of the ability and faithfulness of the Lord Viscount Wentworth (whom he had lately raised to that honour and made him Lord President of the North) made him Deputy and chief Governour of the Realm of Ireland, where affairs were in much disorder by the insolence of the Romish Catholicks, who did not use moderately the Kings clemency to them in relaxation of the Rigour of some penal Statutes; they are indeed a people that cannot bear any indulgence towards them with temperance, but are too apt to be alienated in the apprehension of favour to their own detriment and the scandal of the Kings Protestant Subjects. On the second of December this year the King fell sick of the small Pox, but there was so little malignity in the distemper that he soon recovered; The same moneth the Earl of Arundel was sent to the Hague in Holland to the Queen of Bohemia, to condole the death of her husband and sollicite her and her Childrens Journey into England, which at this time she refused because of the grief she lay under, and an indisposition of health that made her unfit in the Winter season to take such a Journey.

The King had this year a great check to the prosperity of his Government, which first appeared in Scotland, where some factious and seditious male-contents began to sow some seeds of discontent, which afterwards encreased to that degree, as well near destroyed the prosperity and happiness of three flourishing Kingdoms, on this occasion.

In the minority of King James, the Lands of Cathedral Churches, and religious Houses, which had been settled on the Crown, by Act of Parliament, were shared among the Lords and great men of that Kingdom (by the Connivence of the Earl of Murray, and some other of the Regents) in the minority of King James, to make them sure unto their side. And they being thus possesse of the said Lands, with the regalities and tythes belonging to these Ecclesiastical Corporations, lorded it with pride and insolence enough in their several territories, holding the Clergy to small stipends, and the poor peasant under a miserable Vassalage and subjection to them.

King CHARLES, engaged in War at his first coming to the Crown, and having little aid from thence for the maintenance of it, by the advice of his Council of that Kingdom, was put upon a course of resuming those Lands, Tythes, and Regalities into his own hands, to which the present possessors could pretend no other Title, than the unjust usurpation of their Ancestors. This he endeavoured first by an Act of Renovation, but that course not being like to speed, he followed in the way of a legal process, which drew on a Commission for surrendring of Superiorities and Tythes, to be retaken from the King on such conditions, as might bring some profit to the Crown, some augmentation to the Clergy, and far more ease and benefit to the Common people. But these occupants chose rather to expose their Countrey to the danger of a publick ruine, than to part with any of that power, which they had exercised on their vassals (as they commonly called their tenants;) and thereupon conspired together, to oppose the King in any thing, that should be offered in the following Parliament, which had Relation to the Church or to Church-affairs.

But because Religion and the care thereof is commonly the best bait to catch the vulgar, they must find out some other means, to divert the King from the prosecuting of that Commission, than the consideration of their own personal and private Interest, and they found means to do it on another occasion, which was briefly this.

King JAMES, from his first coming to the Crown, had a design, to bring the Kirk of Scotland to an Uniformity with the Church of England, both in Government and form of worship. And he proceeded so far as to settle Episcopacy amongst them, naming thirteen new Bishops for so many Episcopal Sees, as had been anciently in that Church; three of which received consecration from the Bishops of England, and conferred it on the rest of their Brethren at their coming home: which Bishops he armed also with a power of high Commission, the better to keep down the insolent and domineering Spirit of the Presbyterians. In order to the other he procured an Act, to be passed in the Assembly at Aberdene, Anno 1616. for composing a Liturgy and extracting a new Book of Canons out of the scattered Acts of their old Assemblies, and at an Assembly, held at Perth, Anno 1618. he obtained an order for receiving the Communion kneeling, for administering Baptism, and the Lords Supper in private houses in cases of extreme necessity, for Episcopal confirmation; and finally, for the celebrating the Anniversary of our Saviours Birth, his Passion, Resurrection, and Ascension, and the coming down of the Holy Ghost. All which he got to be confirm'd in Parliament.

So far that wise King had advanced the work of Uniformity before his engaging in the cause of the Palatinate; his breach with Spain, and the War, which did issue upon it, had took off his thoughts from prosecuting that design, which his Son being more intangled in wars abroad, and distempers at home, had no time to finish till he had 1632. had settled his affairs, and attain'd to some measure both of power and glory : but being it was a business, which was to be acted leisurely, and by degrees, he deferred the execution of his purpose, till he came into Scotland, towards which he went this year about the middle of May, and arrived at Edenburgh the tenth of June, and on the eighteenth following, his Coronation was celebrated with great solemnity ; he had before summoned a Parliament, to meet at Edenburgh, which assembled a while after the Coronation, and he caused an Act of Ratification of all that had been done by his Father, to be proposed to them, determining, as soon as that was passed, to go in hand with introducing a publick Liturgie, in the effecting whereof he found a stronger opposition in the Parliament, than he had reason to expect, but carried it at last by a far major part of that assembly.

The King takes a Journey into Scotland to be crowned there.

The King commands that the English Liturgie, with its usual Ceremonies, should be used in his Royal Chapel at Edenburgh.

The Presbyterians beget a dislike of it in the minds of the Vulgar.

Which is further promoted by the insinuations of the Lords and Gentry.

This gave him the first taste of their disaffection to his person and Government, but he went forward notwithstanding, in pursuit of those purposes, which he brought thither with him, for not long after his return into England, he gave order to the Dean of his Chapel Royal in Edenburgh, for Prayers to be read therein, according to the English Liturgie, a Communion to be had every Month, and all Communicants to receive the Sacrament on their knees ; that he who officiated it, if he were a Bishop, should perform it in his Rochett, and other Episcopal Robes, and in his Surplice if a common Presbyter : And that not only the Lords of his Council, but the Lords of the Session, and as many of the principal Magistrates of that City as could conveniently, should not fail of their attending the divine Service there, on Sundays and Holy-dayes, for by this means he gave himself no improbable hopes, that the English Liturgie passing a probationership in the Chapel Royal, might find a plausible entertainment in the Churches of Edenburgh, and be retained by degrees in all the rest of the Kingdom.

But the Presbyterian Scots, not ignorant of the Kings intentions, insinuated into the minds of the common people, that this was a design only to subject that Kirk to the Rites and Ceremonies of the Church of England, which they said was superstitious, and therefore that it did behove them to stand together, as one man, to oppose their entrance.

The Lords and Gentry of that Realm, who feared nothing so much as the Commission of Surrenders, before mentioned, laid hold of this occasion also, and they being seconded by male-contented Spirits, who had not found the King to be as prodigal of his favour to them, as his Father had been before, endeavoured to possess them with fear and Jealousies, that Scotland was to be reduced to the form of a Province, and governed by a Deputy or Lord Lieutenant, as Ireland was : the like was done also by some Lords of Secret Council, who before had governed, as they listed, and thought their power now diminished, and their persons under some neglect, by the placing of a Lord President over them to direct in chief.

So that the People generally being fool'd into this opinion, that both their Christian and Civil Liberties were in no small danger, became capable of any impression, which the Presbyterian faction could imprint upon them, which visibly appeared by a virulent and seditious Libel, published in the year 1634. wherein the King not only was charged with altering the Government of that Kingdom, but traduced for very strong inclinations to the Religion of the Church of Rome, the chief abettor whereof (for the Author was not to be found) was the Lord Balmerino, for which he was legally committed and condemned of Treason, but pardoned by the Kings great Goodness, though by his following actions he deserved not that favour. The Fire thus breaking out in Scotland, it was no Marvel, if it laid hold on England also, the discontented of both Nations working themselves about this time into a body, and from henceforth communicating their counsels and designs unto one another. As will hereafter appear.

And occasions the like stirs in England.

This year ended with some stirs in Somersetshire, where some of the Justices were much offended, at the keeping of Wakes, Church-ales, and Bride-ales on the Lords day, which occasioned many disorders and misdemeanors to be committed : and therefore they moved the L. Chief Justice Richardson, and Baron Denham, then in their Circuit in the Lent Vacation to make some Order therein ; these in compliance with their desire, make an order on the 19 of May, (founded on former presidents signed by the Chief Justice Popham, in the later end of Queen Elizabeths Reign) therein suppressing such Revels, in regard of the infinite number of inconveniences, daily arising by means thereof ; injoyning the Constables to deliver a Copy thereof to the Minister of every Parish, who on the first Sunday in February, and likewise the two first Sundays before Easter, was to publish the same every year. This was look'd on by the Bishops, as an usurpation of Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, and they therefore procured a Commission, directed to the Bishop of Bath, and other Divines to enquire into the manner of publishing this order, and the carriage of the Judges in the Business ; Notwithstanding which the Chief Justice, at the next Assizes, gave strict charge against these Revels, and required an account of the publication and execution of the former order, punishing some persons for the breach thereof ; after whose return the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury sent for him, and told him it was the Kings pleasure, he should revoke his order, as he would answer it at his peril ; which he did at the next Assizes, (but with this Limitation, as much as in him lay.) But this ended not here, for the Justices of that County hearing of this dealing with the Chief Justice, made an humble Supplication to the King, for suppressing the aforesaid Assemblies, which induced the King to renew his Fathers Declaration, about lawful sports, on the Lords day published in the sixteenth year of his Reign ; hoping thereby, by the restriction therein directed, to hinder the abuse of those Recreations, and to free the Consciences of his Subjects from those servile yokes, which some Divines about that time endeavoured to introduce, maintaining the indispenfible morality of the fourth Commandment, and consequently the necessary observation of the Jewish Sabbath, for it was in the declaration prescribed,

The King published a declaration for lawful sports on the Lords day.

1. That

1632. 1. That these pastimes should be no impediment, or lett to the Publick duty of the day.

2. That no Recusants should be capable of the benefit of them.

3. That none should use them, that were not diligently present at all divine Offices, which the day required. And

4. That the Benefit should redound to none, but such as keep themselves in their own Parishes.

The Publication of this, however piously intended, gave great offence; and the rather, because, though there was nothing express in the declaration, that the Minister of the Parish should be pressed to the publishing, yet some Ministers, for refusing the reading thereof, were some suspended ab Officio & Beneficio, some deprived, and more molested in the High-commission; the truth is, the ill reception it had among the people, in the former Publication of it, in the time of the Kings Father, might have deterred the like at this time, for that the strict observation of the Lords day was much increased since that time, though it was not known in England, till the year 1595. when Dr. Bond first published it in his Book of Sabbath Doctrines; nor in Ireland, till just twenty years after, when it was inserted in the Articles of Religion, there established; nor in Scotland, till above twenty years after that: and at this day in Geneva, shooting in long bows, tennis, bowling, and other sports of that kind are used, and the like in all foreign places, where the Protestant Religion is professed; but it was generally disliked here, many complaining that mans badness took occasion to be worse, under the protection of those sports permitted to them: for though liberty on the Lords-day may be so limited in the Notions of learned men, as to make it lawful, it is very difficult so to confine it to the actions of the people, but that they will degenerate into licentiousness, so that the declaration after a while dyed of it self, and it was wished by many prudent men of that time, it had never lived.

The King makes preparation to maintain his right of Sovereignty of the Seas.

The Merchants of London, and other parts made great complaints at the end of the last year, of the obstructions of Trade, for want of good Convoyes, to secure them against the Turks and other Pirates, that infested our Coast, which made the King very earnest in making preparations to make himself strong at Sea, to which he was the more inclined for the vindication of his Just Authority of the Sovereignty of the British Seas; which was not only actually usurped by the Hollanders, but the right it self disputed by a Tract, written by Hugo Grotius, a learned man of that time, called Mare Liberum, but whilst the King by his power omitted not to maintain his right, our learned Selden, by his pen encountered Grotius, in a learned book called Mare Clausum, wherein he did not only assert the Sovereignty, or the Dominion of the British Seas to the Crown of England, but clearly proved by constant and continual practice, that the Kings of England used to levy money from the Subjects, for the providing of Ships and other necessities, to maintain that Sovereignty which did of right belong unto them; but before the writing of this Tract, the King had well advised how to enable himself with Treasure, to support his authority, and defend the Kingdoms by the Industry of Noy, his At-turney-General, a most indefatigable Inquisitor into our antient records, who had found many precedents for levying a Naval aid upon the Subjects by the sole Authority of the King, whensoever the safety and preservation of the Kingdom did require it of him, and that such aid had been heretofore levied in the same year, in which the Kings that took it, had received subsidies in the way of Parliament; for which he gave this reason, When a King of England wants money to support his own expences, or for the enlarging his Dominions in foreign Conquests, or otherwise to advance his honour in the eye of the world, he ought to be beholding to his Subjects for it by aid in Parliament; but when the Kingdom is in danger, and the safety of the Subject concern'd therein, he may by our lands raise such sums of money as he thinks expedient for the preventing of the danger, and providing for the publick safety of himself and his. And thereupon by this advice, writs were issued and directed to all the Port Towns and Maritime Counties of the Kingdom, to set out a certain number of Ships furnished with Mariners, Ammunition, Victuals and all other necessities for defence of the Realm, whereby the King quickly had Equipped a very good Fleet, though not great enough for the end intended; which occasioned the like Writs to be issued out to all the Counties in the Kingdom, in the year 1636. of which more hereafter.

This year was unfortunate to the Swedes in Germany, where General Arnheim was constrained to retire out of Bohemia into Saxony: The City of Ratisbone, was regained by the Imperialists, General Allaringer slain near Lanshut, and the whole Army totally routed by the King of Hungary, and the Cardinal Infante at the battail of Norlinger, after which ensued the surrender of that Town, and the Conquest of the Dukedom of Wittemburg, whose Duke fled to Strasburgh; but though this gave a great stop to the Swedish greatness, yet it brought a little repose to Germany, for shortly after this success, a peace was concluded, though it lasted not long.

In Ireland the Lord Deputy Wentworth, was very busie in settling the quiet of that Nation, and because Popery was chiefly increased for want of able Ministers, and that occasion'd by the poor maintenance they had in most places, he procured of the King by the mediation of Archbishop Land, that all the impropriations then in the Crown should be restored to the Church, to a great diminution of the Royal Revenue, though the King was never sensible of any loss to himself, if thereby gain might redound to God in his Ministers.

On Candlemas night, the Gentlemen of the four Inns of Court, presented a Masque to the King and Queen at Whitehall, riding in Stately Chariots from the Temple thither, it was indeed a Pompous and Magnificent shew, but made more glorious, by a long train of Christian Captives, who having been many years enslaved in the chains of bondage, were sent for a present to the King, by the Heriffe or Emperour of Morocco, in testimony of the assistance received from our King, whose Fleet assisted in the taking of Saltee then in Rebellion against him, and in enmity to all the world, it being a nest of Pirates, by whose destruction

The death of the Earl of Portland Lord high Treasurer of England.

His place given to Commissioners.

A fleet set out under the Earl of Lindsey to scour the Seas.

This year dyed Sir Richard Weston, Earl of Portland, Lord high Treasurer of England, a great Statesman, but suspected to be too much a favourer of the Religion of Rome, in which he was reputed to have dyed, and some of his Children were educated therein, his place for the present was intrusted to Commissioners, till a fit person could be found on whom to bestow it.

It was now the year 1635. when a gallant fleet was set out by the aid of the Ship money, under the Earl of Lindsey Admiral, and the Earl of Essex Vice Admiral; whereby our trade was not only made secure by scouring the Seas of pirates, but the King became very formidable to all his Neighbours, and by his interposition this summer Flanders was preserved, which had else probably been swallowed up by the French and Hollanders, for the King of Spain could not bring 8000 men into the field and leave his Garrisons provided, and the French King and they were in confederacy for that purpose, by which it was agreed that he should invest Dunkirk with an Army, whilst the Hollanders did block it up with their Navy, that so all passages into the Country being secured, they might the more easily subdue the inward parts; which design had taken effect, if the English Fleet had not dislodged the Hollanders from before the Town and relieved it, and the French by their insolencies at Diest and Tellemont inflamed and encouraged the peoples heats against them, for before they had been so practised on by the Holland faction that few or none would arm to repulse their enemies.

Thomas Parr brought up to the Court by the Earl of Arundel.

September the 29th. the Earl of Arundel brought up to London out of Shropshire, one Thomas Parr, as the wonder of the time for the proxeivity of his age, he had almost reach'd to the hundred and sixtieth year, and in all likelihood had outlived that time some years, had not so tedious a Journey, and the over violent agitation of his body, together with the change of his wonted course of dyet, accelerated his end.

Charles Prince Elector with his Brother Prince Rupert come into England.

Charles Prince Elector Palatine came into England at this time to visit his Uncle; and to consult with him for his restitution to the Palatinate, and a while after his arrival, his brother Prince Rupert came also.

The princess Elizabeth born.

The Kings reputation was very high, and the Hollanders a wise and industrious people took all occasions to endear themselves to him: at this time they sent an Ambassador over to congratulate with the King and Queen, for the birth of their second Daughter the Princess Elizabeth, and to ingratiate themselves the more, they sent by him a very rich present, a massie piece of Amber-griese, two huge basons of China, a noble Clock, the workmanship of Rodolphus the Emperour, and some exquisite pieces of painting of Titian and Tintaret, which were well accepted.

The Bishop of London made Lord high Treasurer.

The King finding some inconvenience in the managing of his Treasure by Commissioners gave the Office to the Bishop of London, which was a very good choice, for whereas most of the Treasurers of these latter times, had rather served themselves in that Office than the King, raising themselves to great Estates and dignities thereby, he thought fit to choose this Church-man, who having no Family to raise, nor Wife and Children to provide for; might better manage the incomes of the Treasury to his advantage, than they had been formerly; and so it proved; for by his care of the revenue, the King began to be rich, and he was of so well temper'd a disposition, that he gave exceeding great content to all the people.

The Kings Naval preparations were very great this year; The Fleet consisting of sixty good Ships, under the Command of the Earl of Northumberland now made Lord high Admiral of England, who sailing Northward, and finding a great number of Dutch Busses fishing on our coast, he seized on many of them and dispersed the rest. This made a great consternation amongst the people of the United Provinces, many of whose subsistence depended on this fishing, wherefore upon a supplication from the States to the King they had permission granted by him, for he was more displeased at their presumption in doing it as in their own right and in contempt of his authority in the Dominion of these Seas, than at the thing done. As the Navy was greater this year than before; so the charge of it was much augmented, wherefore, whereas the last year the Ship writs had been sent only to the maritime Counties, they were now issued to all the Counties in England, and the people generally paid what rates and assessments were set upon them in pursuance thereof, but some few refused, and many of the Clergy complain'd that they were unreasonably rated by their neighbours some of them at a sixth, and others at a fourth part of the tax of the parish; for satisfaction of the refusers, The King writ to the Judges for their opinion, who are by their oaths his proper Counsellors in all difficulties concerning the law; and to ease the Clergy, he writ to all the Sheriffs of England, requiring that the Clergy possessed of Parsonages, should not be assessed above a tenth part of the land rate of their several parishes, and that consideration should be had for Vicars accordingly.

Another fleet set out under the command of the Earl of Northumberland.

The King refers the case of Ship money to the Judges.

To our trusty and well beloved, Sr. John Bramston Knight, chief Justice of our Bench; Sir John Finch Knight, Chief Justice of our Court of Common Pleas; Sir Humphrey Davenport Knight, Chief Baron of our Court of Exchequer; And to the rest of the Judges of our Court of Kings Bench, Common Pleas, and the Barons of our Court of Exchequer.

CHARLES REX.

TRusty and well beloved we greet you well; Taking into our Princely consideration that the honour and safety of this our Realm of England, the preservation whereof is only entrusted to our care, was and is more dearly concerned than in late or former times; as well by divers Counsels and attempts to take from us the Dominion of the seas, of which we are sole Lord, and right owner, and Proprietor, and the Loss whereof would be of greatest danger and peril to this Kingdom, and other our Dominions; and many other wayes;

We

1636. We for the avoiding of these and the like dangers, well weighing with our Self, that where the good and safety of the Kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole Kingdom in danger, there the charge and defence ought to be born by all the Realm in general; did for the preventing so publick a mischief, resolve with our self to have a Royal Navy prepared, that might be of force and power (with Almighty Gods blessing and assistance) to protect and defend this our Realm, and our Subjects therein, from all such perils and dangers, and for that purpose we issued forth writs under our great Seal of England, directed to all our Sheriffs of our several Counties of England and Wales, Commanding thereby all our said Subjects, in every City, Town, and Village, to provide such a number of Ships, well furnished, as might serve for this Royal purpose, and which might be done with the greatest equality that could be. In performance whereof, though generally throughout all the Counties of this our Realm, we have found in our Subjects great cheerfulness and alacrity, which we graciously interpret as a testimony, as well of their dutiful affection to us, and our service, as of the respect they have to the Publick, which well becometh every good Subject; Nevertheless finding that some few, happily out of ignorance what the Laws and customs of this Realm are, or out of a desire to be eased in their particulars, how general soever their charge be, or ought to be, have not yet paid and contributed to their several rates and assessments that were set upon them. And foreseeing in our Princely wisdom, divers suits and Actions, are not unlike to be commenced, and prosecuted in our several Courts at Westminster; We desirous to avoid such inconveniences, and out of our Princely love and affection to all our people, being willing to prevent such errors as any of our loving Subjects may happen to run into, have thought fit in a case of this nature to advise with you Our Judges, who we doubt not are well studied and informed in the Rights of our Sovereignty, and because the Tryals in our several Courts, by the formalities in pleading, will require a long protraction, We have thought fit by this letter directed to you all, to require your Judgements in the Case, as it is set down in the inclosed paper, which will not only gain time, but also be of more authority to over-rule any prejudicate opinions of others in the point. Given under our signet, at our Court of White-hall, the 2d. of February, in the 12th. year of our Reign. 1636.

The State of
proposed.

When the good and safety of the Kingdom in general is concern'd, and the whole Kingdom in danger; whether may not the King by Writ under the great Seal of England, command all the Subjects in his Kingdom at their charge, to provide and furnish such number of Ships with men, victuals, and munition, and for such time as he shall think fit for the defence and safeguard of the Kingdom, from such danger and peril? and by law compel the doing thereof, in case of refusal or refractoriness? and whether in such case is not the King the sole Judge, both of the danger, and when, and how the same is to be prevented and avoided?

To which, the Judges delivered their opinions as followeth.

1636. May it please your most excellent Majesty, We have according to your Majesties command severally and every man by himself, and all of us together, taken into serious consideration, the case and questions signed by your Majesty, and inclosed in your letter. And we are of opinion, that when the good and safety of the Kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole Kingdom in danger, your Majesty may by writ, under your great Seal of England, command all the Subjects of this your Kingdom at their charge to provide and furnish such number of Ships with men, victual, munition, and for such time as your Majesty shall think fit, for the defence and safeguard of the Kingdom from such peril and danger. And that by Law your Majesty may compel the doing thereof, in case of refusal or refractoriness. And we are also of opinion that in such case your Majesty is the sole Judge both of the danger, and when, and how the same is to be prevented and avoided.

These opinions being subscribed by all the Judges, were enrolled in all the Courts of Westminster-Hall, and the King thought he had now warrant sufficient to proceed against the defaulters, the chiefest whereof, was one Mr. Hambden a Gentleman of Buckinghamshire, who being summon'd by process, appeared and required Oyer of the Ship-writs, which being read, he demur'd in law thereunto, and demanded the opinion of all the Judges upon the Legal sufficiency thereof. This great case came to be argued in the Exchequer chamber, and the major part of the Judges delivered their opinions in favour of the writs, and accordingly the Barons gave Judgement against Mr. Hambden; yet did not the question altogether so repose, but Master Hambden observing that two of the Judges, viz. Crooke and Hutton, were of a contrary sense, held up the contest still though all in vain, all his inquietude not gaining him the least acquittal, until an higher power interposed.

There was an Imperial Dyet held this year, for the electing of a King of the Romans, and the King sent thither the Earl of Arundel his Ambassador to treat with the Emperour and the Princes for the restitution of the Palatine to the Palsgrave. But that Embassy could effect nothing, for the Duke of Bavaria, who had in his possession the upper Palatinate, and the electoral dignity, would by no means hear of any Propositions to part with either. But the lower Palatinate he might have had upon some terms which the Emperour proposed: but our Ambassador was not instructed to accept of any thing in diminution diminution of the Electors Right: so that the Palsgrave had no fruit of this Embassy, yet were his hopes a little rais'd by an overture of marriage made at this time betwixt the King of Poland, and one of his Sisters, which was almost effected by the legation of Prince Radzovil here in England. But the Emperour privately obstructed it, and by the insinuation of the Jesuites, so instigated the Clergy of Poland against it, because of her Religion, that the Treaty was broken off, and the King afterwards married the Lady Cecilia, second Sister to the Emperour.

Dr. Bastwick
Mr. Pryn and Mr. Burton
censured.

On the 14 of January Mr. William Pryn an Uter barrister of Lincolnes Inne, Doctor John Bastwick, Dr. of Physick, and Henry Burton a Minister, were censured in the Starr-Chamber: The offence of Pryn was for writing and dispersing Libels against the established Discipline of the Church of England: That of Bastwick for inveighing against the proceeding of the High Commission against him, before which he had been accused for writing a Book, called Flagellum Pontificis & Episcoporum Latialium, and committed to the Gatchouse, in which time besides his arraigning the high Commission Court, he published a Latine Apology (called by the Court a Libel) ad Praesules Anglicanos, and a Letany very virulent against them. That of Mr. Burton was, for publishing a Sermon, which he preached on the fifth of November before, wherein the Prelates were charged for introducing several innovations into Divine worship, which was deemed a Libel: For these offences, the judgement of the Court was, That they should lose their Ears in the Palace-Yard at Westminster; be each of them fined five thousand pounds to the King, and imprisoned during life in three remote places. Finch the chief Justice, moved the Court, that it might be added to Mr. Pryns censure, to be branded in each cheek with S. L. for a slanderous Libeller, which was consented to, for they were the more severe against him, because he had been an Offendor before in the like kind, having been three years before censured to lose his Ears on the Pillory, for writing a Book, called Histrion-Mastix, or the Whip of Stage-players, wherein some indecent reflections were taken to be on the Queen her self, as too much delighted in Masques.

The Prince Elector, and his Brother Prince Rupert went to Holland about this time in order to a design, which was put in practice the next year, to attempt something with an Army in the Palatinate; The Assistance and credit of the Kings Purse, did so prevail under hand with the Prince of Orange and the States of the United Provinces, that a small beginning of an Army was raised, with which they advanced into Westphalia, and besieged Lemmingen: But Hatsfield one of the Emperours Generals came so soon upon them, that they effected nothing, but were forced to fight to great disadvantage, having had 2000 men slain, and most of the rest dispersed, and many Prisoners taken, amongst which were Prince Rupert and the Lord Craven, the Prince Elector himself escaped by flight, and retired to the Hague.

The Bishop of Lincoln fined and Misdemeanors.

Williams, Bishop of Lincoln, was on the 11 of July censured in the Star-chamber, for tampering to suborn witnesses, to be fined 10000 l.

to the King, and imprisoned during the Kings pleasure, being referred to the high Commission for a further censure: The occasion whereof we shall briefly relate.

This Bishop, after the great Seal some ten years since had been taken from him, retired to Bugden in Huntington-shire, wherein he lived very hospitably, and had great concourse; Amongst others Sr. John Lamb, Doctor Sibthorp, with Allen and Burden, two Proctors, came to visit him, and being at Dinner with him, there was much discourse about Non-Conformists, and the Bishop knowing these to be busie men in the prosecution of such, advised them to take off their heavy hand from them, informing them, that the King intended to use them hereafter with more mildness, as a considerable party, having great influence on the Parliament, without whose concurrence he could not supply his necessities; adding, that he had communicated this unto him by his own mouth.

A few years after, Lamb, upon some difference with the Bishop, informed against him for revealing the Kings Secrets, whereupon an Information was put in against him in the Star-Chamber: To which he put in an especial answer, declaring how all was contrived by a conspiracy and combination of Lamb, Sybthorpe, Allen and Burden, out of an intent to advance themselves and hatred to him, for not permitting them to Poll and Pill the Kings Subjects in Leicester-shire in their Ecclesiastical Courts, by halting them into their Nets, Ex officio mero, without any previous Complaint; under an imaginary colour of Puritanism. To this answer the Kings Attorney rejoined in Issue, admitting the Bishop to prove his special matters who proceeded to the examination of his witnesses therein: but after a while the Attorney being somewhat remiss in the prosecution, one Richard Kilvert was entertained to be the Bishops Protector, who had found out, that one John Prigion a Register of Lincoln and Leicester, was a most material witness in the Bishops defence: And the credit of this Testimony he designed to invalidate, by charging him with getting a Bastard, on one Eliz. Hodson: The Bishop thought it behoved him to support the Reputation of Prigion, and engaged himself more zealously therein, than was conceived consistent with the gravity of so great a Prelate, to such who knew not that he and one Doctor Morrison were the only persons of note present at his Table, where the discourse above mentioned passed between him and Sir John Lamb. This Bastard was by the Sessions at Lincoln ordered to be kept by Prigion, as the reputed father thereof, but at a Sessions following, that order was reversed, and the Child fathered upon one Borne, and Prigion acquitted; in the doing whereof, it is said Powel and Owen, two Agents of the Bishop, did menace and tamper with the witnesses: But at a third Session, Prigion was again charged and Borne freed: yet this last order, being upon a Certiorari brought to the Kings-Bench, was there quashed as insufficient, and Prigion was after cleared from the Child: Kilvert nevertheless in the traverse of this affair, let fall the first information in the Star-chamber, and proceeded upon that, whereon the Sentence before named was grounded, viz.

1637. for Subornation, and therein he succeeded: This dealing with the Bishop was very rigorous, and the rigour of it imputed to Land, Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, who thought him one that too much opposed his intentions, in reducing the Clergy to an exact and strict conformity to the orders of the Church, in point of Ceremony, and therefore unfit to have any Government in it, for after that part of his sentence came to be executed, which was referred to the High Commission, he was by that suspended ab Officio & Beneficio, and all his preferments in the Church sequestred to the use of the King: And the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, as Arch-bishop of the Province, exercised all kind of Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction throughout the Diocess of Lincoln, not only as Ordinary of that Diocess, but as Visitor of all those Colledges, which had any dependances on that See.

On the 23 day of July, being the day before this last part of the sentence against the Bishop of Lincoln was executed, there was a very great commotion in Edenburgh, about reading a Book of Common-prayer, some time before sent thither, and because it was an action that drew after it great misery and confusion to the King, and all his Kingdom, we shall be a little more particular in the Narration of it, and the consequences thereof, than is suitable to the brevity herein used in other transactions of lesser moment.

New broiles and commotions in Scotland
about reading the Common Prayer.

In the year 1616. as has been related, King James obtained an Act of the general Assembly at Aberdeen, for the compiling a Liturgy or Common-prayer, which was to be first presented to the King, and after his approbation, universally received throughout the Kingdom: this book in pursuance thereof was framed, and sent up to the King, who himself perused, and considerably revised it, and referred it also to the consideration of others, in whom he reposed much trust, and after all his own and their observations, additions, expunctions, mutations and accommodations, he returned it to Scotland, to be commended to that Church, but before a period and consummation was put to that Business, the King dyed. This pious intention of King James, for an Unity and Uniformity in the publick Prayer, Liturgie, and Service of the Church of Scotland, was so far intended by the King, that shortly after his return from that Kingdom, he did not only enjoin a stricter celebration of the English Liturgy in his own Chapel at Edenburgh, than had been formerly but frequently consulted how to have it universally used through the whole Kingdom; but the Scots-Bishops, being jealous that this might be an argument of their dependance on the Church of England, rather desired that the Liturgy framed in Scotland, in King James his time might be received, wherein the new Translation authorized by that King in the Psalms, Epistles, Gospels, Hymns, and Sentences, instead of the old translation was received; and (except on All Saints day, when Wisdom the third, and Ecclesiasticus the fourteenth are appointed to be read, for morning and evening prayer) no Apocrypha Chapters were directed to be read therein: though above 60 Chapters are read in the English Liturgy, for the first Lessons from the 28 of Septemb. to the 24 of Nov.

To this proposition the King agreed, and the book sent by K. James formerly into Scotland, was remitted to England, and after many serious consultations and some alterations, made by advice of divers of the Bishops, and Clergy of Scotland, then here it was perfected, Printed and Published and sent into Scotland: The Bishops and Noblemen of the Kings Council, then present at Edenburgh, resolved, That the book should be first read in the great Church, on the before-mentioned 23 of July, and on the Sunday before notice thereof was publickly given in the Church: There were present both the Arch-bishops, many of the Privy Council, and others of the best Quality in Edenburgh, besides a great concourse of ordinary people: Amongst this multitude, there appeared no sign of trouble, but no sooner was the book opened by the Dean of Edenburgh, but a Number of the meaner sort with clapping their hands, and outcries, made a great uproar, and one of them, called Jane or Janot Gaddis, (yet living at the writing of this relation) flung a little folding-stool, whereon she sat, at the Deans head, saying, Out thou false Thief, dost thou say the Mass at my Lug? which was followed with so great noise and confusion, that not any one could either hear or be heard; whereupon the Bishop of Edenburgh stept into the Pulpit, and hoping to appease them by putting them in mind, that the place, in which they were, was holy ground, and by intreating them to desist from the profanation of it, they were the more enraged, throwing at him cudgels, stools, and what else was in the way, even to the endangering of his life: Upon this the Arch-Bishop of St. Andrews Lord Chancellor, called down the Provost and Bayliffs of the City from their Seats to their assistance, who (not without some difficulty) put the unruly people out of the Church, and made fast the doors: This done, the Dean proceeded in reading the book, the multitude in the mean while rapping and pelting the windows with stones, to disturb the exercise, but notwithstanding all their clamour, the Service was ended, but not the peoples rage, who waiting the Bishop's retiring to his Lodging, so assaulted him, as (had he not been rescued by a strong hand) he had probably perished by their violence.

The same morning the Service Book was read in the next Church to St. Gyles, though not without noise and tumult, yet not so great as in the other: In the Gray-Fryers Church M. Ramsay refused to read it, and was afterwards suspended for the same, but the Elect Bishop of Argyle, his Colleague began to read it, but was so menaced, cursed and exclaimed against, that he was forced to give over; In the Colledge Church Rollock one of the Preachers, who the Sunday before at the intimation of the reading had much commended the Book, and undertaken this day to read it, upon notice, how it was received in the Church of St. Gyles, broke the promise he made to read it, thinking it the safer course, to leave himself to the Censure of all men for his levity, than offend the multitude, whose favour he sought, but he was suspended also.

The morning thus past, the Council assembled at the Lord Chancellors Lodging, and sent for 1637. for the Provost and Bayliffs, to advise with them how to prevent the like tumults in the afternoon, which they promised to endeavour, and it was so effected, that the Book was read in the Church of S. Giles, and some other Churches that afternoon, without any such disturbance as it had in the morning: only the Bishop of Edinburgh in his return to his lodging was rudely treated by the people, both by execrations and other waies.

All this time the Magistrates and Council of the City seemed so to dislike those tumultuous proceedings, that when their Ministers craved a dispensation from reading the Book, until security were given for the safeguard of their persons, they drew up an Obligatory Act, both for indemnity of their persons, and also for their settled maintenance; and whilst this was doing, to express their zeal herein, they sent two particular Letters to the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, into England, in which they desired him, To recommend to the King their fidelity to his service, and to undertake for them, their zeal and forwardness for settling the peaceable practice of the Service-Book; this undertaking of the Magistrates of Edinburgh, made the King remit much of his intended rigour against the offenders in the first uproar, hoping by that his clemency to oblige them the more in their duty towards him: and now the Council were in consultation for appointing a new day, for renewing the exercise of the Service-Book, to which the Bishops, Ministers, and Magistrates agreed; But before the time came, The Magistrates and people were so practised on by the suspended Ministers Rollock and Ramsay, and one Henderson a silenced Reader, that they began to relent of their former promises, and presented to the Council a Petition, requesting that the Service-book might not be imposed upon them, until the King's Pleasure should be further known; which Petition they alledged, they were necessitated to present by the Example and encouragement of all ranks from all parts of the Kingdom; And the Ministers also petitioned, that the orders, whereby they were enjoined to receive the Book might be suspended. There was nothing else of publick note done from Lammas (which is the day on which the Long Vacation there begins,) till the first of October, for the time of Harvest drew all sorts of people (save the Citizens) into the Country. But so soon as Harvest was done, the Designers of the following disorders had so corresponded, That the conflux of Nobility, Gentry, Ministers and Burgeses, from all parts, came to be very numerous at Edinburgh, in expectation of some great matters of Religion to be treated on in Council, at their first appointed day of sitting, and they were so tumultuous in their behaviour, that a present insurrection was feared, which forced the Council on the 27th of October, the first appointed day of assembling, to make three Proclamations: The first intimating, That nothing should be treated, concerning Church Business, till the times and meetings of the people should be more quiet and peaceable, and therefore all that come thither about any such matters, were required to repair home in twenty four hours, under the pain of Rebellion.

Three Proclamations for appeasing the Tumults in Edinburgh.

The second for removing the Session (which is with us called the Term) from Edinburgh to Lithgow; and the third for calling in, and burning a seditious Book, entituled, A Dispute against the English Popish Ceremonies, obtruded upon the Kirk of Scotland.

These Proclamations rather fomented than extinguished the flame then begun, for the next day the Bishop of Galloway being to sit with the Chief Justice upon some special Business in the Council House, he was pursued with vehement railings all along the street to the Council-door, where he was no sooner got, but they surrounded the House, and demanded the delivery of him to them; The Lord Treasurer advertised of the Bishops danger, came to his relief, but being got in, he was in no better plight than the Bishop; for the fury of the people still increased, hereupon the Provost and Council of the City were called to suppress the Tumult, but their condition was the same as the others, for they were incompassed by the people, and threatened with fear of their lives to sign a paper. First, That they should adhere to them in opposition of the Service-book; Secondly, Restore to their places Rollock, Ramsay and Henderson. Upon notice of this, the Treasurer and the Earl of Wigston went in person to the Town Council house, where they find the heat some-what abated, because the Magistrates had signed the Paper, and they were going back in hopes, that the disorders would be so far quieted upon this Condescension, that they might set the Bishop free: but no sooner had they appeared in the street, but they were assaulted, and the Treasurer had his white staff, hat and cloak taken from him, and hardly got into the Council-house: In this great hazard; the Lords sent to some of the Popular Noblemen, and Gentry in the Town, disaffected to the Service-Book, to come to their aid, who readily came, as was desired, and they peaceably guarded the Lords to Hally-rood-house, and the Bishop to his Lodgings.

Outrages committed by the rabble upon the Bishop of Galloway and the Lord Treasurer with others.

The Lords of the Council, after the Tumults were dissolved, that very afternoon commanded Proclamation to be made at the Cross at Edinburgh, for the repressing such disorders for the time to come; but to this little obedience was yielded, for whereas the first Tumult had been acted by the scum and basest of the people, and was decried by all the better sort: This second was the fact of the most substantial Citizens (except the Magistrates) who were now grown so insolent, that they sent Commissioners to the Council-Table, to require, that their silenced Ministers and Reader might be restored, and have assurance for the performance of what was promised to them by the Magistrates at the last insurrection; and a while after, there were presented to the Lord Chancellour and Council two Petitions; The first in the name of the Men, Women, Children and Servants of Edinburgh, against the Service-book; but the Second in the Name of divers Noblemen, Gentry, Ministers and Burgeses, against the Service-book, and Book of Canons, as imposed contrary to Law (because not allowed by a General Assembly) by the procurement of the Prelates, and therefore they decline their authority, and crave they may not any of them sit in Council, being parties, 1638. till their complaints be tried; This last Petition was by the Council sent to the King, who was so much displeased therewith, that he delayed to give any answer to it, but gave order to the Council, to signifie to all his good Subjects his averfeness from Popery, and detestation of Superstition, the contrary whereof the heads of the commotions had abused them with. The Council also finding Edenburgh at this time a Seat of Sedition, and disobedience to the Kings Authority, caused the Session to be adjourned from Lithgoe (which was somewhat too near) to Sterling, which was 24 miles distant, that so the disorderly multitude, there met together, might be dispersed by the necessary attendance of such as had any Law business, where by the King's Command, the Lords of the Council published a Proclamation, for dispersing the great and dangerous multitude, yet together, and assuring the people of the King's sincerity towards the Religion established in that Kingdom; upon the publication whereof, both at Sterling, Lithgoe and Edenburgh, it was received, whilst it was reading, with jeering, and after it was ended with a Protestation against it by many Earls, Lords, Ministers, and Burgesses, and a conflux of all other sorts of people; And in pursuance of this Violation of the King's Authority, they began to invest themselves with the Marks and Majesty of Sovereignty, erecting in Edenburgh four principal Tables or Councils, one of the Nobility, another of the Gentry, a third of the Burgesses, and a fourth of the Ministry, out of which there was a general Table of several Commissioners, chosen from the other four, who consulted of what was proposed to them by the other Tables, and what they did, was put in practice with strict obedience over all the Kingdom.

Many of the Nobility, Ministers and Burgesses protest against it.

Four Tables or Councils erected in Edenburgh.

The Negative Confession renewed without the Authority of the King.

The first Act of this General Table, was the Renewing of a Confession of Faith subscribed by King James and his household, in the year 1580, taken after by all persons 1581. by Ordinance of the Lords of the Privy Council and Act of the General Assembly, and subscribed again 1590 by a new ordinance of Council at the desire of the general Assembly, with a general Band for maintenance of the true Religion, and the Kings Person; This Confession was called the negative Confession, wherein the Authority of the Pope, Transubstantiation, Images, Reliques, Opus operatum, Merits, Auricular Confession, Prayer for the dead, and all the corruptions of the Church of Rome, as well in Doctrine, as outward Rites are enumerated at large, and particularly abjured, and a clause is inserted by which the Subscribers did call God to witness, that in their minds and hearts they did fully agree to the said Confession, and did not feign and dissemble in any sort.

The occasion of the first taking thereof, we shall make a little digression to relate, for the better understanding these proceedings.

The Earl of Lenox being near of blood to King James, alwaies bred in France, in the year 1580. came from thence to visit him, and by his courteous and modest behaviour grew so much into his favour, that he would not let him return thither, but gave him many preferments in Scotland. This gave a great distaste to some about the Court, and because he was of the Roman confession, the Ministers exclaimed much against him as sent from France to pervert the King in his Religion: The King to stay their declaimings, called the Ministers to Edenburgh together, and acquainted them that he had taken great pains to Convert his Cousin, and had obtained his consent to take a Minister into his house, which would serve to debar Jesuites and Romish Priests from him, and win him by conference to a great liking of the Truth; Mr. David Lindsey a Minister of Leith, was held the fittest for this service, as well for his skill in the French Tongue, as for his moderation otherwise; by whose labours, the Earl was quickly brought to join himself to the Church, and openly at St. Gyles to renounce the errors wherein he had been educated. Yet did not this remove the jealousies of the people, which were incensed by the intercepting of certain Dispensations sent from Rome, whereby the Roman Catholicks were permitted to promise, swear, subscribe, and do what else should be required of them, so as in mind they continued firm, and did use their diligence to advance the Roman faith.

These Dispensations being communicated to the King he caused his Chaplain, Mr. John Craig, to form the Confession of faith aforementioned, which he himself for example to others, did publickly swear to and subscribe, and the like was done by the Earl and the whole Council and Court at that time, and it was afterward renewed at the times before expressed.

This Confession was not the National Confession of the Church of Scotland, for that was penned twenty years before, and containing the positive grounds of Divinity was ratified by Act of Parliament, in the year 1567. and registred in the body thereof, and confirmed by a number of succeeding Parliaments: but this Negative confession, hath little more than the mandate of King James in his Minority (being but fifteen years of age) on the occasion before recited, to which he himself afterwards manifested his dislike at the Conference at Hampton-Court, saying, Mr. Craig the compiler thereof, with his, I Renounce, and I Detest, did multiply so many particulars, that simple people were not able to conceive them, and so being amazed did either fall back to Popery, or remain still in their ignorance. If I (said he) should hold myself to that form, the confession of my Faith must be in my Table-book, and not in my head. But that which was an aggravation in the renewing of this Confession, by these Confederates, was not only the doing it without the authority of the King or his Council, but adding a Band or Covenant to it far differrent from the Band in the year 1590. wherein they make an interpretation of the Confession, contrary to the sense and true meaning of it, for the better carrying on of their intended reformation. The first Band was for maintenance of the King's person and Authority with their lives and fortunes in defence of the Gospel of Christ, and liberties of the Kingdom; but in this Covenant they swear to the mutual defence and assistance one of another, with their best counsel, bodies, means, and whole power, against all persons whatsoever, wherein the King was not excepted.

This Confession and Covenant was first taken by the Tables, and afterwards imposed on all sorts of people, wherein great violence and menaces were used in many places, with bearing, tearing of cloaths, drawing blood, and exposing to thousands of injuries and reproaches, at Edenburgh, S. Andrews, Aberdeen, Glasgow, Lanerick, and many places more; all those Professours in Colledges, and Ministers, who out of Conscience towards God, and loyalty to the King, did either dissuade others, or could not by their entreaties or threatnings be perswaded to it themselves. The Laws were positive against this manner of Leaguings, it being expressly declared in two Acts of Parliament, 10 Jac. 6. Act. 12. and Parliament. nono Reg. Maria, Act. 75. That all Leagues of subjects amongst themselves without the privity and approbation of the King to be Sedition, and the Authors and abettors of them to be punished as movers of Sedition: but so great was the transportation of Zeal in the people, inflamed by the insinuations of the chiefs of the confederates, that the Law could take no place. All Professours in Colledges, and Ministers that refused to subscribe their Covenant were removed, for many good men that disliked the tumultuary way of offering it, were also scandalized at the interpretation by the Tables put upon it, for they declared, That this Confession was to be interpreted and ought to be understood of all the pretended Novations, no lesser than if every one of them had been expressed in the said Confession: by which, the five Articles of Perth before spoken of, passed in the year 1618. concerning kneeling at the Sacrament, private Communion to the sick, private Baptism, Confirmation of Children, and Observation of Festivals, as also the Service-Book, the Book of Canons, the High-Commission, things which Mr. Craig never heard of (nor perhaps imagined) are sworn against, so that they made the living swear what was the mind of the dead, for in that Confession, those Romish corruptions were only abjured which in that time had infected the Church: these Zealots nevertheless when some eminent Ministers (who at their admission had sworn obedience to and practice of these points) when they disputed this interpretation, and offered some qualification to it, they assured them they might swear, with a reservation of not abjuring Episcopacie, the Articles of Perth, or any thing by Parliament or General Assembly established; urging, that it would breed great division, if any alteration of the words wherein the Covenant was conceived, should be admitted.

The King being much displeased with these indignities upon his Royal Authority, and their refusal of that satisfaction which he offered to redress their complaints, intended to do that by power, which perswasion could not effect; but the Marquess of Hamilton then very prevalent with him, diverted that course, offering his service to compose the differences: The King being in his nature alwaies prone to lenity, was quickly induced to condescend to this motion, and sent him down in the quality of High Commissioner, authorizing him with large power to settle the peace of that Kingdom. The Marquess at his first arrival finding the City of Edenburgh filled with extraordinary numbers of persons from several parts of the Kingdom, because of the sitting of the Tables, went to a place called Dalkeyh, about four miles from thence, where he assembled the Council to consider of the best waies and means of serving the King in the prosecution of the trust committed to him; but whilst he was in these consultations, the Magistrates of Edenburgh presented an humble supplication to him, to repair to the King's Palace at Edenburgh, where (as they pretended) they might more conveniently give demonstration of their affection to the King's service. The Marquess considering what great influence the City had over all the rest of the Cities and Burghs of Scotland, was willing to gratifie them in their request, and told them, That if they would undertake that their Citizens should behave themselves as dutiful Subjects, and take order that the multitudes now present there (who call themselves Covenanters) and the Guards which the Tables had lately set about the Castle of Edenburgh should be dismissed, he would repair to the City, otherwise not: The Magistrates undertook to perform all that the Marquess proposed, adding, that they feared some aspersions might be laid upon them of disloyalty to the King, from which they doubted not to clear themselves, when he should please to hear and examine their proceedings: The Marquess upon this their undertaking, went the next day to Edenburgh to the King's Palace at Haly-rood House, where after he was a while settled, he fell presently upon the main business with the Confederates, to whom he made two Propositions.

First, what they expected from him for satisfaction to their Complaints; and next, what might be expected from them for returning to their former obedience, especially in renouncing and delivering up their late Covenant. To which after some time, they made answer, That they requested a General Assembly of the Church, and then a Parliament, in which two Judicatures they would represent and discuss their Grievances: To the second, they said, They could not acknowledge that they had ever parted from their obedience; and for their Covenant, they would rather renounce their Baptism, than abate one word or syllable thereof. And presently after they had given their answers, they possessed the people with many mis-reports, and the Sermons of the Preachers of Edenburgh were filled with admonitions, that they should take heed of crafty compositions, or yielding in the least point of their intended Reformation.

The Marquess seem'd much troubled at these actions, and thought the best expedient he could use to reclaim the people, was to publish a Proclamation, which he had brought with him from the King, of his Grace and Favour towards them, for relieving their Grievances, and satisfying them with his forwardness for the maintenance of the true Religion, and his averfeness from Popery; but before he did this, by advice of the Privy Council he writ a Letter to the King, to desire him to sweeten it with a favor of restoring to the City of Edenburgh the sitting of the Session, and all Courts of Justice, as a thing very acceptable to the Judges, Advocates, and all Dependents upon the Law, and to all others which had business depending in the Courts, but chiefly to the City of Edenburgh, which complained much of being

1638. impoverish'd by their absence : To this the King returned a very Gracious Answer, consenting that the Courts of Justice should presently begin again to sit at Edenburgh, and in pursuance thereof Proclamation was made for the first sitting down of the Session on the third day of July, which was receiv'd with great joy by the Judges, Advocates, and the Magistrates and Citizens of Edenburgh, so that the Marques and the Council did then hope the peoples minds began to be prepared to receive the Declaration of the King's grace and favour which was to be published in the next Proclamation : but upon the news of this some of the Confederates pretending to know the substance of it, were so bold as to tell the Marques, It would give no satisfaction to the people, and if they publish it, they would make protestation against it ; but not prevailing in this, they perceiving the bringing back of the Courts of Justice to Edenburgh had wrought very much upon many of their party, to a good resentment of the King's kindness towards them, cast about how to pervert them ; in order whereunto they sent some of their number to the Marques, to desire that Sir Robert Spotswood, President of the Session, and Sir John Hay, Clerk, Register or Master of the Rolls might be removed from their places, saying they would prove bribery and corruptions against them : To which the Marques replied, That upon the proof thereof, they should be subjected to tryal, but he thought it not fit they should be punished for any crime before they were legally convicted of it ; but this satisfied them not, nor did they expect to be gratified in so unreasonable a request, but they thought his denial would give them occasion to irritate the people to a disgust of the King's favour intended towards them ; for they presently upon this possess'd their party that those Judges were Enemies to their Covenant, affected to Episcopal Government, and Procurers, and Abettors of the late Innovations, giving out that they would publish a Protestation, that whatsoever Act, Decree or Order should be made where any of these Judges were present, should be null and void in Law ; but notwithstanding all this their threatening talk they never proceeded in any process against them, or made any such protestation, though they were often told by the Marques, it would be a very good service to the King, if they could prove their allegations, of which, if they were found guilty, they should not only be displaced, but receive such punishment as the Law had provided for such Notorious criminals ; but they perceiving their way of calumny did not succeed, desisted from further dealing therein, which they would not have done, if the Judges had been guilty of what they alledged against them : And now the Session being settled, the Marques caused the King's Proclamation to be pronounced at the Cross at Edenburgh, wherein the King took notice that many disorders had lately happened upon the Introduction of the Service-Book, Book of Canons, and High Commission, many thereby fearing Innovation of Religion and Laws, wherefore He assured his good Subjects, That he was resolved to maintain the true Protestant Religion, and not thereafter press the practice of the Canons and Service-Book, nor any thing of that nature, but in such a fair and legal way as shall manifest

A Proclamation made for the first sitting.

1638. he never intends Innovations in Religion nor Laws ; That he will reform the High Commission, so as it shall not be grievous to the people, and what is further fitting to be done, shall be agitated in a General Assembly and Parliament which should be indicted in convenient time, concluding, that he would not have them misled by any disaffected persons, who under pretext of Religion would draw them to disobedience to his grief and their ruine. This Proclamation was no sooner read, but the confederates arraigned it in a Protestation, which they caused to be publicly read, importing That they never doubted the sincerity of the King in defence of the Protestant Religion. That what he granted them, was not a sufficient remedy for their grievances, in that he did not wholly abolish the Service-Book, nor the High Commission, which was imposed upon them contrary to the Laws of the Land. That no Proclamation can secure them from the re-entry of the Innovations which this seemed to discharge, and that an Assembly and Parliament are the only remedies of their evils, and means to prevent the like, and that their proceeding ought not to be interpreted a drawing to disobedience under pretext of Religion, and running headlong into ruine.

The Proclamation arraigned in a Protestation of the Confederates.

The Marques found by this their manner of proceeding, he was not likely to reduce them to obedience ; and the most they could be brought to, was an Explication of their Covenant, wherein they pretended to express great demonstrations of affection to the King ; but when it was presented and read, little more was in it than a Justification of the Confession and their Covenant, protesting they never had any intention to withdraw themselves from their dutiful subjection and obedience to the Kings Government : But whereas it was expected that to these words of their Covenant, whereby they bind themselves to mutual maintenance against all persons whatsoever, should have been added, except the King and his Successors, that was refused.

The Marques was not satisfied herewith, but he told them he had spent all his Instructions, and could treat no further with them, till he had been with the King to acquaint him with his proceedings, and receive his further Orders, but he promised to return speedily to them with the Kings final answer to their demands, which he would shew to him, exhorting them in the mean time to break up their meeting, and contain themselves in quietness and peace : This they promised to do, but added, if he did not return by the 5th of August with such an answer as they expected, that then they would hold themselves free, and proceed in the courses they had resolved on.

The Marques went immediately to the King, whom he found at Greenwich, and to him he related the particulars of all transactions, The K. was offended at the insolencies of the Confederates, but was persuaded to try a little further if he could reduce them by a Gentle means : wherefore he dispatched the Marques with new Instructions, and gave him order to call a General Assembly, and after that a Parliament, but so as he should be first satisfied, by all Informations he could conveniently receive, of the constitution of a General Assembly, none having been kept for divers years.

The Marques comes to the King at Greenwich, and acquaints him with the affairs.

He is sent back with new instructions, and as order to call a General Assembly, and after a Parliament.

As soon as he came into Scotland, he deputed some of the Lords of the Council to confer with some 1638. some of the chief of the confederates of all Orders concerning some necessary propositions fit to be resolved on before the calling of the Assembly, both concerning the members of which it was to be constituted, and concerning the matters to be treated of; (two consultations usually previous to that meeting; for the omission whereof, in an Assembly of later times, they had so grievously complained, that in a Petition exhibited by the Ministers of their side it was alledged for a Nullity of that Assembly) but this was rejected as a limitation of the Assembly: The Marquess then told them, he could not call the Assembly till he had once again attended the King: Upon this they caused rumors to be spread, that the Marquess neither had power from the King, nor any intention from himself to give them satisfaction; Wherefore the Marquess to disabuse the people in this matter, reduced what he at first propounded, to two heads, which he tendered to them in these words;

The Marquess proposes in order to an Assembly and Parliament.

1. If the Lords and the rest will undertake for themselves and the rest, that no Laicks shall have voices in chusing the Ministers to be sent from the several Presbyteries to the General Assembly, nor none else but the Ministers of the same Presbytery.

2. If they will undertake that at the Assembly, they shall not go about to determine of things established by Act of Parliament, otherwise than by Remonstrance or Petition to the Parliament, leaving the determining of things Ecclesiastical to the General Assembly, and things secular by Act of Parliament, to the Parliament.

Then I will presently Indict a General Assembly, and promise upon My Honour, immediately after the Assembly to Indict a Parliament which shall Cognosce of all their Complaints.

They dislike the proposals, and invest themselves with a power of convoking an Assembly.

This would not be condescended unto, but they told the Marquess, if he did not return from the King by the 21th of September, to Indict a General Assembly by the Kings authority, they would themselves call one: for they had about this time published a Book, wherein amongst other things it was asserted, that the power of Convoking an Assembly, in case the Prince was an enemy of the Truth, or negligent in advancing the good of the Church, was in the Church itself.

The Marquess hastened with all diligence to the King, and informed him of all occurrences that passed, which occasioned many debates of the way to be used to bring that Kingdom to peace and quietness.

The Scots about the King advised, that he should not have any recourse to Arms, but in an unavoidable extremity; the Lords of the Privy Council in Scotland were many of them in private League with the Confederates, so that nothing could be relied on from them; And therefore that which was thought the best expedient, was to take an exact view of all the Petitions, Remonstrances and Protestations of the Confederates which they had since the beginning of the troubles exhibited either to the King, or the Marquess, or Privy Council, and to grant them all: And besides all these, because the heads of the Confederates had made it a principal motive to alienate the minds of the people from the King, that he was inclined to Popery, and had an aversion to the Reformed Religion, It was adjudged and consented to by the King, to command and urge the renewing of that Confession and Covenant by his authority, which they had taken without it, by which Legitimation, to save the people who were to swear it, from incurring the danger of those Laws, which made it very criminal to enter into any Covenant without his Authority: And instead of that unjust band of confederacy, which they added to the confession to bind themselves to mutual maintenance and defence against all persons whatsoever, the King caused the General Band for maintenance of the true Religion, and the Kings person to be added in the same words as it was expressed, and taken in the year 1590 by an Ordinance of the Privy Council at the desire of the General Assembly.

With these concessions all drawn up in a Proclamation, the Marquess returned into Scotland within eight daies after his first coming to Oatlands to the King, and arrived there before the time limited for his return: The Confederates had made many resolutions in his absence, and though they promised no election of Commissioners for the Assembly should be made before the 21. of September, the day agreed upon for his return, they gave order that the Election should be made the two and twentieth being the next day after, according to which order, Commissioners for the Assembly were elected in many Presbyteries before the Kings answer could be known, or before the Assembly was indicted, which was not till some daies after these elections; and although they would admit of no conference with the Marquess, for debating of what members the Assembly was to be constituted, and the manner thereof, which they said, would be a pre-limitation of it, they sent out to every Presbytery several Articles, wherein many Qualifications were made, limiting both the matter and manner thereof, with a form of Commission to be given to the Commissioners from every Presbytery, requiring that the persons elected should repair to Edinburgh after their Election, to consult before-hand of what was to be said or done at the Assembly.

Notwithstanding all these disorders, the Marquess assembled the Council at Holy-Rood house; and communicated to them the particulars of the Kings grace and favour for the appeasing of the Troubles of the Kingdom, which they received with excessive joy, believing that malice it self could not invent a pretence of keeping the people from being fully satisfied: The news of this made the heads of the Confederates bestir themselves, fearing their reign was towards an end, and some of them came to the Marquess sitting in Council, and moved him to delay the publishing of the Proclamation till the Monday following, for the next day being Sunday, they intended their Ministers should in their Pulpits cast such aspersions on it as might not easily be removed; but the Marquess would not be prevailed with, and the Proclamation was that day published at the Market-Cross; which was to this effect: That the King did annul and rescinde all Acts and Proclamations that had been made concerning the Service-Book, Book of Canons, and High Commission, and the practise of them: he also dispensed with the

The Lords of the Council approve the Kings Proclamation, and subscribe and swear to the confession and band authorized by the King.

All the Lords of the Council did seem very well to approve of this Proclamation, highly extolling the Goodness and Piety of the King, for having offered so just a means for the conservation of the purity of Religion and the peace of the Kingdom; and in a letter, which they sent to him upon this subject, they offered to defend his Person and Royal Authority, in the profession of that confession, now by him authorised, which they all solemnly subscribed after the Marques, who represented the Kings person, and appointed Commissioners for all Countreys and places, to have it sworn to, and subscribed by all the people, throughout the Realm. Many of the more moderate, both Magistrates, Ministers, and others in several Towns and places, that had taken the Covenant enjoined by the Confederates, were very well satisfied, with the expressions of the Kings condescensions mentioned in the Proclamation, and did swear and subscribe to the confession and Band, by the King directed, which began now to be called the Kings Covenant: But the Lords, Ministers and others of the Tables, and their Confederates did not acquiesce therein, alledging that this Proclamation did in many parts of it tacitely condemn the precedent actions, and restrain the Liberty of the Intended General Assembly; and to shew their dislike, they framed a long Protestation against it, a copy whereof they tendered to the Kings Herald, at the same time the Proclamation was proclaimed, which was to this effect.

A Protestation of the confederates against the Kings Proclamation.

That what the King granted in this Proclamation, did not free them from their just fears and apprehensions, and was not sufficient to cure the wounds of the Church and State; That the King ascribed the last Troubles to their fear of the innovations of Religion and Law, and not to the Innovation themselves, as if the cause were rather in apprehension, than in reality and substance. That the King having extolled the present Government of the Church, according to the late innovated forms of service therein, they could not be secured with a bare suspension of their Usage; if they were not formally taken away: That the General Assembly would be deprived of its just liberty, both in the Election of its Members, and the matters to be therein discussed, because the King appointed Bishops in the Indiction of the Assembly, to be there present, though they ought not so to be unless deputed by the Presbyteries.

1638. That the King declared, his intentions not to innovate any thing in Religion, whereas it depends on the general Assembly, to abolish all such Ecclesiastick constitutions, which appear to them to be hurtful to the Church.

That seeing all persons Ecclesiastical and Civil are lyable to the Tryal and Censure, as in the Proclamation mentioned and expressed, They protested that the Arch-Bishops and Bishops be not present, as having voice at the Assembly, but as persons guilty to appear, to undergo censure, for the complaints made, and to be made against them, and that the warning by this Protestation, and the Kings Proclamation should be a sufficient citation for their Tryal in Life, Office, and Benefice.

That they cannot subscribe this Confession, and Band by the King appointed: because it will tend to a division of them, in regard that they had already sworn, not directly or indirectly to suffer themselves to be divided from this conjunction, which consisted not in the general confession (which they agree to be the same) but also in the explanation and application thereof; and moreover by this new subscription they should both condemn their former subscription, and preclude the like laudable course in the like necessity to be taken by posterity.

That if they should swear the Confession, they should be obliged to maintain the Articles of Perth and Episcopacy, for an Oath is to be taken according to the intention of the person that commends it, and this being now appointed by the Kings Mandate of the 9 of Septemb. last, It is plain, that the Kings mind and intention is, That this Confession be sworn for the maintenance of Religion, as it is now professed, including the Innovations, and Episcopacy, which under that name were ratified by the Kings first Parliament: And if it be objected, that the Marques and the Council do by their Act urge the confession as it was professed in the year 1580. It is answered, that no such Act is yet published by Proclamation: By approving the Proclamation concerning the Ministers Oath according to Act of Parliament, (which is to swear simple obedience to the Diocesan Bishop) we should, say they, seem to determine that the Confession of Faith in 1580 doth consist with Episcopacy, whereas that Question is referred, as other of the like kind, to the Assembly. And they conclude, with an appeal from the Lords of the Council to the next general Assembly, exhorting all to subscribe the Confession and Covenant, as by them explained and applied, and hold back their hands from all other Covenants, till the Assembly be convened and determine the present divisions and differences.

The Marques, and the Lords of the Council perceived by this protestation, that the confederates endeavoured all they could to blast the Kings intentions, and they wondred much at their appeal from the Council to the Assembly, which was by Act of the eighth Parliament of King James made High Treason: They saw also, by what the Confederates did, that little good was to be expected from the approaching assembly (which was summoned to appear at the time expressed by the Kings Proclamation) for they had used great Industry, that all that should should be chosen thereunto, should be of the most rigid and most affectionate to their Covenant; and to exclude the Bishops from having any place there, they published, That any persons, cited as Criminals before the Assembly, could have no voice there; and in pursuance thereof, they drew up a Libel against the Archbishops and Bishops, which they exhibited on the 24th of October, to the Presbytery of Edinburgh, who proceeded thereon, as if all the Bishops had been subject to their authority; and after some short consideration of the Libel, which was full of scandal and reproaches of the Bishops, they ordered, that it should be referred to the next Assembly, and that the Libel and their Order of Reference should be read in all Churches with a publick warning and citation to the Bishops, to be present at the Assembly, to answer to the complaints against them.

A Libel drawn up against the Arch Bishops and Bishops, who by this means being made criminals, are excluded from having any Place in their Assembly.

Many judged this proceeding, so contrary to all the Legal forms of Justice, was done on no other design, but to render the Bishops odious to the people; For the Assembly when they came to consider of this matter, enter'd not into the examination of the personal Vices, with which the Libel or Bill of Complaint was filled, but upon the abolishing of Episcopacy it self, though it is evident, that if they had had proofs, they would not have spared the Bishops, whom the Confederates had represented so criminous to the people.

Lay-Elders admitted into their Assembly.

The Bishops Declinator rejected.

The day of the Assembly being come, the Marquess his Commission was Read, and nothing else done considerable that day: The next day a Declinator was presented to the Commissioner in the name of the Arch-bishops and Bishops against the Assembly, and containing a nullity of it, but this was not read without great difficulty: nor was this Declinator of the Bishops the only objection against this Assembly, for the Presbytery of Glasgow, and many other places protested against the legality thereof, because of the admission of Lay-Elders, a thing scarce before heard of in that Church: But they made very much scrutiny in the debate of their own constitution, for by one means or other they excluded every Commissioner, that was not clearly agreeable to the minds of the Confederates. The Declinator of the Bishops they would by no means allow of, but put it to the question, Whether the Assembly, notwithstanding the Bishops reasons against it, were not Lawful, and a competent Judge of the Complaints against them? and it was agreed in the affirmative. The Marquess admired at their carriage, since the chiefs of the Confederates, who so lately protested against the sitting of the Bishops in Council, as parties to their Complaints, and made a Declinator of the Councils Authority, and invalidated all their Acts, made while they were sitting, could now oppose the like, though with more reason offered in this case; for most or all of the Members of the Assembly having bound themselves by Oaths, Covenants, Combinations and Associations against the Bishops, and Episcopacy, (which being analogical to judicial Acts) had barred themselves from being Judges, either of the persons or calling of these Bishops: But the Marquess had yet a deeper resentment of their behaviour for another cause, for the King having nominated six Lords of the Privy Council, to be Assessors to him his Commissioner in that Assembly, they absolutely refused to entertain them, or allow their suffrage, affirming, That were the King himself present, he should have but one voice, and that no negative one neither.

Six Lords of the Privy Council nominated by the King Assessors to the Marquess, refused and denied their Suffrage.

The Marquess concluding from these actions, that no good was like to be done by continuing the Assembly longer, Novemb. the 28th consulted with the Council about its dissolution; and it being agreed in the affirmative, he went to the Assembly, and said to them,

You are now about to settle the Lawfulness of this Judicature, and the competency of it against Bishops, neither of which I can allow; I am glad I have seen this Assembly met, a thing which was supposed his Majesty never intended, and for the further clearing the integrity of his intentions, let this Paper, which I deliver to the Clerk to be read, bear Witness.

The Marquess his Speech to the Assembly.

The Paper being read by the Clerk, was a Declaration, the same in every substantial point with the Declaration, discharging the Service Book, Book of Canons, &c. This Declaration soon after the Reading, was signed by the Commissioner, and required to be entred into the Books of the Assembly; provided that this Act of Registering this Declaration, should be no approbation of the Lawfulness of this Assembly, to the dissolution whereof he was next to proceed, and therefore protested, That whatsoever should be done or said in it, should not be obligatory, or be reputed an Act of a General Assembly: the very night of the intended dissolution of this Assembly, the Marquess assembled the Council to draw up a Proclamation for dissolving it, which being resolved upon, was subscribed by all, but the Earl of Argyle, who began now to shew himself for the Confederates.

A Proclamation for the dissolution of the Assembly.

The Proclamation being formed, and published Novembe 29th, was encountered with a Protestation of the Confederates, That it is Lawful for them to Sit still, and continue the Assembly, and that they would still adhere to all their former Protestations; and accordingly pursuing the Tenor of their Protestations, presently declared six former General Assemblies (which they thought would discern them) to be null, and deprived all the Bishops, and some they excommunicated, and soon after abolished Episcopacy it self, as inconsistent with the Laws of that Church.

Encountred with a Protestation of the Confederates.

Episcopacy abolished by the Assembly.

The Marquess seeing all things tending to a present Rupture, sent to desire leave of the King to return into England; which he obtained, but before he went, he saw an end of the Assembly, which made many Acts, not necessary here to be related, and by their own Authority ordained annual Assemblies, the first whereof was assigned to meet at Edinburgh, the first of July 1639.

Annual Assemblies ordained.

As soon as the Marquess was gone, the Confederates drew up a Declaration, Addressed to all good Christians of England, to justify their intentions and Actions, which had so many undutiful Reflections in it of the Government, that it was suppressed by the King's Authority, and he published a Declaration, to satisfy all his faithful

On the last of October this year, Marie de Medicis, the Widow of Harry the 4th, King of France, and Mother to the Queen, came into England, and was very honourably entertained: Whil'st she staid here, she was lodged at the King's Palace at St. James's, but she finding the King likely to be involved in troubles, to reduce his Subjects of Scotland to obedience, after some Months stay returned into Holland.

The Scots having made all things desperate to accommodation, made vigorous preparations for War, and sent for succours to such of the neighbour Princes and States, from whom they could expect any assistance: They also invited home many Eminent Commanders of their Nation, from Sweden and Holland, to take Employment in their Armies, many of which were at the beginning of the year come to them. They seized on the Castles of Edinburgh and Dunbarton, and all other places of strength in the Kingdom, and took out of Dalkeyth all the King's Arms, and Ammunition, laid there the year before by the Marquess of Hamilton, next they chose Alexander Lesly, an old experienced Officer, to be Captain General of their Armies, to whom all the chiefs of the Confederates (who took Arms) Solemnly swore Obedience in all orders of War, and he swore in like manner, faithfully to exercise his charge.

The Marquess of Argile was sent to take care of those places frontier of Ireland, and the Earl of Montrosse had the charge of Aberdeen, and the more Northern parts, and Colonel Montroe was sent towards the borders of England, to keep all things quiet till the Levies were perfected.

The King in that mean time was not Idle, but made very great Levies in all places, and having got his Army together, he gave the command thereof in chief to the Earl of Arundel, as General, under whom the Earl of Essex was Lieutenant General, and the Earl of Holland General of the Horse, the rest of the Officers were many of them persons of the best quality. And the Army in General consisted of the flower of the Nobility, Gentry and Commonalty of the Nation: With this Army the King sets out on the 27th of March, and comes by easie Marches, within two miles of Berwick, on the 28th of May, where he Incamped, and General Lesly about the same time, marched with the Scotch Army to the borders towards England, and Incamped at Dunce, within four miles of Berwick.

The Marquess of Hamilton sent with a Fleet to Leyth.

The King when he began his March, had sent the Marquess of Hamilton, with a Fleet of Ships well furnisht with Souldiers to Leyth, to attempt that place, and make what Impression he could in those parts to hinder any new Levies, and reduce Edinburgh, Leyth, and what other Forts and Strengths he could to Obedience: He arrived in the month of May with his Fleet in the Road before the Town called the Fryth, where after some stay, he Landed some of his men in a little Island, to give them breath and some refreshments, and there he received a visit from his Mother, a most rigid Covenanter, which made many of the King's Friends suspect his integrity; and the Scots upon the shore that saw this, were heard to say, They knew the Son of such a Mother would not do them hurt.

The Army under Lesly, was but ill armed, for they had not three thousand Musquets amongst them, so that though they put a good face on the Business, they were better prepared for a Treaty than a Battel, nevertheless those of that Nation about the King were not wanting on their part, to make the preparations of their Countrymen very terrible, and the Earls of Trequare and Roxborough, and other Noblemen of Scotland, who had permission to repair to York to the King, as he was in his March, for mediating an Atonement, did so practise upon the English Lords by their insinuations, that they mitigated much the displeasure of some, and quite took off the edge of others, so that after the King had been a while in his Leaguer near Berwick, he was easily disposed to receive Overtures from them, to be received into his grace and favour, which they made with great protestations of their Resolution upon his gracious Assurance of the preservation of their Religion and Laws, to give example to others of all Civil and Temporal Obedience, which could be required or expected from his loving Subjects: This produced a Treaty, for which on the King's part were appointed, The Earls of Pembroke, Salisbury, Berkehire, Sir Henry Vane, and secretary Cook: And for the Scots, the Earls of Roths and Dumfermling, the L. Lowdon, the L. Dowglas, Alexander Henderson, and Archibald Johnston: These having had several Debates, at length, June the 17th concluded upon a Pacification, which on the King's part was expressed by a Declaration of that date: so much whereof as is pertinent for the better understanding of these transactions, is here inserted.

A Pacification made by the King and the Scots.

We are pleased to confirm and make good whatsoever the Marquess of Hamilton our Commissioner hath granted; And that all matters Ecclesiastical shall be determined by the Assemblies of the Kirk, and matters Civil by the Parliament, and other inferiour Judicatories established by Law; which Assembly shall be kept once a year, or as shall be agreed upon by the General Assembly, and our Commissioner for the time being.

That a free and General Assembly be kept at Edinburgh the sixth of August next, where we intend (God willing) to be personally present, and thereafter a Parliament the 20th of August, and there an Act of Oblivion to be passed; And that upon their Disarming and Disbanding of their Forces, dissolving and discharging all their pretended Tables and Conventicles, and restoring to the King all his Castles, Forts and Ammunition, as also his Royal Honours, and to every one of his good Subjects, their Liberties, Lands, Houses, Goods and Means whatsoever taken and detained since the late pretended General Assembly; The King will presently thereafter recal his Fleet, and retire his Forces, and cause Restitution of their Ships and Goods taken since the aforesaid time.

The

The Articles of Pacification were these, the 17th. of June, 1639.

Articles of Pacification.

1. The Forces of Scotland to be disbanded and dissolved within 24 hours after the agreement of the Kings Declaration.
2. The Kings Castles, Forts and Ammunition to be delivered after the said Publication, so soon as he should send to receive them.
3. His Ships to depart presently after the Delivery of the Castles, and in the mean time no interruption of Trade.
4. All Persons, Goods and Ships detained by the King since the first of November, to be restored.
5. No Meetings, Treatings, Consultations or Convocations of any of the Scots, but such as are warranted by Act of Parliament.
6. All Fortifications to desist and to be remitted to the Kings pleasure.
7. To restore to every one their Liberties, Lands, Houses, Goods and Means whatsoever taken and detained from them by whatsoever means since the first of November last.

The King signed the Declaration on the 18th of June, and the same day the Commissioners on each party signed the Articles, and the Scots Commissioners subscribed a short Declarative submission in these words :

A declarative submission subscribed by the Scots Commissioners.

In Obedience to his Majesties Royal Commands, We shall upon Thursday next the 20th. of June dismiss our Forces, and immediately thereafter deliver his Majesties Castles, &c. And shall ever in all things carry our selves like humble and Loyal Subjects, Roths. Dumfermlin. Lowdon. Dowglas. Henderson. Johnston.

The Pacification being thus agreed, the King sent for some of the Scotch Lords, and informed them that he had given Orders to the Marquess of Hamilton to draw off the Fleet, and did intend to have been at Edinburgh at the opening of the Assembly, but that he had received letters from the Queen, which intimated a necessity of his presence at London about some pressing affairs, but he would depute the Earl of Traquair with full power and authority as his High Commissioner to hold the Assembly and the Parliament.

The Earl of Traquair deputed the Kings Commissioner.

Most men thought these graces of the King to his Scotch Subjects, would have obliged them to an inire submission to his authority, but the Confederates had some further designs of trouble : For no sooner was the Kings Declaration published, but at that instant they incountred it with a Protestation of several heads. First, of adhering to the late General Assembly at Glasgow as a Free and General Assembly of the Church, and to all proceedings there, especially to the sentences of Deprivation and Excommunication of the Bishops : Secondly, of adhering to their Solemn Covenant and declaration of the Assembly, whereby the Office of Bishops is abjured. Thirdly, in regard many of the Gentry and the Ministers, who had long attended at Edinburgh during the discussion of the Pacification and the preparatives to it, were to repair to their own homes, whereby such of them as had Suits depending at Law, could not stay at Edinburgh to attend them; they Declared, That if any members of the Colledge of Justice should attend the Session or Term, all their Acts and Sentences of Judgements should be void and ineffectual.

The King could not but resent this Ingratitude, but was forced to temporize, in hopes that at the meeting of the Parliament, some moderate Counsels might temper the minds of the people : he had been so just to those conditions of peace which he granted them, that he immediately discharged his Army, which if he had kept together, or any considerable part of them, untill he had seen their Souldiers disbanded, their Officers cashiered, their Forts and Castles delivered up to him, and some good issue of the Assembly and Parliament to be held at Edinburgh, he had preserved his Honour among Foreign Princes, and crush'd those practises at home which afterward undermined his peace, and destroyed his glories.

The Scots did not punctually perform any one Article, the Castle of Edinburgh was indeed put under the command of Sir Patrick Ruthen by the Kings orders, but they did not slight their Fortifications at Leyth, they still kept their Officers in pay, and continued their meetings and consultations, disquieting, molesting and frightening all of different inclinations; and the more to stir up the people, they dispersed a Scandalous Libell, Entituled, Some Conditions of His Majesties Treaty with the Subjects of Scotland before the English Nobility, are set down here for a Remembrance.

The Scots breach of Articles.

This Paper consisted of eight heads, which were pretended to be drawn out of Notes taken upon the several Discourses with the King about the matter of his Declaration : This was put into the hands of the Earl of Pembroke at his coming from Berwick, who pretended not to have read it, but seal'd it up till he had presented it to the King; The matter of it was very scandalous, & derogatory to the Kings honour ; for all the substance of the Declaration was so qualified thereby, that the whole sense & intention of it was perverted : The King therefore summoned all the English Lords that were privy to these transactions, to meet in Council, who disavowed any such consent of his Majesty as in that Paper was expressed, and therefore both they and all the rest of the Council became Petitioners to the King that it might be burnt by the common Hangman, as a false and scandalous paper, which was done accordingly.

Upon the 6th. of August (old stile) The General Assembly conven'd at Edinburgh according to the Kings Indiction, and sat till the 24th, the chief matters passed were the Confirmation of the Act of the Assembly at Glasgow, the abolishing Episcopacy, the five Articles of Perth, the High Commission, the Liturgie, and the Book of Canons, and ended with rendring thanks to the King for his Indulgence towards them, in the assent of his Commissioner to their Acts, & assigned another to meet at Aberdeen the next year in the moneth of July.

The General Assembly convened at Edinburgh.

The Assembly now ended, the Parliament which was prorogued till the last of August, did again come together : the first four daies produced

The Parliament met again.

1639. duced a high debate about settling their constitution to determine what estate should supply that of the Bishops now abolisht, which being at last agreed, they fell upon other matters concerning Rescissory Acts of former Parliaments, and several consultations tending rather totally to eclipse the Kings Regal Power, and to new model his Government, than to reform abuses: so that he sent an express to the Earl of Trequayr to prorogue the Parliament again till the second of June following.

The Lords Dumfermlin and London presenting a Remonstrance to the King without Warrant from his Commissioner, are sent back without Audience.

The Prince Elector comes to England.

To this Prorogation they very unwillingly submitted, declaring that the King had no power to prorogue them without their consent, and they appointed some of every of the three Estates to continue in Edenburgh till they had made a remonstrance thereof to the King, which before the separation they perfected, and the Earl of Dumfermlin and the Lord Lowdon were sent to present it to him: These coming to the Court without warrant from the Kings Commissioner, were sent back again without Audience, and after a while the Commissioner himself comes up to inform the King of the present condition of Scotland, which being reported to the Council, it was resolved, That the Disobedience of that Nation was not reducible but by force. And thus matters stood between the King and them about the beginning of December, which for the better connexion of the Relations of that affair, we have drawn thus far in time; but we must now look a little back to affairs of England.

The Prince Elector in July this year arrived at the Court of England in prosecution of a design he had to get the Command of the Army of Duke Bernard, Saxon Weymar lately dead, which consisted of a gallant number of Swedes, Germans, and other Nations: The King did like very well of the business, and proposed it to the French Ambassador, offering that the Prince should joyn in perpetual League with France, and that he would contribute what he could to his assistance. The Ambassador seemed to be very well pleased with the offer, and told the King that he doubted not but his Master would approve of it, and that Cardinal Richlieu the chief Minister of that State would be willing to serve the King and the Prince therein: and thereupon he dispatched a Messenger to Paris, to acquaint the French King with the matter; but in the mean while, it was suggested to the King, that Richlieu under-hand fomented the troubles of Scotland, whereby the confederate Covenanters had been encouraged to write a letter to that King for assistance, so that the reality of Richlieu was so much suspected, that the Prince was advised to go privately through France to Duke Bernards Army, of which it was believ'd he might by his appearance easily get the Command. The Prince therefore in Novemb. passed over to Bullen, and from thence endeavored to pass by disguise through France, but at Lyons he was discovered, and taken Prisoner: And the King of France interpreted this action of the Prince of no fair intentions towards him, because it was done in a time of Treaty, so that he was kept under a strict Guard.

A sea-fight between the Spaniards & Hollanders.

The great business of this Summer was a Sea-Fight betwixt the two Navies of Spain and Holland in the Downs, which we shall here insert in the words of Sir John Pennington, the King's Vice-Admiral, who made this following Narration thereof.

The Spanish Fleet consisting of near seventy Sail, bound and designed for Dunkirk in Flanders with a recruit both of men and money, met with the Vice-Admiral of the Holland Fleet, having in his company seventeen small Ships, Sep. the 7th. and entred into a very fierce dispute with them, until the Hollander perceiving himself too weak, got to wind-ward, sailing along towards Dunkirk, and continually firing their Ordnance to give warning to their Admiral, who lay before that Town with the residue of the Fleet: in the first Encounter the Hollanders had two Ships sunk, and the next morning by two of the clock the Admiral came up, and joying with the Vice-Admiral between Dover and Calais, they set upon the Spaniard, and continued a very sharp fight till past Noon, wherein they had much the better, having taken two Gallions, sunk another, and much shattered the rest, though they were but 25 Sail to the Spaniards 60 and upwards, and at length forced them upon the English coast near Dover, where they left them, and bare off for the Coast of France, not willing to attempt any thing against them within the King of England's liberties.

The Spaniards being now got as they thought under the Lee of England's protection, began to plot how to get rid of their bad Neighbours; and the Spanish Resident importuned the King, that he would keep the Hollander in subjection two Tydes, that in the interim they might have the opportunity of shipping away for Spain; but the King being in amity with them both, was resolved to stand neuter, and whereas the Spaniards had hired some English Ships to transport their Soldiers to Dunkirk, the King upon complaint of the Dutch Ambassador, strictly commanded, that none should take in any Spaniards, nor pass beyond Gravesend without Licence, but the Spaniards and the Hollanders plotting a great while counter the one to the other, the Spaniard at length somewhat outwitted his Enemy, and by a Stratagem in the night conveyed away 14 Dunkirk Ships, and in them four thousand men.

In the beginning of October the King sent the Earl of Arundel to the Admiral of Spain, Don Antonio D'Oquendo, desiring him to retreat upon the first fair wind, because he would not they should engage within his Seas, but the wind continued Eastwardly so long (a thing not usual in that Season) as the Hollanders got daily fresh supply from Zealand, so that at length their Fleet was compleated to an hundred Ships, wherewith they encompassed their Enemies within Pistol-shot for four daies: But that which was so long an interview of these two Fleets, at last turned to an Engagement.

On the Eleventh of the same Month, Van Trump the Dutch Admiral charged the Spaniards with Cannon and Fire-ships so furiously, as made them all cut their Cables, and being 53 in number, 23 ran on shore, and stranded in the Downes, whereof three were burnt, two sunk, and two perished on the shore. One of these was a great Gallion, the Vice-Admiral of Gallica commanded by Don Antonio de Castro, which had 52

1639. brass pieces of Ordnance: the remainder of the 23 stranded and deserted by the Spaniards, were man'd by the English, to save them from the Dutch: The other 30 Spanish Ships under the command of the Admirals Don Antonio D'Oquendo, and Lopez Admiral of Portugal, went to Sea and kept in close Order until a great fogg fell upon them, when the Dutch taking the advantage thereof, interposed betwixt the Admirals & their Fleet, and fought them valiantly till the fog cleared up, when the Admiral of Portugal began to flame, being fired with two Holland Fire-ships, which D'Oquendo perceiving, he presently took his course towards Dunkirk, with the Admiral of that place, and some few ships more, for most of the rest were taken. Of these thirty, eleven were sent into Holland, three perish'd upon the coast of France, one near Dover, five sunk in the Fight, and only ten escaped.

These two potent Enemies being both friends to England, the British Seas ought by rule of State to have been an harbour of retreat to secure the weaker from the stronger, not the scene of their hostile engagement, and had this presumptuous attempt of the Hollander been made in times of another temper, it would not, it's like, have been so silently connived at, and their victory might have cost them the loss of England's correspondence: But self-denial is a Christian, not a Martial virtue, and who is able to resist the temptation of an advantage, whereby he may destroy his foe, upon the nicety of exceeding his just limits? Besides, The King, the Dutch well knew, was of a Genius as not querulous, so if provoked very placable, and the disposition of his affairs as well as of his mind dissuaded him at this conjuncture from expostulating the matter with them.

About the 19th of Novemb. being the Anniversary night of the Kings Birth-day, a great part of the walls of the Castle of Edenburgh fell down, and the King having given order for the repair thereof, the Confederate Covenanters would not permit any materials to be carried in for that use, which added much to those resentments, which the King had conceived against them, so that preparations of War went on against them, but the Kings Treasure being exhausted by the last Summers expedition, he consulted with the Lords of the Council of his means of Supply, who considering the present exigence of Affairs, advised the calling of a Parliament, as the best expedient to assist and strengthen him, both with Money, and Counsel; to this the King readily agreed, being ever (till diverted by the practice of intemperate men) a great lover of Parliaments, and in compliance with this advice, a Parliament was intimated to be Assembled on the 13. of April. This resolution was taken the 5th, of December, and the notice given so long before, for two reasons; first, that the Lord Wentworth, Deputy of Ireland (being lately sent for hither on the occasion of these troubles) might in the meantime hold a Parliament in that Kingdom, which he did, and managed so much to the Kings advantage; that an Army of 8000 horse and foot, were speedily raised, and money granted by the Parliament there, to keep them in pay, and furnish them with Ammunition and Armes, and all other necessaries: Secondly, That by the reputation of a following Parliament he might borrow money, for the carrying on of the War, which could not admit of so much delay, as is commonly used in those great Councils, in the granting of subsidies; which last being represented to the Lords of the Council, many of them subscribed to a Loan of great sums of money for the Kings assistance: The Deputy of Ireland being about to return to Ireland, on the errand before expressed, to give good example here, first subscribed 20000 l. the Duke of Richmond as much, and most of the Lords (except the Marquess of Hamilton) and likewise the Bishops, and the Judges and Officers, and dependants of Courts of Judicature, both of the Common and Civil Law, and generally the greatest part of the Gentry, even the Recusants contributed according to their abilities.

The King thus busie in providing against the Scots, they endeavoured to remove the storm hanging over them by an humble Address to him, craving Leave to represent to him the State of all their transactions; The King said, He was accountable by any Subject he had, and would not therefore deny that, which was pretended to be from a whole Kingdom, which he never refused from a private man.

This Answer being sent, The Earl of Dumfermlin, Lord Lowdon, Sir William Dowglas, and Mr. Robert Barkely, attended the King as Commissioners from Scotland, who being admitted, and their Commission examined, it was found, that the two last were not named in nor impowered by it, but the King hoping to gain upon them by lenity, insisted not thereon.

The King appointed a Select Committee of the Council, to hear the Allegations of the Commissioners, as also what could be said by the Earl of Trequayr, touching those matters, where things were handled with so much acrimony, that no good understanding could be arrived at; And at this very time of their addresses to the King by Supplication, the Confederates in Scotland acted very different from peaceable men, for they secured many of the Nobility, and Gentry of that Nation, who stood firm to the King, and now again as they had done the last year, invited and procured to their service many Commnaders from Holland, and other places; but that which manifested most their bad intentions to the King, was a Letter written by the Lord Lowdon, subscribed by himself, and several others of the chief confederates, to the French King, to favour their proceedings, and grant them his assistance; of the which the Original came to the Kings hands, and being known to be Lowdons Character, he was therefore Committed to the Tower.

Cardinal Richlieu was no small incendiary in this difference betwixt the King and Scots, for the King making it alwaies a great Master-piece, to keep the Ballance even betwixt France and Spain, that neither of them being too strong for the other, the affairs of Christendome might be the everer poised, he knew the French design of driving the Spaniard out of Flanders, and the rest of the Netherlands, could not be effected, unless the King were imbroyled at home; So that he he sent his Chaplain and Almoner, Mr. Thomas Chamberlayn a Scotchman, to assist the Confederates in advancing the business, and to attempt all ways of exasperation, and not to depart from them, till he might return with good News, in this Project. Con also the Popes Agent to the Queen, a Scot by Nation, and one Reed of the same Country were very active, & many Scotch Jesuites, at this time in England, were not idle, and Hamiltons Chaplain had often secret communication with Con; all which practises were discovered in a great part by one Andrew Habernsfield, a Nobleman of Bohemia, then become Physician to the Kings Sister, the Palsgrave's Relict, who made it also apparent that many of the Nobility of England, and the chief favourites at Court (among whom the Earl and Countess of Arundell, Secretary Windebanke, and Endymion Porter) were named to be acquainted, and consenting with their transactions. To this the King, out of the bounty of his nature, gave not much credit.

About the later end of this year, John Spotswood, Archbishop of St. Andrews, Primate and Chancellour of Scotland, dyed at London, he was one that by his just desert arrived to those high dignities; in whom there always appeared great prudence in conduct, clearness of Spirit, and solidity of Judgement, he left this world very aged, and it was his happiness, to do it without seeing that desolation, which after happened to his Country, and to be interr'd near his beloved Master King James, in the Abbey Church of Westminster, than which none perhaps contains more magnificent Trophies of death: Near the same time also dyed, that Grave and learned Judge, Sir Thomas Coventry, Privy Counsellor to the King, and Lord Keeper of the great Seal of England fifteen years, one that was a truly loyall Subject, and a good Patriot, and in the administration of Justice so incorrupt, that malice it self stands mute in the blemish of his fame: Sr. John Finch, the Chief Justice of the Common-pleas, succeeded him in the Office of Keeper of the Great Seal.

were given of a happy Union betwixt the King and this Parliament; but in the midst of this expectation some ill instruments at Court by their factious contrivances undermined all, and amongst these the chiefest imputation was laid on Sir Henry Vane the principal Secretary of State, who bore a grudge to the Earl of Strafford, for that he had caused himself to be made Baron of Raby, to which he aspired, it being a Mannor granted to him together with Barny Castle from the Crown: & because he saw the Earl very earnest to incline the King to endeavour by all fair means to gain the affections of the Commons, out of a desire to see a good issue of this Parliament, to the calling whereof it was generally believed none had more contributed than he had done; He resolved to endeavour that the Parliament should rather be abruptly dissolved, than any good success be produced by the Earls counsels; to effect which, on the one side insinuations were made to some, of the dangers to be feared by the Army raised in Ireland in order to Religion, & to others of the justness of the pretences of the Scots, & the good that might be obtained by favouring them in this conjuncture; and on the other side every thing was represented to the King in the worst sense, and that so slyly, as no indirect intentions could be perceived; The matter of supply gave a fit occasion to heighten discontent: For the King being intent to vindicate his honour, which he thought to be trampled on by the insolencies of the Scots, was very earnest in preparing for the War against them, and to enable him therein, he pressed hard for supplies, and offered to the Commons in recompence of their assistance to him, to quit for ever his claim of Ship-money, which at that time being warranted by a Judgement of all the Judges in the Exchequer Chamber, had as good an establishment as our Laws could give it: The Commons were somewhat deliberate in this affair of money, and first they desired security from the King for redress of grievances in three particulars.

mons desire redress of grievances.

First, for clearing the Subjects Property.
Secondly, for establishment of Religion.
Thirdly, for the Priviledges of Parliament.

The Lords seemed somewhat more sensible of the Kings Proposition for supply, and after many conferences with the Commons, did at last dispose them to a compliance, but the Question being in that house asked, how much would serve to answer the present expectation? Secretary Vane demanded twelve Subsidies, which drew them into such high debates, that all things became desperate, so that on the 4th. of May by an unanimous consent of the Kings Council, he was advised to their dissolution, and the Parliament was the next day dissolved.

The Parlia-
ment's dissolved.

It is said this fatal action was precipitated upon some intelligence, that the house of Commons meant to vote against the War with Scotland, which was suggested, for that the day before in the debates for money, some glances had been made at an inquisition into the causes of the War, which were improved to draw on that fatal counsel, and it was likewise reported, that the Marquess of Hamilton was a great Stickler in this matter, 1640. matter; and that he had privately prevailed with the King to dissolve the Parliament before it was proposed in Council, thereby to imbroil his Majesties affairs the more, that he might confirm the Scots and distract the English, to work his own advantages on both.

The Convocation of the Clergy was continued to the 29th of May, and they granted the King a benevolence of four shillings in the pound, for all their Ecclesiastical Promotions; to be paid six years together then next ensuing; but this their continuance, and the Acts then made by them, were censured and condemned in the following Parliament.

The dissolution of this Parliament was by some ill disposed people wrongfully ascribed to the advice of the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, so that on the 9th of May a paper was posted upon the Old Exchange by one John Lilburne, exciting the Apprentices to rise, and rife his House at Lambeth on Monday following, of which he having notice, made provision of some quantity of Arms and Ammunition for his Defence, and in the dead of the Night of the Day appointed, five hundred of the Rabble beset his house, and strove to force an entrance, but were repulsed, and made to depart without doing much more mischief, than asserting their anger in Seditious Language against him, and breaking the windows of the house, the next day many of them upon enquiry were Apprehended and Imprisoned in the White-Lyon Prison in Southwark; but within three daies after some of their Complices got together and came to the Prison and brake it open, and set them free; nevertheless one of the chief Imprisoned Ringleaders was taken, arraigned, condemned, hanged, drawn and quartered on the 21 of May.

The King being disappointed of Supply by the breaking up of the Parliament, was very industrious to get Money otherwaies, to go on in the War; to which end the City of London were sent to for a Loan, and all Knights and Gentlemen, who held Lands in Capite of the King, were summoned to send Men, Horses and Arms, according to their abilities: The Citizens pleaded poverty by want of Trade, and refused to lend, though the City was scarce at any time richer, and the Trade greater; They were luxuriant in wealth and ease by a forty years Peace, and that made them wanton, and apt to take any Impressions; but that which was supposed at this time to be the reason of their backwardness, was a Sentence in the Star-Chamber against the City of London-Derry in Ireland, which belonged to the City of London, whereby for some Misdemeanours, their Charter for that Plantation was declared forfeited to the King, and many Fines were Imposed upon the Inhabitants planted there. But though the City refused, the Gentry generally afforded their help to supply the King, and by that assistance and other before-mentioned Aids, the King had quickly raised a very good Army, whereof the Earl of Northumberland was appointed General, the Earl of Strafford Lieutenant General, and the Lord Conway General of the Horse: Northumberland was sick, and could not go, but the King went himself in Person, so soon as the Queen then great with Child was delivered of her Son Henry who was born at Oatlands on the 20th of July, but in the mean time the Army was on their march Northward, and my Lord Conway marched with the Van some daies before the rest could come up, and as he was marching, news was brought that the Scotch Army was marched to Dunce, which was their old Quarter the last year not far from Berwick: Upon this advice he was ordered to hast forwards towards Newcastle; but ere he got thither, fresh Intelligence came; That the Scotch Army was march'd into England on the 20th of August: The King met this advice in his way to York, and dispatched orders to Conway to do what he could to impede their advance, till the Army could come up; upon this advice Conway calling his Officers together, the result was, that they should keep the pass at Newborne upon Tine to hinder their possessing of Newcastle, where Sir Jacob Ashley had newly entred with his Regiment, but had not time to make any Fortifications: The King made all the haste he could, but by that time he reached North-Allerton, about two daies march on this side of Newcastle, the Lord Conway sent to him an account of a defeat of the Forces under his Command, which they had received at Newborne; The substance of which Action was as followeth;

August the 27th the Lord Conway upon Information of the March of the Scotch Army, and their design upon Newcastle, drew up three thousand Foot, and about twelve hundred Horse to secure the pass at Newborne: The Foot he lodged behind a Breast-work newly cast up for that purpose, and placed the Horse in convenient posts to be ready to receive the Enemy if they came on: General Lesly marched the greatest part of his Army that night to the Rivers side, and before morning planted there nine pieces of Ordnance, which he covered with bushes, that they might not be seen by the English; the next morning he sent a Trumpeter with a Letter to the Lord Conway, desiring leave therein to pass towards the King with their Petition; to which he returned answer, he would let a few pass, but not an Army: Lesly then commanded three hundred Horse to advance into the River, whom the Musqueteers from behind the Works so galled, as they were enforced to retire; Lesly then discharged his Cannon upon the English Foot, which so terrified them, that they quickly left their station, and threw down their Arms, and fled: The Scots Horse encouraged with this Success, plunged into the River, and passed over, and were gallantly received by some of the English Troops commanded by Commissary General Wilmot, Sir John Digby, Captain Nevil, and Captain Daniel O Neale; but they were so over-powered with numbers, that they were forced to retreat in disorder: three hundred of the English being killed and taken in the encounter; Conway then deserted the pass, and lets the Scotch Army without any farther interruption possess Newcastle, which was a little before quitted by Sir Jacob Ashley, as not at that time tenible, but he first sunk his Cannon in the River; Conway retreated with his Troops towards York, to which place the King and the Earl of Strafford with the rest of the Army were marched before, and there by the Lieutenant General he was Accused of not doing his duty

The Scots at their being in England had so formed a way of Intelligence with some of the English Nobility and Gentry, that nothing succeeded well in the Councils or Actions of the King against them, and by this means they took courage to invade the Kingdom, which otherwise they durst not have done, and this treachery was afterwards in the Usurpation of Cromwell, boasted to the Writer of these Papers by Archibald Johnston then Laird of Warriston, who valued himself to have been the chief contriver in it, as that which thereby gave the occasion of Ruine to the Royal Family of the STUARTS. M^r. Frost of Cambridge, afterwards Clerk of the Council of State in the year 1648. after the Murther of this King, was often employed to Scotland in that correspondence, and he carried his Letters in a hollow Staff to prevent discovery, and many others that were in those intrigues, who are yet alive, and we have charity to believe, never intended to see such sad effects of their Councils, as afterwards ensued to the subversion of our Government, and the desolation of one of the most flourishing Kingdoms of Europe.

The Scots Confederates in pursuance of what their friends in England had agreed, declared in a Pamphlet, published at the head of their Army, (which was dispersed in London, and many other places) not to lay down Arms till the reformed Religion were settled in both Nations upon sure grounds, and the Causers and Abettors of their present troubles brought to publick Justice in Parliament, and these Abettors they declared to be the Prelates and their Adherents, but more particularly the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, and the Earl of Strafford: They pretended upon their March into England to take nothing from any of the English, but for ready money or bonds, but they were no sooner seated in Newcastle, but they seized on four Ships laden with Corn, and imposed a Tax of 350 l. per diem on the Bishoprick of Durham, and 300 l. per diem upon Northumberland, which was more than their whole Kingdom could provide for some years after, when an English Army had the power of Scotland, though their Trade was free and greater than it had been many years before, and when much money was monthly brought in by the English in Specie, yet could not more than 6000 l. a month be raised in the the whole Kingdom, and that not without extreme rigour.

The King having lost the occasion of getting a reputation in arms, by being perswaded to the last years treaty at Berwick, and being now in great perplexity by the unfaithfulness of many of those about him, could think of no expedient so good as to call together the great Council of his Peers to advise with them, and therefore Writs were Issued to them to Assemble at Tork on the 24th of September, but this was not very well liked by those who favoured the Scots, whose chief design aim'd at the calling of a Parliament, which they feared the meeting of the Peers might prevent; Wherefore the Earls of Bedford, Hertford, Essex, Warwick, Mouldgrave, Bullingbrook and Bristol, and the Lords Say, Brook, Paget, Mandevile, and the Lord Edward Howard presented a Petition to the King, representing many great distempers and dangers, threatening the Church and State, and his Royal Person, under seven heads.

1. The danger and hazard to which he is exposed in the War, the waste of his Revenue thereby, and the discontents occasioned by the disorders of the Souldiers.

2. Sundry Innovations in matters of Religion.

3. Increase of Popery by employing those of that Religion in places of trust, in commanding men and Arms in the Field, they being not permitted by Law to have any Arms in their Houses.

4. The great Mischiefs that may ensue, if the Forces raised in Ireland should be brought into England.

5. The urging of Ship-money.

6. The heavy charge upon Merchandise, to the discouragement of Trade, and the multitude of Monopolies, whereby the Manufacturers of the Kingdom are burthened.

7. The grief of the Subjects by long intermission of Parliaments, and the dissolution of such as have been called without effect.

For Remedy whereof, They pray that a Parliament may be summoned, whereby the causes of the Grievances that the People lie under may be taken away, and the Authors and Counsellours of them be brought to Tryal and Punishment as their offences shall require. And that the War may be Compos'd without Blood, to the Honour and Safety of the King's Person, the comfort of the people, and the uniting both Realms against the common Enemy of the reformed Religion.

Many of the Citizens of London who were in combination with some of these Lords and the Scots, did so influence the Common Council, that a Petition was framed in the name of all the Citizens of London, also to the same purpose as this of the Lords.

A Treaty with the Rippon.

The Scots proceeded hand in hand with their friends in England in the substance of a Petition to the King about this time presented, requesting that a Parliament might be called in England for settling a Peace between the two Nations: they sent the Petition to the Lord Lenerick Secretary of State for Scotland, who delivered it to the King, but an answer thereunto was respited to the meeting of the Peers.

On the 24th of September, the Peers Assembled at York, and the King at the opening of the Assembly spake to them to this effect, That an Army of Rebels being within the Kingdom, he thought it adviseable according to the Practice of his Predecessors in like Cases, to call them together, that with their advice and assistance, he and they might proceed jointly to the chastisement of their insolencies, and secure him and his good Subjects from their Malice: He said, He had of himself resolved to call a Parliament to meet on the third of November next, and in the mean time he desired their Advice on two points. First, what Answer to give to the Petition of the Rebels (for so he now on all occasions termed the Scots) and in what manner to Treat with them: Secondly, how the English Army should be maintained till Supplies from the Parliament might be had.

The Lords entered into Consultations of these matters, and for their better information, the King caused a true Relation to be given to them of the state of the whole business, and upon what reason and advices, the unanimous consent of the Privy Council for this War was guided: After many debates, To the first point, they advised the King to a Treaty with the Scots; and to the second, they used their Mediation with the City of London for a Loan to the King for the present support of his Army: A Message was hereupon sent to the Scots to intimate his Majesties consent that a Treaty should be had at York betwixt him and them; The Scots replied, They held that no place of security for their Commissioners, considering that the Lieutenant of Ireland, who had his residence there, commanded his Majesties Army, and who proclaimed them Traytors in Ireland before the King had done it in England, and against whom as a chief Incendiary they intended to complain; hereupon it was concluded that the Treaty should be at Rippon, and the King appointed six Earls, and as many Barons to be Commissioners on his part, and the Scots nominated as many Noblemen on theirs, and for the better understanding of the state of the Affair, the Earl of Trequayr, the Kings late Commissioner in Scotland, was ordered to be present, to give account as occasion offered of what had passed in Scotland from the beginning of the troubles; the Earl of Bristol managed the Treaty for the English, and the Lord Lowdon for the Scots, the greatest part of the demands of each side were accorded without great difficulty: That which seemed hardest to the English, was to consent to the raising of monyes in England for the Scots, having an Army of their own at the same time in being: For the Scots notwithstanding their pretences of coming into England without a charge to the Nation, had by this time increased their levies to the sum of eight hundred and fifty pounds a day: Nevertheless, the English Lords willing on any condition to make Peace, agreed with the Scots in the ensuing Articles; Which on the 26th. of October were signed by the Commissioners, and afterwards by the King, but there were many other demands of the Scots referred to a further Treaty, which the King consented to be afterwards holden at London. The Articles agreed at Rippon, were these following.

1. That there be a Cessation of Arms both by Sea and land from this present.

2. That all acts of Hostility do henceforth cease.

3. That both Parties shall peaceably retain during the Treaty, whatsoever they possess at the time of the Cessation.

4. That all such persons who lived in any of his Majesties Forts beyond the River Tees, shall not exempt their Lands which lye within the Counties of Northumberland and the Bishoprick of Durham, from such Contributions as shall be laid upon them for the payment of eight hundred and fifty pounds per diem.

5. That none of the Kings Forces upon the other side of Tees shall give any Impediment to such Contributions as are already allowed for the maintenance of the Scottish Army, and shall fetch no Victuals nor Forrage out of their bounds, except that which the inhabitants and Owners thereof shall bring voluntarily unto them, and that any restraints or detention of Victuals, Chattel or Forrage which shall be made by the Scots within those bounds for their maintenance, shall be no breach.

6. That no recruit shall be brought into either Armies from the time of the Cessation, and during the Treaty.

7. That the Contribution of eight hundred and fifty pounds per diem, shall be only raised out of the Counties of Northumberland, Bishoprick, Town of Newcastle, Cumberland and Westmerland: and that the not payment thereof shall be no breach of the Treaty, but the Counties and Towns shall be left to the Scots power to raise the same, but not to exceed the sum agreed upon, unless it be for Charges of driving, to be set by a Priser of the Forrage.

8. That the River of Tees shall be the bounds of both Armies (excepting alwaies the Town and Castle of Stockton, and the Village of Egiliff) and the Counties of Northumberland and Bishoprick, be the limits within which the Scottish Army is to reside, having liberty for them to send such Convoys as shall be necessary for the gathering up only of the Contribution, which shall be unpaid by the Counties of Northumberland and Cumberland.

9. That if any Person commit any private insolence, it shall be no breach of the Treaty, if upon complaint made by either Parties, reparation and punishment be granted.

10. If no Victuals be delivered upon the prices which shall be agreed upon, and ready money offered for the same and refused, it shall be no breach of the Cessation to take such Victuals, paying such prices.

11. No New Fortifications to be made during the Treaty against either Parties.

12. That the Subjects of both Kingdoms may in their Trade of Commerce freely pass to and fro, without any stay at all, but it is particularly provided that no Member of either Army, pass without a formal Pass, under the hands of the General, or of him that commands in chief.

by the Confederates after some time discovered, that notwithstanding their fair pretences, they had no good intentions to the King, and was therefore willing to leave their party; he had in the Army two Regiments of Foot, and one of Horse, and there were five or six Regiments amongst his Friends: the first distaste he took, was a little time after the Pacification, when he perceived the Confederates to make no further use of it, than to gain time of greater strength, to set up thereby a kind of arbitrary Despotical Government, but finding the people so insatuated by the speciousness of their pretences, he was forced to continue his former vigor in acting with them, that they might have no jealousy of him, and upon the advance of the Scotch Army to invade England, he was the first that march'd out of the Kingdom at the head of his own Regiment; but during the Treaty at Rippon, he found means to write a Letter to the King wherein he assured him of his fidelity, and a most ready Obedience to him: this Letter was by some of the Scotch of the Kings Bed-chamber secretly taken out of his pocket, and a Copy thereof sent to General Lesly: he presently sends for the Earl to him, and told him he had managed a Correspondence with their Enemies, and that he had known the heads of Princes to set off for lesser matters: The Earl required an instance, and thereupon Lesly produced a Copy of his Letter to the King; to which he boldly answered, That he understood not that writing to the King was to hold Intelligence with an Enemy, but rather what became the duty of a Loyal Subject to his Sovereign; this answer did so amuse the General, that he thought it not at that time convenient to pursue the business farther, for fear of a revolt in the Army, wherein Montrose had a great party.

The Earl of Montrose being dissatisfied at the proceedings of the Confederates, sends a Letter to the King to assure him of his Fidelity.

The time now approach'd for the meeting of the Parliament, and great endeavours were used in many parts of the Kingdom, to have such persons chosen as shewed their dislike of the Government of the Church, or had been earnest pretenders for reformation in former Parliaments.

The Parliament assembled.
The Kings Speech.

On the third of November, being the day prefixed, the Parliament Assembled, and the King expressed himself to this purpose, He declared his earnest desire for the happiness and prosperity of the Kingdom, desiring them, as he promised he would, to lay aside all prejudice, and he would now clearly and freely put himself upon the Love and Affection of his English Subjects; willing them to consider the best way for the safety and security of the Kingdom of England, and in order to it, first to think of the chasing out of the Rebels (for so he termed the Scots) and next for satisfaction of their just Grievances, wherein he would heartily concur, that the World might see his Intentions were to make this a glorious and flourishing Kingdom; freely leaving it to them where to begin; and adding, that it should not be his fault if this were not a good and a happy Parliament; and in the conclusion he told them, for their better understanding the state of all affairs, he had commanded my Lord Keeper to give them a short and free account of all Matters.

The King having ended, the Lord Keeper gave them a summary Relation of all things relating to the Scotch Invasion, we will not say Rebellion, for it was ill resented by some considerable persons, that the King in his Speech had represented them under that character, whereof he having notice, told them two days after, he must needs call them Rebels who had invaded England with an Army.

Great was the expectation of all people concerning the success of this Parliament, which was much raised, upon the Kings declared resolution at the opening of it, to concur with them in satisfying all their just Grievances.

The long intermission of Parliaments had produced many mischiefs and inconveniencies in the Government, by the remissness of some, and the rigor of others in Church and State, which inflamed the zeal of many good men of both Houses, at this their meeting, to be very earnest in their endeavours for the redress of Grievances, wherein they were very much heightened by some others of the Lords and Commons House, who were in confederacy with the Scots; and in a kind of Combination to alter the Government of the Church, and therewith to have so much influence on that of the State also, as to gain to themselves honours and advancement into places of power and trust: The pursuit of these things, made them exceed the method and paths of their predecessors, and by fomenting Jealousies, countenancing and procuring tumultuous Petitions and Assemblies by menaces and force, they often obtained the accomplishment of their purposes contriving without doors in private meetings, what they designed to prosecute in their Assemblies. Raising of money by extraordinary means, when necessity was the best argument for so doing, Billering of Souldiers, Innovations in matters of Religion and illegal Imprisonments, were the great Grievances of the Subject now to be redressed: but the means used to remove these, engaged the reformers in process of time in a bloody War, to act over all the same things with greater excess, demonstrating thereby the extreme hazard of intemperate Counsels.

Success in this war enlarged their desires, and extended their ambition, it bred thoughts in them they never thought before, & this was that which drew on the ruine of the King, and with him for some time the subversion of our Monarchy; for many of those that were in the beginning most active for reformation, had not in their prospect the calamity that ensued, and too late repented the errors of their former actions, when they could not stem the violence of that tyde, their impetuosity had swell'd to too great a height. These matters will appear more plainly by what follows in the course of the History, whereof the greatest part as to this Kings Reign will be taken up in the proceedings of this Parliament.

The first weeks business was in settling the five standing Committees, For Grievances, Religion, Courts of Justice, Trade and Priviledges in Elections, and in several declamatory speeches against the exorbitances of Government both in Church and State. A great part whereof were ascribed to the Counsels of the Earl of Strafford, and the Lord Arch-Bishop of Canterbury.

Five standing Committees settled.

The Scottish Commissioners were now come to London in order to the conclusion of some things undetermined at Rippon: These had many private Conferences with their friends of the house of Commons; And it was agreed by them, That the Earl should be immediately impeached at his first coming to the House of Peers, for he was not yet come from York, and this they resolved on to prevent, and be before-hand with him in an Impeachment he had ready against Mr. Pym, and some of the Leading Members of both Houses for holding Intelligence with the Scots, which he intended to have offered in the House of Peers as soon as he had taken his place amongst them: Wherefore those in the Commons House that were concerned, were very industrious in their designs, and the House had not sate many dayes before he was therein declared to be guilty of High Treason, and a secret Committee of five more nominated to collect matter for an Impeachment against him: This was like to take up more time than the Prosecutors could with convenience to themselves allow of, so that the House were prevailed with, upon assertions of particular persons, to Vote, that a General Impeachment of High Treason should be made against him to the Lords, to endeavour thereby to have him sequestred from that House. And on the 11 of November Mr. Pym was sent from the Commons to the Lords with a Message, which he delivered in these words;

Mr. Pym's Message from the Commons to the Lords.

My Lords,
The Knights, Citizens and Burgeses now assembled for the Commons in Parliament, have received information of divers trayterous designs and practises of a great Peer of this House: And by vertue of a Command from them, I do here in the name of the Commons now Assembled in Parliament, and in the name of all the Commons of England, accuse Thomas Earl of Strafford, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland of High Treason; and they have commanded me further to desire your Lordships, that he may be sequestred from Parliament, and forthwith committed to Prison; They have further commanded me to let you know, that they will within a very few dayes resort to your Lordships with the particular Articles and Grounds of this accusation.

The Earl being required to withdraw, it was much debated by the Peers, whether he should be Imprisoned on a General Accusation without any particular Act of Treason charged against him; but upon the Question it was carried in the affirmative: and he being called in, kneel'd at the Bar, And after standing up, the Lord Keeper spake to him as followeth;

The Lord
Keepers Speech to the Earl of Strafford upon his Impeachment.

My Lord of Strafford,
The House of Commons in their own Name, and in the name of the whole Commons of England, have this day accused your Lordship to the Lords of the higher House of Parliament, of High Treason, The Articles they will in a very few dayes produce, in the mean time they have desired of my Lords, and my Lords have accordingly Resolved, That your Lordship, shall be committed to safe Custody to the Gentleman Usher, and be sequestred from the House till your Lordship shall clear your self of the accusations that shall be laid against you: And hereupon he was immediately taken into Custody.

The next day the Commons considering the great Pressures of the Northern Counties by the two Armies that lay upon them; resolved that a hundred thousand pound should be forthwith raised for their maintenance, and till it could be regularly levied, a hundred thousand pound was borrowed in the City upon the Credit of some of the Members of the House of Commons: many Petitions from all parts were brought to them for redress of Grievances, and to be relieved against Orders and Decrees of the Council Table, Star-Chamber, and High Commission Court, which were referred to several Committees, and divers were ordered to be enlarged out of Prison upon these Petitions, especially Pryn, Burton, and Bastwick, who seemed more eminent than the rest of the Sufferers, and a while after by the intercession of the Lords with the King, the Bishop of Lincoln also was freed from his Imprisonment in the Tower.

The King willing to be rid of the Scotch Army, hastened the Commission to the Lords who were employed in the Treaty at Rippon, or any ten of them, to treat with the Scottish Commissioners, or any seven of them, being the Earls of Rothes and Dumfermlin, John Lord Lowdon, Sir Patrick Hepburn, Sir William Douglas, William Drummond, John Smyth Bayliff of Edinburgh, Alexander Wedderburn, Hugh Kennedy, Alexander Henderson, and Archibald Johnston, to take into consideration their demands, and compose all differences arising thereupon, which Commission was passed under the Great Seal of England on the 23 of November, and in a while after the Scots presented their demands, which were eight in number, and afterwards they put in seventeen heads, wherein One, (and that not the least considerable) was, That some Scottish men of respect might be in places of trust about the King, Queen, and Prince: This was that which all their Pretences aimed at notwithstanding their Zeal to Reformation of Religion, and though all they desired else was granted, they never attained their ends in this, for the troubles which they raised, did not only bring after them a Misery to this Nation, but theirs also, and the ring-leaders of them wanted not their part thereof.

Sir Francis Windebanke Secretary of State was aimed at as one of the great Delinquents in the Opinion of the Parliament, being one suspected in his Religion, a great favourer of Priests of the Romish Church; for whom he had obtained many Reprieves, and was thought to be guilty of misdemeanors of a higher nature: But he thinking himself not sufficiently provided to ride out the approaching storm, made his escape into France, where he dyed a Roman Catholick.

In the consideration of Grievances the charge imposed upon the Subject for providing and furnishing of Ships, and the Assessments for raising Money for that purpose, commonly called Ship-money, are Voted by both Houses to be against the Laws of the Realm, and all proceedings in the Case both at the Council Table, Star-Chamber, and Courts of Justice, declared null and void. This was thought a strange way of proceeding; First, because all the Judges had subscribed unanimously to the Lawfulness of it in time of danger, of which danger the King was declared lawful.

1640. to be judge: Secondly, because being brought to a publick test, after it had been argued by Council on both sides in the Courts of Justice, and by all the Judges in the Exchequer Chamber, They passed a definitive Sentence for it on the behalf of the King: Thirdly, because the Votes of the Houses of Parliament were passed without hearing the Kings Council, or calling the Judges to shew the reasons of their Opinions; And fourthly, because the arguments of Justice Crook and Justice Hutton for the illegality thereof, were ordered to be put in Print, and those of the other Judges for the Legality of it suppressed: But those Votes were not by the makers of them deemed a sufficient security against imposing the like charge for the future, but they took in the King's Aid to an Act of Parliament for the confirmation of them. And they now began to consider of a charge of High Treason against the Lord Keeper Finch, and the Judges: In the first whereof they made some expedition, but more deliberate in that of the Judges, being willing to keep a rod over them, that nothing should be declared for Law against their intentions: This Debate of the Ship-money led them to consider of the first occasion of the raising of it, which was because the Parliament immediately preceding the last was dissolved without those supplies the King expected from them; and from hence they were led into an Enquiry of several violations of the Priviledges of Parliament by the commitment of divers Members, and a Judgement against them in the Kings Bench: And then all the Inconveniencies were summ'd up that hapned by the long Intermision of Parliaments, to provide against which, they resolved of a Bill for a Triennial Parliament. These Debates took up many dayes: but in the mean time, whilest these consultations were had for a reformation of the civil State, the Scottish Commissioners and their friends were not idle in their endeavours, to reform or alter the Ecclesiastical State: In Order whereunto many Petitions from all places were delivered to the House of Commons against Ecclesiastical Discipline, the Ceremonies of the Church, and the Government of it by Bishops, amongst which one was presented by Alderman Pennington, subscribed by fifteen hundred Citizens of London.

The Citizens present a Petition against Church-Ceremonies.

This Petition was very surprising to many sober men in the House of Commons, who were not unwilling to have the abuses in the Government of the Church reformed, but could not approve of the alteration of the Government it self, so that after some debate, the Petition was transmitted to another time, but those that favoured the business, though they were not successful in it, fell a while after upon another Argument more plausible, which was an inspection into the legality of the late Convocation, which produced this Resolution of the Commons.

The illegality of the late Convocation resolved upon, and their Canons and Constitutions Voted down.

That the Clergy in a Synod or Convocation, hath no power to make Canons, Constitutions or Laws Ecclesiastical, to bind either Laity or Clergy without a Parliament: And that the Canons are against the Fundamental Laws of this Realm, against the Kings Prerogative, Property of the Subjects, the Right of Parliaments, and do tend to Faction and Sedition.

The Clergy of this Convocation thought

1640. themselves hardly used in these Votes, who thought to have been called by themselves or their Counsel to have justified their proceedings, alledging that it was never known before, that the Convocation had dependance upon the Parliament, either in the calling or dissolving of it, nor in the confirmation and authorising of the Acts thereof, but only on the King himself, as appears by the Statute made in the 26th of Henry the Eighth, and the constant Practice ever since; and it is certain, that before the Canons were subscribed, they were imparted to the King, and by him Communicated to the Lords of the Privy Council, the Judges and the Kings Counsel learned in the Laws of this Realm, being then attending; In the hearing of all which they were read, and by all approved, which had been strange if any thing tending to faction and sedition, or to the diminution of the Subjects Property and the Kings Prerogative, or otherwise against the known Laws of the Land, had been found in them: but the Reputation of the Commons was at this time so great, it was not safe for any to dispute their Actions: The very same day that the Canons were thus Voted down, the Scots Commissioners had presented a Paper to the Parliament, wherein they named the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, an Incendiary, and promised to bring in a complaint against him the Morrow after, this produced an Order in the House of Commons for a Committee to draw up a Charge against him, but the Scots failing to bring in their Complaint the next day, Mr. Hollis the day after, was sent up to the Lords from the Commons with a General Impeachment of High Treason against him, praying that he might be sequestred from Parliament, and in a few days they would resort to them, with the particular ground of their Accusation; immediately upon this the Scots Commissioners sent in their charge, upon the reading whereof he was committed to the Custody of the Usher of the Black Rod, where he continued ten weeks before any particular charge was brought against him: The Lord Keeper Finch was the next great Delinquent against whom the Commons designed to proceed, whereof he having gained intelligence, he moved by his Friends in that House, that he might be permitted to clear himself before them of several imputations that lay upon him; which the Commons agreed to, and on the 21. of December he made an Elegant and Quaint Oration, tending to the Vindication of himself in every particular, but notwithstanding all that he could say, they Voted him that very day a Traytor, upon these considerations.

The Arch-Bishop of Canterbury being impeached of High Treason is committed to the Black Rod.

Lord Keeper Finch Voted a Traytor.

1. For refusing to read the Remonstrance against the Lord Treasurer Weston, 4. Caroli when the Parliament desired it.

2. For soliciting, perswading, and threatening the Judges to deliver their Opinion for the levying of Ship-money.

3. For several illegal actions in Forest matters.

4. For ill Offices done in moving the King to dissolve the last Parliament, and causing his Majesties Declaration thereupon to be put forth.

The next day he was accus'd before the Lords, but he wisely withdrew himself into Holland, and thereby escaped the danger that threatened him, and

He flies over into Holland.

Sir Edward Littleton succeeds in his place.

and a while after Sir Edward Littleton was made Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England in his place.

The King having been some time in treaty with the Dutch Ambassador for a match betwixt the young Prince of Orange and the Lady Mary his daughter, before he would make any conclusion therein, thought fit to communicate the same to the Lords in Parliament, which he did on the 10 of February; the consideration that induced to this treaty, he said were three; First, the matter of Religion, wherein there needed no dispensation, nor fear that his daughters conscience should be any way perverted.

A Match proposed between the Prince of Orange and the Lady Mary, approved by the Parliament.

Secondly, he esteemed a strict alliance and confederacy with the States, as useful to the Kingdom as that of any of his neighbours, especially considering their affinity, neighbourhood, and way of strength; And lastly, the use he might make of this Alliance towards the establishing of his Sister and Nephews. He told them, the Articles of Marriage were in a manner concluded, but not to be ratified till that Alliance should be ended and agreed, which he said he thought not fit to enter upon without their assistance; he then delivered to them, the Propositions offered by him to the States Embassador, which he left to their consideration and free debate, desiring them to make as much expedition in their Counsels as so great a business should require: The Lords communicated this favourable Proposition of the King to the Commons, who resented it very well, and indeed nothing from the King since the first sitting of this Parliament was so acceptable to both Houses, which was a wonder, considering the jealousies of the times. About this time, or a few dayes before, the particular charge against the Earl of Strafford was brought up to the Lords by Mr. Pym under 28 Articles. They had a little while before exhibited some General Articles, to which he could not be forced to answer, but upon this further Impeachment, the Lords required him to answer to the whole, and though the Charge was very long, yet were the Commons so pressing for his answer, that by the 24 of February he delivered it to the Lords, and it was Read in the House, the King being present.

A particular charge brought by Mr. Pym against the Earl of Strafford, whereupon he is committed to the Tower.

Upon the carrying up of this Impeachment, he was taken out of the Custody of the Usher of the Black Rod, and committed to the Tower, he moved the Lords to have Counsel allowed him, which was much opposed by the Commons, but his Accusation having much in it of matter of Law, he had permission to have Counsel: The Articles as they consisted first of Generals, and as they were after distributed into particulars, we shall insert when we come to the Relation of his Tryal.

The Bill for Triennial Parliaments having passed both Houses, was on the 16 of February offered to the King, it was Entituled, An Act for the preventing inconveniencies happening by the Long intermission of Parliaments: and at the same time the Commons presented an Act for the relief of his Majesties Army, and the Northern parts of the Kingdom, which was a Grant of four intire Subsidies: to both which the King gave his Royal assent.

The King gives his assent to the Bill for a Triennial Parliament.

The Bill for Triennial Parliaments was an Act of as great Favour to the Subject as ever pass'd in Parliament; for if the King should refuse to summon a Parliament at the time therein limited; the Chancellor or Keeper might issue out Writs to summon the Peers, and for election of the Commons: and if the Chancellor or Keeper would not do it, any twelve of the Peers might summon the Parliament; and if the Peers should omit the issuing out of summons, the Sheriffs in Counties, and other Magistrates respectively might cause Elections to be made; and if the Sheriffs should refuse, the Freeholders in Counties, and all other persons that have right of choosing, might make Election of Members: And the Members so chosen, were under great penalties obliged to attend: with many other clauses to accomplish the end designed by the Act, which also had in it several expressions too reflecting on the Prerogative: but the King really believing most of the mischiefs then complained of, proceeded from the too long intermission of Parliaments, and being resolved for the future to communicate freely and frequently that way with his Subjects, he consented to it: And this Act of his Grace and Favour, was so pleasing to the Parliament, that upon a conference with both Houses it was unanimously agreed to wait upon the King at Whitehall, and return him their humble thanks, and that night Bone-fires and other tokens of joy were made in the City by Order of Parliament.

On the same day the charge against the Archbishop of Canterbury was carried from the Commons to the Lords by Sir Henry Vane the younger, whereupon he was ordered to the Tower; but upon his humble Suit to the Lords, his commitment was respited till the first of March.

The Archbishop of Canterbury ordered to the Tower.

The Scots Commissioners laboured very much under-hand to introduce their Presbyterian discipline into the Church of England, and by their Confederates had made an active party in the House of Commons, who took frequent occasion of aspersing the Bishops, and in these debates they spared not Episcopacy: also the debate of the forementioned City Petition was now resumed, and many Members spake for the eradication of the Episcopal Hierarchy, amongst which Nathaniel Fiennes, the younger Son of the Lord Say was most vehement, but the Lord Faulkland, the Lord Digby, and many others of great Learning and Integrity, did by the weight of reason so far prevail, that the Order of Episcopacy was yet preserved, though their power was much lessened by a Vote passed in the House of Commons preparatory to a Bill, viz. That no Bishop shall have any Vote in Parliament, nor any Judicial power in the Star-Chamber, nor bear any sway in temporal affairs, and that no Clergy-man shall be in Commission of the Peace: The next thing of Note, was the Tryal of the Earl of Strafford, which began on the 22 of March, and was so remarkable in the circumstances of it, that we shall be very particular in the Relation thereof.

The Bishops Votes in Parliament voted down.

The Earl of Strafford brought to his Tryal.

He came from the Tower about seven of the clock in the morning accompanied with six Barges, wherein were 100 Souldiers of the Tower, all with Partisans for his Guard, and 50 pair of Oars: at his landing at Westminster he was attended with 200 of the Trained Bands, and was Guarded 1640.

Guarded by them into the Hall: The King, Queen and Prince came about 9 a clock, but kept themselves private within their Closets, so that the King saw and heard all that passed, but was seen of none: When the Earl entered the Hall, the Porter asked the Usher of the Black-Rod, whether the Axe should be carried before him or no, who answered, that the King had expressly forbidden it; nor was it the Custome of England to use that Ceremony, but only when the party accused was to be put upon his Jury. Those of the Upper House sat with their Heads covered, those of the Lower House that were present (for they sat not there as a House) were all uncovered. The Bishops upon the Saturday before did voluntarily decline the giving of their Suffrages in matters criminal, and of that nature, according to the provision of the Canon Law, and Practice of the Kingdom to this day, and therefore would not be present, yet withal they gave in a Protestation, that their absence should not prejudice them of that or any other Privilege competent to them, as the Lords Spiritual in Parliament, which was accepted.

The Bishops decline the giving of their Suffrages in the matter.

The Earl of Arundel sat as Lord high Steward of England, and at the Earls appearing commanded the Prosecutors to proceed. Mr. Pym being Speaker of the Committee of the Commons that were appointed to prosecute, gave in the Articles of Impeachment, which we shall here insert as they were read in Court.

The Articles of Impeachment.

1. That he the said Thomas Earl of Strafford hath trayterously endeavoured to subvert the Fundamental Laws and Government of the Realms of England and Ireland, and instead thereof to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical Government by Law, which he hath declared by trayterous Words, Counsels and Actions, and by giving his Majesty advice by force of Arms, to compel his Loyal Subjects to submit thereunto.

2. That he hath trayterously assumed to himself Regal Power over the Lives, Liberties, Persons, Lands and Goods of his Majesties Subjects in England and Ireland, and hath exercised the same tyrannically, to the Subversion of many both of Peers, and others of his Majesties Liege People.

3. That the better to enrich and enable himself to go through with his trayterous designs, he hath detained a great part of his Majesties Revenue, without giving Legal Account, and hath taken great sums out of the Exchequer, converting them to his own use, when his Majesty was necessitated for his own urgent Occasions, and his Army had been a long time unpaid.

4. That he hath trayterously abused the Power and Authority of his Government, to the increasing, countenancing, and encouraging of Papists, that so he might settle a mutual dependance and confidence betwixt himself and that party, and by their help, prosecute and accomplish his malicious and tyrannical Designs.

5. That he hath maliciously endeavoured to stir up enmity and hostility between his Majesties Subjects of England, and those of Scotland.

6. That he hath trayterously broken the great trust reposed in him by his Majesty of Lieutenant General of his Army, by wilfully betraying divers of his Majesties Subjects to death, his Army to a dishonourable Retreat by the Scots at Newborn, and the Town of Newcastle into their hands, to the end that by the effusion of Blood, by dishonour, and so great a loss of Newcastle, His Majesties Realm of England might be engaged in a National and Irreconcilable Quarrel with the Scots.

7. That to preserve himself from being questioned for these and other his trayterous Courses, he laboured to subvert the Rights of Parliaments, and the ancient course of Parliamentary proceedings, and by false and malicious slanders to incense his Majesty against Parliaments. By which words, Counsels and Actions, he hath trayterously, and contrary to his allegiance laboured to alienate the hearts of the Kings liege people from his Majesty, to set a division between them, and to ruine and destroy his Majesties Kingdoms, for which they Impeach him of High Treason against our Sovereign Lord the King his Crown and Dignity.

8. And he the said Earl of Strafford was Lord Deputy of Ireland, and Lieutenant General of the Army there, (viz.) of his most Excellent Majesty for his Kingdoms both of England and Ireland, and Lord President of the North, during the time that all and every of the crimes and offences before set forth were done and committed: And he the said Earl was Lieutenant General of all his Majesties Army in the North parts of England during the time that the crimes and offences in the 5 and 6 Articles set forth were done and committed.

The further Impeachment which was more particular, was thus expressed.

1. That he the said Earl of Strafford the 21 day of March in the eighth year of his now Majesties Reign, was President of the Kings Council in the Northern parts of England.

That he the said Earl being President of the said Council, on the 21 day of March, a Commission under the Great Seal of England with schedules of instruction thereto annexed, was directed to the said Earl and others the Commissioners therein Named, whereby amongst other things, power and authority is limited to the said Earl and others the Commissioners therein named, to hear and determine all offences and misdemeanors, suits, debates, controversies and demands, causes, things and matters whatsoever therein contained, and within certain precincts in the said Northern parts therein specified, and in such manner as by the said schedule is limited and appointed.

That amongst other things in the said Instructions, it is directed, that the said President and others therein appointed, shall hear and determine according to the course of proceedings in the Court of Star-Chamber, divers offences, deceits and falsities therein mentioned, whether the same be provided for by the Acts of Parliament or not, so that the fines imposed be not less than by Act or Acts of Parliament provided for by those offences is appointed.

That also amongst other things in the said Instructions, it is directed, that the said President and others therein appointed, have power to examine, amine, hear, and determine, according to the course of proceedings in the Court of Chancery, all manner of complaints for any matter within the said precincts, as well concerning Lands, Tenements and Hereditaments, either Free-hold, Customary or Copy-hold, as Leases and other things therein mentioned, and to stay proceedings in the Court of Common Law, by injunction or otherwise, by all ways and means as is used in the Court of Chancery.

And although the former Presidents of the said Council had never put in practice such instructions, nor had they any such instructions, yet the said Earl in the Month of May in the said 8th. year, and divers years following did put in practice, exercise and use, and caused to be used and put in practice, the said Commission and instructions, and did direct and exercise an exorbitant and unlawful power and jurisdiction, on the persons and estates of his Majesties Subjects in those parts, and did disinherit divers of his Majesties Subjects in those parts of their inheritances, sequestered their possession, and did fine, ransom, punish and imprison them, and caused them to be fined, ransomed, punished and imprisoned, to their ruine and destruction, and namely Sir Conyers Darcy, Sir John Bourcher, and divers others against the Laws, and in subversion of the same: And the said Commission and Instructions were procured and issued by advice of the said Earl.

And he the said Earl to the intent that such illegal and unjust power might be exercised with the greater licence and will, did advise, counsel and procure further directions, in and by the said instructions to be given, that no Prohibition be granted at all, but in cases where the said Council shall exceed the limits of the said Instructions: And that if any Writ of Habeas Corpus be granted, the party be not discharged till the party perform the Decree and Order of the said Council.

And the said Earl in the 13th. year of his now Majesties Reign, did procure a new Commission to himself and others therein appointed with the said instructions and other unlawful additions.

That the said Commission and Instructions were procured by the solicitation and advice of the said Earl of Strafford.

2. That shortly after the obtaining of the said Commission dated the 21th. of March in the 8th. year of his now Majesties Reign, (to wit) the last day of August then next following, he the said Earl, (to bring his Majesties Liege people into a dislike of his Majesty and of his Government, and to terrifie the Justices of the Peace from executing of the Laws; he the said Earl being then President as aforesaid, and a Justice of the Peace) did publickly at the Assizes held for the County of York in the City of York, in and upon the said last day of August, declare and publish before the people there attending for the administration of Justice according to the Law, and in the presence of the Justices sitting, that some of the Justices were all for Law, but they should find that the Kings little finger should be heavier than the Loyns of the Law.

3. That the Realm of Ireland having been time out of mind annexed to the Imperial Crown of this his Majesties Realm of England, and governed by the same Laws: the said Earl being Lord Deputy of that Realm, to bring his Majesties Liege people of that Kingdom likewise into dislike of his Majesties Government, and intending the subversion of the fundamental Laws and settled government of that Realm, and the destruction of his Majesties liege people there, did upon the 30th. day of September in the ninth year of his now Majesties Reign, in the City of Dublin (the chief City of that Kingdom, where his Majesties Privy Council and Courts of Justice do ordainarily reside, and whither the Nobility and Gentry of that Realm do usually resort for Justice) in publick Speech before divers of the Nobility and Gentry, and before the Mayor, Aldermen and Recorder, and many Citizens of Dublin, & other his Majesties liege people, declare and publish, That Ireland was a Conquered Nation, and that the King might do with them what he pleased; and speaking of the Charters of the former Kings of England made to that City, he further said, that their Charters were nothing worth, and did bind the King no further than he pleased.

4. That Richard Earl of Cork having sued out Process in course of Law for recovery of his possession, from which he was put by colour of an Order, made by the said Earl of Strafford and the Council Table of the said Realm of Ireland; The said Earl of Strafford upon a paper Petition, without legal proceedings, did the 20th. day of February in the 11th. year of his now Majesties Reign, threaten the said Earl of Cork (being then a Peer of the said Realm) to Imprison him, unless he would surcease his Suit, and said, he would neither have Law nor Lawyers dispute or question any of his Orders: And the 20th. day of March in the said 11th. year, the said Earl of Strafford speaking of an Order of the said Council Table of that Realm made in the time of King James, which concerned a Lease, which the said Earl of Cork claimed in certain Rectories or Tythes, which the said Earl of Cork alledged to be of no force, said, that he would make the said Earl and all Ireland know, so long as he had the Government there, any Act of State there made or to be made, should be as binding to the Subjects of that Kingdom as an Act of Parliament. And did question the said Earl of Cork in the Castle-Chamber, upon pretence of breach of the said Order of the Council Table, and did sundry other times, and upon sundry other occasions by his word and speeches arrogate to himself, a power above the fundamental Laws and established Government of that Kingdom, and scorned the said Laws and established Government.

5. That according to such his Declarations and Speeches, the said Earl of Strafford did use and exercise a power above and against, and to the subversion of the said fundamental Laws and established Government of the said Realm of Ireland, extending such his power to the Goods; Free-holds, Inheritances, Liberties and Lives of his Majesties Subjects of the said Realm, viz. The said Earl of Strafford, the 12th. day of December, Anno Dom. 1635. in the time of full Peace, did in the said Realm of Ireland give and procure

1640. to be given against the Lord Mount-Norris, (then and yet a Peer of Ireland, and then Vice-Treasurer and Receiver General of the Realm of Ireland, and one of the Principal Secretaries of State, and Keeper of the Privy Signet of the said Kingdom) a Sentence of Death by a Council of War called together by the said Earl of Strafford without any warrant or Authority of Law or offence deserving any such punishment: And he the said Earl did also at Dublin within the said Realm of Ireland in the Month of March in the 14th. year of his Majesties Reign without any legal or due proceedings or Tryal, give or cause to be given a Sentence of Death against one other of his Majesties Subjects, whose name is yet unknown, and caused him to be put to Death in Execution of the said Sentence.

6. That the said Earl of Strafford without any legal proceedings, and upon a paper Petition of Richard Ralstone, did cause the said Lord Mount-Norris to be disseised and put out of his Free-hold and Inheritance of his Mannor of Tymore in the County of Armagh, in the Kingdom of Ireland, the said Lord Mount-Norris having been two years before in quiet possession thereof.

7. That the said Earl of Strafford in the Holy Trinity in the 13th. year of his now Majesties Reign, did cause a Case commonly called The Case of Tenures upon defective Titles, to be made or drawn up without any Jury or Tryal, or other legal Process, and without the consent of Parties, and did then procure the Judges of the said Realm of England to deliver their Opinions and Resolutions to that Case, and by colour of such Opinions and Resolutions, did without any legal proceeding cause Thomas Lord Dillon a Peer of the said Realm of Ireland, to be put out of possession of divers Lands and Tenements being his Free-hold in the County of Mayo and Roscomen, in the said Kingdom, and divers other of his Majesties Subjects to be also put out of possession, and disseised of their Free-hold by colour of the same Resolutions, without legal Proceedings, whereby many hundreds of his Majesties Subjects were undone, and their Families utterly ruined.

8. That the said Earl of Strafford upon a Petition of Sir John Gifford Knight, the first day of February in the said 13th. year of his Majesties Reign, without any legal Process made a Decree or order against Adam Viscount Lofts of Elye a Peer of the said Realm of Ireland, and Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and did cause the said Viscount to be imprisoned, and to be kept close Prisoner on pretence of disobedience to the said Decree or Order.

And the said Earl without any Authority, and contrary to his Commission, required and commanded the said Lord Viscount to yield unto him the Great Seal of the Realm of Ireland, which was then in his Custody, by his Majesties command, and imprisoned the said Chancellor for not obeying such his command.

And without any legal proceedings did in the same 13th. year imprison George Earl of Kil-dare a Peer of Ireland against Law, thereby to enforce him to submit his Title to the Mannor and Lordship of Castle-Leigh in the Queens County (being of great yearly value) to the said Earl of 1640. Straffords will and pleasure, and kept him a year Prisoner for the said cause, two Months whereof he kept him close Prisoner, and refused to enlarge him, notwithstanding his Majesties Letters for his Enlargement to the said Earl of Strafford directed.

And upon a Petition exhibited in October 1635. by Thomas Hibbotts against Dame Mary Hibbotts Widow, to him the said Earl of Strafford, the said Earl of Strafford recommended the said Petition to the Council Table of Ireland, where the most part of the Council gave their Vote and Opinion for the said Lady, but the said Earl finding fault herewith, caused an Order to be entred against the said Lady, and threatened her, that if she refused to submit thereunto, he would Imprison her and Fine her 500 l. that if she continued obstinate, he would continue her Imprisonment, and double her Fine every month by month: Wherefore she was enforced to relinquish her Estate in the Land questioned in the said Petition, which shortly after was conveyed to Sir Robert Meredith to the use of the said Earl of Strafford.

And the said Earl in like manner did Imprison divers other of his Majesties Subjects upon pretence of Disobedience to his Orders and Decrees, and other illegal commands by him made for pretended Debates, Titles of Lands, and other causes in an arbitrary and extrajudicial course, upon Paper Petitions to him preferred, and no other cause legally depending.

9. That the said Earl of Strafford the 16th. day of February in the 12th. year of his now Majesties Reign, assuming to himself a power above and against Law, took upon him by a General Warrant under his hand, to give Power to the Lord Bishop of Downe and Connor, his Chancellor or Chancellors, and their several Officers thereto, to be appointed to attach and arrest the Bodies of all such of the meaner and poorer sort who, after citation, should either refuse to appear before them, or appearing, should omit or deny to perform or undergo all lawful decrees, sentences and orders issued out against them, and them to commit and keep in the next Gaol, until they should either perform such sentences, or put in sufficient Bail to shew some reason before the Council Table, of such their contempt and neglect; and the said Earl the day and year last mentioned, signed and issued a Warrant to that effect, and made the like Warrant to all other Bishops and their Chancellors, in the said Realm of Ireland to the same effect.

10. That the said Earl of Strafford being Lord Lieutenant, or Lord Deputy of Ireland, procured the Customs of the Merchandise exported out and Imported into that Realm to be farmed to his own use.

And in the ninth year of his now Majesties Reign, he having then Interest in the said Customs (to advance his own gain and lucre) did cause and procure the native Commodities of Ireland to be rated in the Book of Rates for the Customs (according to which the Customs were usually gathered) at far greater values and prices than in truth they were worth: That is to say, Every Hide at 20s. which in truth is worth but five shillings, Every Stone of Wool at thirteen shillings

1640. shillings four pence, though the same ordinarily were worth but five shillings at the utmost, by which means the Custom which was before but a twentieth part of the true value of the Commodities, was enhanced sometimes to a 5th. part, and sometimes to a 4th. and sometimes to a 3d. part of the true value, to the great oppression of the Subjects, and decay of Merchandise.

11. That the said Earl in the 9th. year of his now Majesties Reign, did by his own will and pleasure, and for his own lucre, restrain the exportation of the Commodities of that Kingdom without his Licence, as namely Pipe-staves and other Commodities, and then raised great sums of money for licencing of exportation of those Commodities, and dispensation of the said restraint imposed on them, by which means the Pipe-staves were raised from 4 l. 10 s. or 5 l. per thousand to 10 l. and sometimes 11 l. per thousand, and other Commodities were enhanced in the like proportion, and by the same means by him the said Earl.

12. That the said Earl being Lord Deputy of Ireland on the 9th. of January in the 13th. year of his Majesties Reign, did then under colour to regulate the Importation of Tobacco into the said Realm of Ireland, issue a Proclamation in his Majesties name, prohibiting the Importation of Tobacco without Licence of him and the Council there, from and after the first day of May, 1638. after which restraint, the said E. notwithstanding the said restraint, caused divers great quantities of Tobacco to be Imported to his own use, and freighted divers ships with Tobacco, which he Imported to his own use; And that if any Ship brought Tobacco into any Port there, the said Earl and his Agents used to buy the same to his own use at their own price: And if that the owner refused to let him have the same at under-values, then they were not permitted to vent the same; by which undue means, the said Earl having gotten the whole Trade of Tobacco into his own hands, he sold it at great and excessive prices (such as he list to Impose) for his own profit.

And the more to assure the said Monopoly of Tobacco, he the said Earl on the 23th. day of February in the 13th. year aforesaid, did issue another Proclamation, commanding that none should put to sale any Tobacco by whole-sale from and after the last day of May then next following; but what should be made up into Rolls, and the same sealed with two Seals by himself appointed, one at each end of the Roll: And such as was not so sealed to be seized, appointing 6d. the pound for a reward to such persons as should seize the same; And the persons in whose custody the unsealed Tobacco should be found, to be committed to Gaol; which last proclamation was covered by a pretence of the restraining the sale of unwholsome Tobacco, but it was truly to advance the said Monopoly.

Which Proclamation the said Earl did rigorously put in Execution by seizing the Goods, Fining, Imprisoning, Whipping, and putting the Offenders against the same Proclamation on the Pillory, as namely, Barnaby Hubbard, Edward Cavenah, and John Tumen, and divers others; and made the Officers of State, and Justices of Peace and other Officers, to serve him in com-passing and Executing these unjust and undue Courses, by which Cruelties and unjust Monopolies, the said Earl raised an hundred thousand pounds per ann. gain to himself: And yet the said Earl though he enhanced the Customs where it concerned the Merchants in General, yet drew down the impost formerly taken on Tobacco from 6d. the pound to 3d. the pound, it being for his own profit so to do. And the said Earl by the same and other rigorous and undue means, raised several other Monopolies and unlawful exactions for his own gain, viz. on Starch, Iron-pots, Glasses, Tobacco-pipes, and several other Commodities.

13. That Flax being one of the principal and Native Commodities of that Kingdom of Ireland, the said Earl having got great quantities thereof into his hands, and growing on his own Lands, did issue out several Proclamations, viz. One dated the 21th. day of May in the 11th. year of his Majesties Reign, and the other dated the one and thirtieth of January in the same year, thereby prescribing and injoyning the working of Flax into yarn and threed, and the ordering of the same in such ways, wherein the Natives of that Kingdom were unpractised and unskilful: which Proclamations so issued, were by his commands & Warrants to his Majesties Justices of Peace and other Officers, and by other rigorous means put in execution; and the flax wrought or ordered in other manner than as the Proclamation prescribed, was seized and imployed to the use of him and his Agents, and thereby the said Earl endeavoured to gain, and did gain in effect the sole sale of that native Commodity.

14. That the said Earl of Strafford by Proclamation dated the 16th. day of October in the 14th. year of his Majesties Reign, did Impose upon the Owners, Masters, Purfers and Boat-swains of every Ship, a new and unlawful Oath, viz. That they (two or more of them) immediately after the arrival of any Ship within any Port or Creek in the said Kingdom of Ireland, should give in a true Invoice of the outward bulk of Wares and Merchandises, and number of Goods, and the qualities and conditions of the said Goods, as far as to them should be known, and the names of the several Merchants Proprietors of the said Goods, and the places from whence they were freighted, and whither they were bound to discharge, which Proclamation was accordingly put in Execution, and sundry persons enforced to take the said unlawful Oath.

15. That the said Earl of Strafford trayterously and wickedly devised and contrived by force of Arms in a war-like manner to subdue the Subjects of the said Realm of Ireland, to bring them under his tyrannical power and will, and in pursuance of his wicked and trayterous purposes aforesaid, the said Earl of Strafford in the 8th. year of his Majesties Reign, did by his own Authority without any warrant or colour of Law, tax and Impose great sums of Money upon the Towns of Baltemore, Baudenbridge, Talowe, and divers other Towns and places in the said Realm of Ireland, and did cause the same to be levied upon the Inhabitants of those Towns by Troops of Souldiers with force and arms in a warlike manner: And on the 9th. day of March in the 12th.

^{1640.} year of his now Majesties Reign, trayterously did give Authority unto Robert Savile a Sergeant at Arms, and to the Captains of Companies of Souldiers in several Parts of the Realm, to send such numbers of Souldiers to lye on the lands and houses of such as would not conform to his orders, until they should render obedience to his said orders and warrants, and after such submission (and not before) the said Souldiers to return to their Garrisons: And did also issue the like Warrants unto divers others, which Warrants were in war-like manner with force and Arms put in execution accordingly, and by such war-like means he did force divers of his Majesties Subjects of that Realm to submit themselves to his unlawful commands.

And in the said 12th. year of his Majesties Reign, the said Earl of Strafford did trayterously cause certain Troops of Horse and Foot armed in war-like manner, and in war-like array with force and Arms to expel Richard Butler from the Possession of Castle Cumber in the territory of Idough in the said Realm of Ireland, and did likewise, and in the like war-like manner expel divers of his Majesties Subjects from their Houses, Families and Possessions, as namely, Edward Brewman, Owen Oberman, Patrick Oberman and Sir Cyprian Horsefeilde, and divers others, to the number of about a hundred Families, and took and imprisoned them and their wives, and carried them Prisoners to Dublin, and there detained them till they did yield up, surrender or release their respective Estates and Rights.

And the said Earl in like war-like manner hath during his Government of the said Kingdom of Ireland, subdued divers others of his Majesties Subjects to his will, and thereby, and by the means aforesaid, hath levied War within the said Realm against his Majesty and his liege people of that Kingdom.

16. That the said Earl of Strafford the 22th of February in the 7th. year of his now Majesties Reign, intending to oppress the said Subjects of Ireland, did make a Proposition, and obtained from his Majesty an Allowance, that no complaint of injustice or oppression done in Ireland, should be received in England against any, unless it first appeared that the party made first his address to him in Ireland: And he restored divers Fryeries and Mafs-houses (which had been formerly suppressed by the precedent Deputies of that Kingdom, two of which Houses were in the City of Dublin, and had been assigned to the use of the University there) to the pretended owners thereof, who have since employed the same to the exercise of the Popish Religion.

17. And in the month of May and June last, the said Earl did raise an Army in the said Realm of Ireland, consisting of eight thousand Foot, all of which except 1000 or thereabouts, were Papists, and the said 1000 were drawn out of the old Army there consisting of 2000 Foot, and in their places there were 1000 Papists put into the Army by the said Earl. And the more to engage and tye the new Army of Papists to himself, and to encourage them, and to discourage and wear out the old Army, the said Earl did so provide, that the said New Army of Papists were duly paid, and had all necessities provided for them, and permitted the exercise of their Religion, but the said old Army were for the space of one whole year and upwards unpaid.

18. And the said Earl being appointed Commissioner within eleven several Counties of the Northern parts of England, for compounding with Recusants for their Forfeitures due to his Majesty, which Commission beareth date the 8th day of July in the 5th. year of his Majesties Reign that now is, and being also Receiver of the composition mony thereby arising, and other debts, duties and penalties for his Majesties use, by Letters Patents dated the ninth day of the said July: He to ingage the said Recusants to him, did compound with them at low and under-rates, and provided that they should be discharged of all proceedings against them, in all his Majesties Courts both Temporal and Ecclesiastical, in manifest breach of, and contrary to the Laws and Statutes of this Realm in that behalf established.

19. That the said Earl having taxed and levied the said Impositions, and raised the said Monopolies, and committed the said oppressions in his Majesties name, and as by his Majesties Royal command, he the said Earl in May in the 15th. year of his Majesties Reign, did of his own Authority continue and frame a new and unusual Oath, by the purport whereof among many other things the party taking the said Oath, was to swear that he should not protest against any of his Majesties Royal Commands, but submit himself in all obedience thereunto; which Oath he so contrived to enforce the same on the Subjects of the Scottish Nation inhabiting in Ireland, and out of a hatred to the said Nation, and to put them to a discontent of his Majesty and his Government there, and compelled divers of his Majesties said Subjects there to take the said Oath, some whereof he grievously fined and imprisoned, and others he destroyed and exiled, and namely the tenth of October, An. Dom. 1639. he fined Henry Steward and his Wife who refused to take the said Oath, five thousand pounds a-piece, and their two Daughters and James Grey 3000 l. a-piece, and Imprisoned them for not paying the said Fines; The said Henry Stewards Wife and Daughters, and James Grey, being the Kings liege people of the Scottish Nation, and divers others he used in the like manner. And the said Earl upon that occasion did declare, That the said Oath did not only oblige them in point of Allegiance to his Majesty, and acknowledgement of his supremacy only, but to the Ceremonies and Government of the Church established or not established by his Majesties Royal Authority, and said, that the refusers to obey he would prosecute to the blood.

20. That the said Earl in the 15 and 16 years of his Majesties Reign, and divers years past, laboured, and endeavoured to beget in his Majesty an ill Opinion of his Subjects, namely those of the Scottish Nation, and divers and sundry times, and especially since the pacification made by his Majesty with his said Subjects of Scotland in Summer in the 15th. year of his Majesties Reign, he the said Earl did endeavour to perswade, incite and provoke his Majesty to an offensive War against his said Subjects of the Scottish Nation: and and the said Earl by his Counsel, actions and endeavours, hath been. and is a principal and chief incendiary of the War and discord between his Majesty and his Subjects of England, and the said Subjects of Scotland, and hath declared and advised his Majesty that the demands made by the Scots in their Parliament, were a sufficient cause of War against them; The said Earl having formerly expressed the heat and rancor of his mind, towards his Subjects of the Scottish Nation, viz. The tenth day of October, in the 15th year of his Majesties Reign, he said, that the Nation of the Scots were Rebels and Traytors; and he being then about to come to England, he then further said, that if it pleased his Master (meaning his Majesty) to send him back again, he would root out of the said Kingdom, (meaning the Kingdom of Ireland) the Scottish Nation both root and branch. (Some Lords and others who had taken the said Oath in the precedent Article only excepted.) And the said Earl hath caused divers of the Ships and Goods of the Scots to be stayed, seized and molested, to the intent to set on the said War.

21. That the said Earl of Strafford shortly after his Speeches mentioned in the last precedent Article, to wit, in the 15th year of his Majesties Reign, came into this Realm of England, and was made Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and continued his Government of that Kingdom by a Deputy: At his arrival here, finding that his Majesty had with much wisdom and goodness composed the troubles in the North, and had made a pacification with his Subjects of Scotland: He laboured by all means to procure his Majesty to break that Pacification, incensing his Majesty against his Subjects of that Kingdom, and the proceedings of the Parliament there: And having incensed his Majesty to an offensive War against his said Subjects of Scotland by Sea and by Land, and by pretext thereof to raise money and Forces for the maintenance of that War, he counselled his Majesty to call a Parliament in England, yet the said Earl intended, if the said Proceedings of that Parliament should not be such as should stand with the said Earl of Strafford's mischievous designs, he would then procure his Majesty to break off the same, and by wayes of force and power to raise monies upon the said Subjects of this Kingdom.

And for the incouragement of his Majesty to hearken to his advice, he did before his Majesty and his Privy-Council then sitting in Council, make a large Declaration, that he would serve his Majesty in any other way, in case the Parliament should not supply him.

22. That in the moneth of March before the beginning of the last Parliament, the said Earl of Strafford went into Ireland, and procured the Parliament of that Kingdom to declare their assistance in a War against the Scots; and gave directions for the raising of an Army consisting of 8000 Foot, and 1000 Horse, being for the most part Papists as aforesaid, and confederating with one Sir George Ratcliff, did together with him the said Sir George, trayterously conspire to imploy the said Army for the ruine and destruction of the Kingdom of England, and of his Majesties Subjects, and of altering and subverting the Fundamental Laws of this Kingdom. And shortly after the said Earl of Strafford returned into England, and to sundry persons declared his opinion to be, That his Majesty should first try this Parliament here, and if that did not supply him according to his occasions, he might then use his Prerogative as he pleased, to levy what he needed, and that he should be acquitted both of God and man, if he took some other courses to supply himself, though it were against the will of his Subjects.

23. That upon the thirteenth day of April last, the Parliament of England met, and the Commons House (then being the representative body of all the Commons in the Kingdom) did according to the trust reposed in them, enter into debate and consideration of the great Grievances of this Kingdom, both in respect of Religion, and the publick liberty of this Kingdom, and his Majesty referring chiefly to the said Earl of Strafford and the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, the ordering and disposing of all matters concerning the Parliament: He the said Earl of Strafford with the assistance of the said Arch-Bishop, did procure his Majesty by sundry Speeches and Messages, to urge the said Commons House, to enter into some resolution for his Majesties supply, for maintenance of his War against his Subjects of Scotland, before any course were taken for relief of the great and pressing Grievances, wherewith the Kingdom was then afflicted: whereupon a demand was then made from his Majesty of twelve Subsidies for the release of Ship-money only; and while the said Commons then Assembled (with expressions of great affection to his Majesties Service) were in debate and consideration of some Supply, before resolution by them made; He the said Earl of Strafford with the help and assistance of the said Arch-Bishop, did procure his Majesty to dissolve the last Parliament upon the fifth day of May last: And upon the same day, the said Earl of Strafford did treacherously, falsely and maliciously endeavour to incense his Majesty against his loving and faithful Subjects, who had been Members of the said House of Commons, by telling his Majesty they had denyed to supply him: and afterwards in the same Moneth, did treacherously and wickedly counsel and advise his Majesty to, this effect, viz. That having tryed the affection of his people, he was loose and absolved from all rules of Government, and was to do every thing that power would admit, and that his Majesty had tryed all wayes, and was refused, and should be acquitted both of God and Man; And that he had an Army in Ireland (meaning the Army above-mentioned consisting of Papists his Dependants as is aforesaid) which he might imploy to reduce this Kingdom to Obedience.

24. That in the same moneth of May, he the said Earl of Strafford, falsely, treacherously and maliciously published and declared before others of his Majesties Privy Council, That the Parliament of England had forsaken the King, and that in denying to supply the King, they had given him the advantage to supply himself by other wayes; and divers times he did maliciously, falsely and wickedly publish and declare, That seeing the Parliament had refused to supply his Majesty 1640. in the ordinary and usual way, the King might provide for the Kingdom in such wayes as he should hold fit, and that he was not to suffer himself to be mastered by the frowardness of the people.

And having so maliciously slandered the said House of Commons, he did with the help and advice of the said Arch-bishop of Canterbury, and the Lord Finch late Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England, cause to be printed and published in his Majesties name a false and scandalous Book, Entituled, His Majesties Declaration of the Causes that moved him to dissolve the last Parliament, full of bitter and malicious invectives, and false and scandalous aspersions against the said House of Commons.

25. That not long after the dissolution of the said last Parliament, (viz. in the Month of May and June) he the said Earl of Strafford did advise the King to go on rigorously in levying of the Ship-money, and did procure the Sheriffs of several Counties to be sent for, for not levying thereof, divers of which were threatened by him to be sued in the Star-Chamber, and afterwards by his advice were sued in the Star-Chamber for not levying the same, and divers of his Majesties Loving Subjects were sent for, and Imprisoned by his Advice, about that and other illegal payments.

And a great Loane of 100000*l.* was demanded of the City of London, and the Lord Mayor and Aldermen and the Sheriffs of the said City were often sent for to the Council-Table, to give an account of their proceedings in raising of Ship-Money, and furthering of that Loane, and were required to certify the names of such Inhabitants of the said City as were fit to lend, which they with much humility refusing to do, he the said Earl of Strafford did use these or the like speeches, viz. That they deserved to be put to fine and ransom, and that no good would be done with them, till an example were made of them, they were laid by the heels, and some of the Aldermen hanged up.

26. That the said Earl of Strafford by wicked Council having brought his Majesty into excessive charges without any just cause he did in the Month of July last (for the support of the said great charges) counsel and approve two dangerous projects.

1. To seize upon the Bullion, and the Money in the Mint.

2. And to embase his Majesties coyn with the mixtures of brass.

And accordingly he procured one hundred and thirty thousand pounds, which was then in the Mint, and belonging to divers Merchant-strangers and others, to be seized on and stayed to his Majesties use: And when divers Merchants of London owners of the said Bullion, came to his house to let him understand what great mischief that course would produce here and in other parts, and what prejudice it would be to the Kingdom by discrediting the Mint, and hindering the Importation of Bullion: He the said Earl told them, that the City of London dealt undutifully and unthankfully with his Majesty, and that if any hurt came to them, they might thank themselves; and that it was the course of other Princes to 1640. make use of such Moneys to serve their occasions.

And when in the same Month of July, the Officers of his Majesties Mint came to him, and gave him divers reasons against the embasing of the said Money, he told them, that the French King did use to send Commissaries of Horse with Commissions to search into mens Estates, and to peruse their Accounts, that so they might know what to Levy of them by force, which they did accordingly Levy: and turning to the Lord Cottington, said, That this was a point worthy his Lordships consideration.

27. That in or about the Month of August last, he was made Lieutenant General of all his Majesties Forces in the Northern parts against the Scots, and being at York, did in the Month of September by his own Authority, and without any lawful Warrant, Impose a Tax on his Majesties Subjects in the County of York of 8*d.* per diem for maintenance of every Souldier of the Trained Bands of that County, which sums of Money he caused to be levied by force: And to the end to compel his Majesties Subjects out of fear and terrour to yield to the payment of the same, he did declare that he would commit them that refused the payment thereof, and the Souldiers should be satisfied out of their Estates, and they that refused it, were in very little better condition than guilty of High Treason.

28. That in the Month of September and October last, he the said Earl of Strafford being certified of the Scots Armes coming into the Kingdom, being then Lieutenant General of his Majesties Army, did not provide for the Town of Newcastle as he ought to have done, but suffered the same to be lost, that so he might the more incense the English against the Scots: And for the same wicked purpose, and out of a malicious desire to engage the Kingdoms of England and Scotland in a National and bloody War, he did write to the Lord Conwey the General of the Horse, and under the said Earls command, that he should fight with the Scottish Army at the passage over the Tyne, whatsoever should follow, notwithstanding, that the said Lord Conwey had formerly by Letters informed him the said Earl, that his Majesties Army then under his command, was not of force sufficient to encounter the Scots, by which advice of his, he did contrary to the duty of his place betray his Majesties Army then under his Command, to apparent danger and loss.

After these Articles were read, the Earls answer thereunto which he had delivered in writing into the Lords House was also read, and this took up the time till two in the afternoon: at which hour the Court rose, and the Earl was remanded to the Tower, with orders to be there again the next day at eight in the morning.

On Tuesday He came accompanied as before, and staid in the Exchequer-Chamber till nine in the morning, at which time the Court being sat, and the King, Queen and Prince within their Closets, the Earl was brought in.

Mr. Pym one of the Prosecutors began first, and aggravated the charge which was the day before read with many superlative expressions, The main points whereof were, That it was a Treason

Mr. Pym one of the Prosecutors first aggravates the Charge against the 1640.

Treason far beyond the reach of words, that a Native Subject and a Peer of England, the prime Governour of Ireland, the Commander of his Majesties Forces, and a Protestant in Religion, should have in such an impious and gross manner recompensed his Majesties favours, abused his goodness, and drawn all his Dominions into hazard and peril of their Religion, Lives, Goods and Priviledges: That one of these faults alone had been enough and too much for the fulfilling of the exorbitancy and wickedness of any one man, and what punishment could be thought upon sufficient to expiate crimes of such a transcendent nature?

The Earl begins to make his defence.

The Earl with great moderation spake in his own defence to this purpose: He modestly recounted his Services done to the King and Crown of England, and his endeavours for advancement as well of the Honour as Commodity both of England and Ireland; and as to Ireland he said, That there had been more Parliaments there since his Government than in fifty years before; that he had opposed divers Projects and Monopolies, and Improved the Kings Revenue from 50000 lib. per Annum, to 120000 lib. per Annum: That he had restored the Churches maintenance, suppressed the Outlaws, established Obedience to Royal Authority, and restrained the tyranny and usurpation of Great ones over the Commons, yet for the effecting of all these Actions, he reputed himself the most weak and meanest Instrument.

Pym offers three new Articles against him.

To which the Earl answers.

Pym excepts against the Earls answer

The Lords retire a while and return, and grant him no further time.

The Articles are then read.

1. That he had within these two years withdrawn 30000 l. Sterling from the Exchequer in Ireland, and employed it to his own private uses.
2. That in the beginning of his Government, the Garrisons in Ireland had been maintained by the English Treasury.
3. That he had advanced Popish and infamous persons, as the Bishop of Waterford and others to the prime Dignities of the Church of Ireland.

1. To the First, he answered, That thirty thousand pounds were set apart for the Kings late Service as his most special and most pre-emptory Command, for which he produced the Kings own Letter already approved, as his Acquittance at the Exchequer-board in Ireland.

The Earl answers to the three Articles newly entered.

2. To the second, That at the beginning of his Government, as ever before his time, the Garrisons had been burthensome to the Kingdom of England, but that he had so improved the Revenue, that they were now paid by that Crown without any charge to this; for which if the best endeavours of a Subject may justly expect any reward from his King and Countrey, he craved leave to think that he rather deserved many thanks than the least punishment.

3. To the third, He attests all the Clergy of Ireland, if ever he had taken upon him any particular meddling in advancing their Churchmen, or whether he had done any thing concerning such affairs, but upon the special advice of the best and wisest of their number: adding, that when he befriended the Bishop of Waterford he conceived of him as a man of integrity and learning fit for such an Employment, nor was there then the least suspicion of those monstrous Impieties, wherewith he was afterwards charged. That he had now justly suffered for the same, and that he hoped they would not lay a necessity upon him to prophesie and divine of the future conditions and deportments of men: For others of the Church, suspected of Popery, he knew none such, but should answer to the particulars so far as they concerned him, when they should happen to be alledged.

This was all the business of this day; the Lords rose, and the Earl was appointed to come again the next morning, at which time they intended to proceed upon the particular Articles, and give Oath to the Witnesses, for hitherto they had only been upon the general heads.

On the first of the special Articles they insisted not.

The Committee of Prosecutors were, Mr. Jeffery Palmer, Mr. John Maynard, Mr. Bulstrode Whitlock, Mr. John Glyn, the Lord George Digby, Mr. Oliver St. John, Sir Walter Earl, Mr. John Selden, Mr. John Hampden, and Mr. Stroud.

The Names of the Committee of the House of Commons prosecutors of the Earl.

The Lords being sate, and the Earl present on Wednesday in the morning, Mr. Glyn first spake: He said,

The Earl of Strafford was Impeached not with simple but accumulative Treason, for though in each particular such a monstrous Crime could not be deprehended, yet when all conceived in the Mass, and under one view, he should be undoubtedly found the most wicked and exorbitant Traitor that ever was Arraigned at the Bar: he added, That his charge was intending to subvert and change the fundamental Laws, Liberties, and Priviledges of both the Kingdoms, and to introduce an arbitrary and Tyrannical Government: This, he said, could not appear but by the fruits, which were

Mr. Glyn's Speech to the Charge in the second Article.

1640. were either in expression or action. The expressions were;

1. That in the presence of the Justices sitting at York he said, Some were all for Law, but they should find, That the Kings little finger should be heavier than the loins of the Law.

The Earls
Answer.

To this, being the substance of the second Article, the Earl replied, That having spoken sufficiently before to his justification in general, he would by their Lordships favour add these few words, That it did strike him to the heart, to be accused of such a wicked crime, and that such honourable persons who were the Companions of his youth, and with whom he had spent the best of his dayes, should now rise up in judgement against him; yet he thanked God for it, it was not guilt but grief, that so much troubled him; he added, That it was a wonder how he had gotten strength sufficient in such infirmity of body and anguish of mind, to collect his thoughts and say any thing at all for himself: But the Almighty God who knows him to be innocent, had furnished him with some abilities to give testimony to the truth and a good Conscience: He therefore intreated, that if either in judgement or memory, he should at any time fail, it might be imputed to his great weakness: And although the Gentlemen his Accusers should seem more ready in their Accusations, than himself in his Defence, that it might not prejudice his cause, who in very unequal terms, had to do with learned and elequent Lawyers, bred up a long time and inured to such judiciary pleadings, and whose Rhetorick he doubted not might present many things to their view in a multiplying Glass; he told them farther, that for these many years he had been weary of Publick service, and that now it was his resolution after he had vindicated his honour to retire himself, and to enjoy his much longed-for privacy: And yet he could not but say, it had been his hearty wish and desire, to have rather voluntarily resigned his places of honour like a ripe fruit fallen from the tree, than to be violently pulled from thence as a fruitless and unprofitable withered branch.

To the Charge of Treason, he said, That under favour he conceived, although all the Articles contained in his Impeachment were verified against him, yet they could not all amount to Treason, neither simple nor accumulative; for, said he, I do not understand by what interpretation of Law, the diversion of Justice can be called a subversion of the same, or the exceeding of a Commission, the Usurpation of a new Power; To the particular alledged, he replied, That his words were inverted, for that his expression was, That the little finger of the Law, (if not supported by the Regal Power in granting Pardons for the Penalties of the same) was heavier than the Kings loins: That this was his expression, he verified.

1. First by the occasion, for he spake the words a long time since to some who had been imprisoned at York, and were then by the Kings favour set at liberty, whom he incited to thankfulness towards his Majesty by this expression.

2. Secondly, by Sir William Pen-yman, a Member of the House of Commons, who was there present and heard the words: which Sir William declared to be true. 1640.

In the examination of the Witnesses against him to this Article, he convinced one of them of untruth by interrogating, where he was when the speech was heard, and how far distant from him? to which the man replied, He was twelve yards from him: the Earl then said, It was impossible for him to hear a man three yards off, by reason of a deafness he had, which had held him fourteen years, which being found true, the Witness was rejected.

Another Witness Sir David Fowles was brought against him, against whom he excepted as his known and profest Enemy, but that was not allowed of, because in matters of Treason, a mans enemy may Witness against him pro Domino Rege: this was all that was done for that time.

On Thursday he appeared again, and the second expressions in the third Article of the Charge, was charged against him, viz. 1641.

That he had declared that Ireland was a Conquered Nation, and that the King may do with them what he pleased; and speaking of the Characters the former Kings of England made to the City of Dublin, he said, They were nothing worth, and did bind the King no farther than he pleased. The second expression in the third Article charg'd against him.

This was aggravated as a prime Note of his tyrannical Will and Disaffection, that would permit no Law to bound the Subject, but what himself and such as he should appoint might draw by finistrous Informations from a gracious and well-meaning Prince, and if this were admitted, the whole power and liberty of the Republick would utterly be lost.

To this he replied, That the first part of it cannot be denied: and to the second, That he said only, That the King was the Law-giver, which he hoped none could deny without incurring the crime of Treason; and that the Kings Sentence was a Law in matters not determined by Acts of Parliament, which all but disloyal Subjects would grant: professing wishal, that it had been ever his endeavours to have the liberty of the Subject, and the Royal Prerogative follow both in one Channel; knowing, that if either of them crossed other, we could expect nothing but a subversion of the Common-wealth, either by Tyranny or Rebellion: That the Prerogative was like the first; the liberty of the Subject like the second Table, either both or neither can be preserved: That in his duty, he stood obliged, first to the King as Gods Anointed, then in the second place to his Countrey, if it did not cross the Regal Power: And therefore hoped that what he had said was so far from being Treason, that he thought a thousand such expressions would not make up one Felony. This was all the proceedings of this day. The Earl Answers thereunto.

On Friday, two other expressions were urged against him out of the fourth Article:

1. That he would neither have Law or Lawyers dispute or question any of his Orders. Two expressions out of the fourth Article urged against him.

2. In speaking of the Earl of Cork, he said, he would make him and all Ireland know, so long as he had the Government, That any Act of State there 1641. there made or to be made, should be as binding to the Subjects of that Kingdom as an Act of Parliament.

The Earls Answer.

The Earl of Cork was the main Witness to prove these expressions.

The Earl answered, It were hard measure for a Man to lose his Honour and his Life for a hasty word: he confessed, he had often said he would not suffer his Orders to be contemned, because in contempt of him, his Masters Honour would be wounded.

To the second he said, If a proportionable Obedience was not as well due to Acts of State, as to Acts of Parliament, in vain did the Council sit: And that he had done no more than what former Deputies and chief Governours of Ireland had done: And what was agreeable to his Instructions for the Council Table, which he produced.

He convinced the Earl of Cork of two oversights in his Deposition, for he had declared upon his Oath, that the Earl had caused an Ordinance made against him to be interlined, and some words to be scraped out, which words were notwithstanding still found to be in the Ordinance by an Authentick Copy under the hand of Sir Paul Davies, Clark of the Council-Board in Ireland, which the Earl of Strafford produced.

In the next place, the Earl of Cork alledging amongst other things, that he had advanced a Groom of his to be a Preacher.

He disproves what the Earl of Cork alledged against him.

To disprove which, the Earl produced a testimony from the University of Dublin, That the man had been a Master of Arts of ten or twelve years standing before his advancement; adding withal, that my Lord Cork was an excellent Scholar that could breed such Grooms. These matters took up the whole day on Fryday.

Upon Saturday he appeared again, and having (as they said) done with expressions, they would next proceed to his actions, and begin with those concerning his execution of Martial Law against the Lord Mount-Norris and another person, as the matter is laid down in the 5th. Article;

Which they distinguished under four heads.

1. That he exercised Martial Law in time of Peace.
2. That he was both party and Judge in Mount-Norris his Case.
3. That he proceeded summarily in the matter.
4. That he had not heard the exceptions made by Mount-Norris against his Witnesses.

To the first he answered;

The Earl answers the first head of the first Article.

1. That all Armies have been, and must be governed by Martial Law.
2. That there is a standing Army in Ireland, and therefore the case is all one in time of Peace or War; And that the Army might be undone if they should not use Martial Law, but were to expect remedy for the settling of a Mutiny, or assurance of Obedience from the Common Law.

3. That it had ever been the Practice of the Deputies, particularly of Wilmot, Faulkland, Chichester, yea Cork himself, and therefore was no new thing brought in by him: This he proved both by the production of the Military Ordinances, and by divers Witnesses who knew Sentences given in that kind by them.

4. That he had a particular Warrant in his Commission for his Power.

5. That in the Lord Mount-Norris his Case, he was commanded to exercise the same by the Kings particular Letter, both which he caused to be read.

To the second he said, He was not a Judge in the Tryal, but a party which appear'd, in that he sat bare in the Court all the time of Tryal, and gave no suffrage in it, and for further evidence of his being a party, he caused his Brother Sir George Wentworth, in regard of interest of blood, to decline all acting in the process.

To the Third he said, That he being not a Judge in this matter, the Court of War was to be answerable for their own proceedings, and that after a long reasoning he had heard them say, No delay could safely be granted in Martial Courts.

To the fourth he answered, *That he was not a Judge in the Case, and remembers not the exceptions against any Witnesses, adding, That as he had been regular in his proceedings, so he had been moderate in the execution of that Sentence: for though the Lord Mount-Norris justly deserved to Dye, yet he had obtained for him the Kings Pardon for the saving of his Life, and protested that he intended nothing by that Sentence; but in some measure to repair his own Honour, and to give Mount-Norris fair reproof; who was known to be of an exorbitant and licentious tongue and spirit: Adding, That if the House of Commons would go on the same way with him, and assure him that the issue of his Charge should be nothing else but to admonish him for the time to come, he would thank them heartily for it, and study amendment in all his pretended oversights: And whereas Mount-Norris complained, that he had jeeringly told him, when the Sentence was passed and pronounced against him, That e're he lost his head, himself would lose his hand; he answered, That although he had been thought to be insolent and haughty, yet he was never so impertinent to use this expression: if any such were, it was for undervaluing himself in saying, That e're a hair of Mount-Norris should perish, he would lose his hands; And truly (said he) if Mount-Norris would say so to me, even in the worst sence that can be conceived, that e're I dye, he would lose his hand, I would take it very kindly from him. For the other man he avouched, that he himself had voiced to hang him, both because he was an arrant Thief, & also had fled from his Colours, which by the very Common law was justifiable: (and to this effect he cited a Statute 20 Henr. 6. and 7 Henr. 7.) That to fly from their Colours, is Felony: He concluded, *That seeing he was not accessory to the Sentence against Mount-Norris, had not sat there as Judge, had a power to keep Martial Courts by his Commission, had not exercised the same till a new Command came from his Majesty, had done no more than ever was practised in Ireland before his time, and had at last obtained Mount-Norris his pardon, He hoped there was nothing accusable in him but his too remiss and too moderate proceedings.

Mr. Glyn in aggravation of his Exercise of Martial Law said, That he knew the time when the Earl of Strafford was no less active and stirring 1641. ring to enlarge the liberty of the subject, and advance the Petition of Right, than now he is for extending his own Arbitrary and Tyrannical Government.

The Earls
reply.

To this he replied, without the least semblance of Passion, That if at any time he had done the least Service to the House of Commons, he thought his whole Life well spent, nor could they ever so graciously reward him as to give Commission to that Gentleman to express so much before that Honourable Assembly; But withal, he said, If ever any such thing was done by him, he intreated it might now be remembered, and serve to over-balance some slight and mean over-sights committed by him, which he hoped should never make him guilty of Treason, unless it were Treason for a Man to have no more wit and prudence than God and Nature had bestowed upon him. And so much for Saturday.

On Monday the Court sat again, and the Earl appeared, and was charged with the sixth Article, concerning the dispossession of the Lord Mount-Norris of the Mannor of Tymore, which the Prosecutors enforced with many Arguments, saying, this fact was

1. Against an Act of the 7th. of Henr. 6. which provides all matters to be determined by the ordinary Judges.
2. Against the late Proclamation of the King.
3. Against the Practice of all Deputies before that time: withal, they added, that it was a Tyranny that could not be express'd, to exercise this power over the persons of the Peers of the Land and their Goods.

The Earls
answer to the sixth Article.

To this he replied, That for his part in matter of justice (under favour he spake it) he thought there was no distinction to be made betwixt a Peer of the Land, and one of the Commons, except they did think that either fear or faction should do something, which had no place in him. He said,

1. That the Act of H. 6. answered it self sufficiently, both because it excepted the Court of Requests (and that his proceedings were nothing else in Ireland) and also it makes an express reservation of the Kings Prerogative, which he said was his Strength, because he derived his Commission from the King, and that the Act was the most express Warrant in the World for him.

2. The Kings Proclamation mentioned came not out in five years after, wherefore he thought it hard to have a disobedience objected to him for a thing that was not in being, adding, that he wish'd from his heart, they would respect the Kings Command and Commissions, with that tenderness of affection and obedience as he did his Proclamations: He then proved that the like course by summary Proceedings before the Deputies of Ireland, was the constant Practice of all the Deputies that went before him, but nevertheless, He said, he was tender to exercise that Power, till the King (induced by the humble Remonstrance of the meaner sort of people) had most peremptorily and upon just reasons commanded him, causing the Kings Letter in that behalf to be read.

Obj. It was objected, that other Deputies had indeed determined upon suits of Equity, and matters of debt, but not of land.

He replied, That neither he nor they had ever given Sentence or determined any thing concerning 1641. matters of Inheritance, but only concerning violent Intrusion, which was this Case in question, & which fell directly within a suit of Equity: and in deciding this controversy he had, he said, the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolles, and Lord Chief Justice of the common Pleas, to assist him, nor did he hear the business, till the Complainant by Petition had complained of delay of Justice in the Chancery where the suit had long depended, & upon the proofs exhibited in that Court, he made the Decree. He said moreover, the Natives would unwillingly be debarred of relief in this summary way of proceeding, because they had that dispatch in a day or two which the Common Law would not yield in so many years; that as to this matter charged on him, seeing he had done nothing therein but what was customary, necessary & equitable, and the Sentence just, he expected rather thanks from the State than a charge for ill Deportment; He likewise shewed with what extortion and violence the Lord Mount-Norris had taken seisure of that piece of Land, and made the action to appear on his part very foul; and at last he concluded, saying, That he had done no more in Ireland, than the Court of Requests in England usually doth: And that the Chancery Court in Ireland doth the same daily, and the last Chancellor was never charged for such Proceedings, though his Power and Authority was less than his: But the difference of the Person and his Authority (it seemeth) doth difference the matter. And this was the business on Monday.

On Tuesday March the 31th. he was charged with the 7th. Article, to which he answered, That the L. Dillon with others producing his Patent according to a Proclamation on the behalf of his Majesty, the said Patent was questionable, upon which a Case was drawn and argued by Counsel, and the Judges delivered their Opinion thereupon. But the L. Dillon or any other was not bound thereby, nor put out of their Possessions, but might have traversed the Office, or otherwise have legally proceeded, notwithstanding the said Opinions.

Article.

They then proceeded to the 8th. Article concerning a Petition exhibited by Thomas Hibbotts against Dame Mary Hibbotts Widow, to which he answered, That true it is, he had voted against the Lady Hibbotts, and thought he had reason so to do, the said Lady being discovered, by fraud and circumvention to have bargained for Lands of a great value for a small sum. And he denied that the said Lands were after sold to his Use, or that the major part of the Council Board Voted for the Lady, the contrary appearing by the Sentence under the hand of the Clerk of the Council: which being true, He said, he might well threaten her with Commitment, in case she disobeyed the said Order; Neither had he any underhand dealings with Sir Robert Meredith, for the Lady had her own Land back from him; he also declared with what fraud and deceit the Lady had come to her Lands.

to the 8th.
Article.

After this Article, they fell the same day upon the ninth, about the giving of Warrants to the Bishop of Downe and Conner, for apprehending all such persons (and presenting them before the Council Table) as contemned the Ecclesiastical Ordinances.

This was aggravated as a new and Tyrannical form of proceeding against the liberty of the Subject.

1641.

His answer to the 9th
Article.

To this he replied :

First, He produced the Primate of Irelands, Arch-bishop Usher's testimony under his hand, (he being himself sick) that the same course had been used in Ireland before, and that Bishop Montgomery, the Primates Predecessor in the Bishoprick of Meath, had had the same Warrant.

Secondly, He shewed the equity that such assistance should be given to Church-men, who otherwise because of Papists and Schismatics either to God or the King, would have no respect or obedience given them in that Kingdom.

Thirdly, He proved by two Witnesses, that such Warrants were in use before his time.

Fourthly, He said, He had never granted any but that one, and had presently within some few Months called the same in again ; What (said he) was the Bishop of Downs carriage in it, he had no reason to answer for : But he presumed the Bishop could give a satisfactory Answer for himself when he should be called in question ; and so he concluded, That a matter so just, so necessary, so customary and practical before, he hoped should not be charged upon him, as an introduction of a new and Tyrannical form of Government. And therefore submitted himself to the mercy of God, and the equity of his Peers in his Trial thereon. And this was the work on Tuesday.

On Wednesday they charged him with the 12th Article, which was pressed hard upon him by Mr. Glyn, who said, That the Earl of Strafford having established an Arbitrary and Tyrannical Government over the Lives, Lands and Liberties of the King's Subjects, his next desire was to make intrusion upon the Crown it self. That by applying to his own use the publick Revenues, he might be the more enabled to accomplish his disloyal and trayterous Intentions ; to which end having by a new Book of Rates inanced the Customs, he had gotten by advantage of a Lease from the Duchess of Buckingham (which he procured for her, far different from a former Lease to the Duke her Husband) above twenty six thousand pounds yearly, which was a crime of a higher nature than those contained in the preceding Articles, because in those there was some colour or pretext of Justice, here none ; those in particulars, this in general ; those against the Subject only, this against the King himself.

For the Proof of the Charge, they produced the Lease of the Duke of Buckingham, which was read and compared with that Lease to the Duchess of Buckingham (which the Earl hath now by assignment) and some differences were shewn, arising to the sum of 2000 lib. in the Dukes Lease ; the moiety only of concealed and forfeited goods were due to him, but the whole goods to the Duchess in her Lease. Again, the King's Ships of prizes did not pay Customs in the Dukes Lease, in the Duchesses they did : Again, the Impost of the Wines (then belonging to the Earl of Carlisle) was not in the Dukes Lease, in the Duchesses it was : Lastly, Whereas the Earl of Strafford paid but 14000 lib. per ann. for the Custom, it was worth to him, they said, as was apparent by the Books of the Exchequer, 40000 lib. Witnesses were examined.

First, Sir James Hay, who deposed that the Earl of Carlisle had an advantage of 1600 lib. per ann. by his Lease of Wines.

Secondly, The Lord Ranelagh, who deposed, that by the inspection of the Books of Accompts, he had found the Customs to be Anno 1636. thirty six thousand pounds. Anno 1637. 39000 lib. Anno 1638. 54000 lib. Anno 1639. 59000 lib.

With the Proofs they concluded the Charge ; That notwithstanding the Lord Strafford pretended a great measure of zeal and honesty in his Majesties service, yet it is evident, he had abused the trust put upon him, and by withdrawing so great sums of money from the Crown, had weakened the King, prejudiced the subject of the protection they were to expect from him, and had been the cause that the extraordinary waies of Impost and Monopolies had been taken, for supplying of the Royal necessity : And that this Act therefore ought to be enough to make the Charge and Impeachment of High-Treason laid against him.

The Earl replied, That he conceived he had given full satisfaction to all hitherto brought against him, about his pretended arbitrary Government, nor would he spend time in vain repetitions ; and for the present Article, though in all parts it were granted to be true, yet he could not perceive by what interpretation of Law it could imply the least act of Treason ; and when it should be directly charged upon him as a point of Misdemeanor, Oppression, or Felony, he made no doubt, but he should be very able to clear himself abundantly in that point also : yet lest any prejudice might stick to his Honour by these bold assertions, He was content to step so far out of the way as to give answers.

answers to the 12th
Article.

First, That it concerned him nothing, what particulars in the Lease had past betwixt the King and the Duchess of Buckingham ; or whether she had obtained more easie conditions than the Duke her Husband, especially seeing the same was granted some years before his coming to that Government ; yet thus much he could say, that the Duchess had paid thirty thousand pounds fine, and therefore no marvel that her yearly Rent was the less.

Secondly, For the Book of Rates (wherein the chief matter of oppression and grievance seemed to rest) the same was there established by the Deputy Faulkland, Anno 1628. three years before his going into Ireland, and therefore it was exceeding strange in his apprehension, how that could rise up in judgement against him.

Thirdly, That he had his interest in the Customs by assignation of a Lease from the Duchess of Buckingham, which was granted her before his Government, and he never heard it before alleged as a crime of Treason, for a man to make a good bargain for himself.

Fourthly, That not of his own accord, but at the King's special command, he had undergone that Charge ; on hopes that upon the enquiry into the worth thereof, the Customs might be improved for the benefit of the Crown, and the true value thereof discovered ; this he proved by the Lord Cottington and Sir Arthur Ingram.

Fifthly, That when a new Book of Rates

was

1641. was recommended to him by the Council-board of England, in the time of his Lease, which might have been of great advantage to him, he so preferred a fear he had, That the Trade of Ireland might thereby be discouraged, before his own Commodity, as he presumed in all humility to refuse the said Book, and tendered his reasons thereof to the Kingdom and Council-table of England.

Sixthly, That he never understood that the Customs could arise to those great summs alleged, but though they should, yet his advantage was but small; For first, dividing the fourteen thousand pounds he paid to the King into eight parts, five parts thereof was yearly given in upon Oath (and that procured first by himself) at the Exchequer board, the other three parts was divided amongst four of them, which were equal sharers in the Lease, granted before his time: And therefore he was confident, he said, the Lords would rather take his accusation in this Article as an exercise of Rhetorick in the Gentlemen his Adversaries, than as a thing spoken in good earnest by them.

The same day the 11th and 12th Articles were charged against him.

He answers to the 11th Article.

To the 11th concerning Licences for Exportation of Pipe-staves, he answered, The Pipe-staves were prohibited in King James his time, and not exported but by Licence, paying 6 s. 8 d. a thousand, and that he had not raised so much thereby to himself as his Predecessours had done for such Licences.

The 12th Article was more insisted on, and in the opening of it, Mr. Glyn said, That for the further advancement of his tyrannical and avaritious designs, he had of himself established a Monopoly for the restraint of Tobacco in that Kingdom: where they offered five particulars to the proof:

1. That he had restrained the Importation of Tobacco.
2. That in the mean time he had brought in a great quantity himself, and sold the same at exorbitant prices.
3. That of Tobacco already Imported, he had forbidden any to be sold, but what was first sealed by his Officers.
4. That upon a pretended Disobedience, he had punished a great number of people by seizure, imprisonments, fining, whipping, pillory, and such like cruel and inhumane usages.
5. That by these means he had gained 100000^l. yearly.

For proof whereof they produced.

1. The Proclamation for restraining Tobacco, which was read.
2. The Proclamation about Sealing the same.
3. Some Witnesses who declared the Ships had been restrained from landing Tobacco.
4. Others who had known some Tobacco seized on as forfeited.
5. A Remonstrance of the House of Commons in Ireland, declaring that the Earl had sold 500 Tun of Tobacco, which sold at 2 s. 6 d. per pound, amounts to an hundred thousand pounds.

They concluded the Charge, That he had sucked up the Blood of the King's Liege people, and had by this one point of oppression raised great er summs to himself than all the King's Revenue in that Kingdom extended unto, and therefore was liable to the crime of Treason, for troubling the Peace, and bereaving the people of their Goods, who were intrusted unto his Care and Government.

The Earls Reply to this was,

1. That long before his coming to Ireland, the same restraint had been of Tobacco, and the same impost of eighteen pence per pound, enjoined by King James.

He answers to the 12th Article.

2. That at that time the Tradesmen for this Commodity paid but 20 lib. a year to the Crown for the Impost, but now 400.

3. That the Parliament in Ireland 1628. had Petitioned to have the Impost settled by an Act of State for ever afterwards as a part of the Revenue of the Crown.

4. That he had express Command from the King for issuing those Proclamations, and therefore could not imagine more danger in them, than in others for Monopolies in England in the worst sense.

5. That the Proclamations were sent forth not by himself alone, but by the whole Council-board of Ireland.

For the Proclamations, he told them, It was his own Opinion (and if he failed in it he humbly craved pardon, and hoped that it should not be Treason to have no more judgement than God had bestowed on him) that the King was induced by God with a power to make temporary Laws, and cause the same to be promulgated for the good of his people, upon sudden emergent occasions, to which Laws, Obedience is due, till they be abrogated by ensuing Parliaments: that he restrained no man from Importing Tobacco, who was willing to pay the appointed Impost; that for his part, he had never trafficked in all his time therein, nor had any part with the Contractors: And if any Tobacco was seized on, it was in contempt of the Proclamations: And if any person were censured to the Pillory, or Whipping, it was for known Perjury, the ordinary and usual punishment in such a case: Concerning the Tobacco Imported, he said, No consideration was taken of the Prices given for the Tobacco beyond Seas, of the King's Revenue of 40000^l. of the Merchants pains and danger in bringing the same home; for his part, if any advantage were made, surely it was not his, nor could he annul every Contract or Lease made by the King: And therefore seeing his Interest was none, he had done nothing but at the King's direction, and at the advice of the Council-board; since the same Impost was in King James his time, and Petitioned for by themselves in Ireland; he hoped his carriage in the business should be so far from a crime of Treason, that it should rather be thought no crime at all.

So much for Wednesday.

On Thursday he was charged with the 13th Article, to which he made this ensuing Answer;

His answer to the 13th Article.

That he did endeavour to advance the Manufacture of Linnen rather than of Woollen, because the last would be the greater detriment to England: That the Primate of Ireland, the Archbishop of Dublin, Chancellour Loftus, and the Lord Mount-Norris all of the Council, and 1641. and subscribers of the Proclamation were as liable to the charge as himself: That the reducing of that Nation by Orders of the Council-board to the English Customs from their more savage usage, as drawing Horses by their tails, &c. had been of former practice: that the project was of so ill avail to him, as he was the worse for the Manufacture thirty thousand pounds at least by the Looms he had set up at his own charge: As for the Warrants that were issued out to seize upon goods, he affirmed the same to be necessary, because there ought to be no contempt of Proclamations; but that any part did accrue to him, he flatly denied: And if any rigour was used in the execution, he said, Not he, but the Officers were to answer for it, for this might happen in the most just and necessary commands, nor was there ever any complaint presented to him of any such matter.

The same day they proceeded upon the latter part of the 15th Article, waving the 14th, and the former part of this. Mr. Jeffry Palmer urged upon him in these or the like words; That the Earl having by a Tyrannical power inverted the ordinary course of Justice, and given immediate Sentence upon the Lands and Goods of the Kings Subjects, under pretence of Disobedience to his Orders, in prosecution whereof he had laid Souldiers upon the same to their utter ruine: This Article, he said, of it self did contain an individual Treason, so that if there were no more than this, it were more than sufficient to convince him of his Impeachment; two things were offered in proof:

1. The Testimony of one Savil a Serjeant at Arms, who was called forth, and produced the Copy of a Warrant, upon which he had fessed Souldiers.

2. He began to name some Statutes, by which such fessing was Treason. But before he went on to that, the Earl desired to be heard against Savil's testimony, and said, He hoped their Lordships would not upon an Article of such importance admit of the Copy of an Order: he said, No Transcript but an Original can make faith before the King's-Bench in a matter of Debt, and therefore he thought in matter of life and death before the Supreme Judicatory, less would not be allowed of: Moreover, if Copies be at any time received, they are such as are given in upon Oath to have been compared with the Originals, but this was not so.

Glyn hereupon replied, That this Order ought to be admitted, since it was produced by the Officer himself, who best knew it, having executed the same.

The Earl answered, That was the best argument he could use why it should not be admitted: for (said he) Mr. Savil may be charged with Treason, for fessing men of War upon the King's Subjects, he hath nothing for his defence but a pretended Warrant from me: Now what he swears to my prejudice is to his own advantage, nor can a man by any equity in the World be admitted to testify against another, in suam justificationem.

This answer seemed so weighty to the Lords, that they rose and went up to their House; and after an hours stay, they returned, and declared,

That after much deliberation, they had resolved, 1641. that this Copy should not be admitted, and willed them to proceed to other proofs; which after a little pause they did.

1. The Lord Ranelagh affirmed that he heard of such a Warrant, and knew sometimes three, sometimes five Souldiers billeted by it.

2. Mr. Clare declares the very same.

3. Another Deposed, that he had seen such a Warrant under the Deputies hand and seal; and so much for the proof.

For the Statutes alledged, one of Edw. 3. 6. That whosoever should carry about with them English Enemies, Irish Rebels, or Hooded men, and tefs them upon the Subject, should be punished as a Traytor. Another of Henr. 6. 7. That whosoever should fess men of War, in his Majesties Dominions, should be thought to make War against the King, and punished as a Traytor.

The Earls Reply was;

That in all the course of his life, he had intended nothing more than the preservation of the lives, goods and welfare of the King's Subjects, and that he dared to profess, that under no Deputy, more than under himself, had there been a more free and uninterrupted course of Justice.

To the Charge he answered,

1. That the Customs of Ireland differed exceedingly from the Customs of England, as was clear by Coke's Books, and therefore though fessing of men might seem strange here, yet not so there.

2. That even in England he had known Souldiers pressed upon men, by the Presidents of York and Wales, in case of known and open contempts, and that both in point of Outlawry and Rebellion, and also even for summs of Debt between party and party, there is nothing more ordinary than these fessings to this day in Scotland, whereby the chief house of the Owner is seized upon.

3. That to this day hath been nothing more usual in Ireland than for the Governours to appoint Souldiers to put all manner of Sentences in Execution, which he proved plainly to have been done frequently, and familiarly exercised in Grandison's, Faulkland's, Chichester's, Wilmot's, Cork's, and all preceding Deputies times: And had even been done for Outlawries for the King's Debts in the Exchequer, of Collections of Contribution money, and (which comes home to the point) for small summs of money between party and party, so that he marvelled qua fronte or with what boldness it could be called an Arbitrary Government lately brought in by him.

To this the Lord Dillon, Sir Adam Loftus, and Sir Arthur Terringham deposed: the last of whom told, that in Faulkland's time he knew twenty Souldiers fessed upon a man for refusing to pay sixteen shillings sterling:

4. That in his instructions for executing his Commission, he had express Warrant for the same, as were in the instructions to the Lord Faulkland before him, both of which were produced and read.

X x x 2

1641.

5. That although all these Presidents were not, yet it were not possible to govern the Kingdom of Ireland otherwise, which had been from all times accustomed to such summary proceedings.

6. That no Testimony brought against him, can prove that ever he gave warrant to that effect; And for the deeds of the Serjeant at Arms, he did conceive himself to be answerable for it.

And for the Acts of Parliament, he had reserved them to the dispute of his Lawyers, but was content to say thus much for the present.

1. That it is a ground in the Civil Law, that where the King is not mentioned, there he cannot be included: But (with all distance to his sacred Person be it spoken) he conceived himself to be in his Master the Kings place (for so his Commission did run) in that Kingdom of Ireland.

2. The words in the Statute are not applicable to him, for God knows, he never went about in Person to lay Souldiers upon any of the King's Subjects.

3. That the King's own Souldiers, requiring in a Customary way, obedience to his Orders could in no construction be called, Irish Rebels, English Enemies, or Hooded men.

4. That the use and custom of the Law, was the best interpreter thereof, and for that he had already spoken enough.

5. That it favoured more of prejudice than equity, to start out such an old Statute against him and none others, (though culpable of the same fact) to the overthrow and ruine of him and his Posterity.

6. That (under favour he conceived) for any Irish Custom, or upon any Irish Statute, he was to be judged by the Peers of Ireland.

7. The Statute of what force soever was repealed.

1. By the 10th of Henr. 7. where it is expressly declared nothing shall be reputed Treason hereafter, but what is so declared by the present Statute, now not a word is there of any such Treason.

2. By the 11th of Queen Elizabeth, where expressly power is given to the Deputy of Ireland to seise and lay Souldiers, although the same be reputed Treason in any others.

To the Statute of Henr. 6. he replied, That a slender answer might serve, he hoped that no man would think him so inconsiderate to War against the King of Britain and Ireland, by the seising of five Souldiers: That he had been charged by many for taking Arms for the King, but to that time never for taking Arms against him; And that he heartily wished that no man in all his Majesties Dominions had more practices with Rebels and rebellious designs than himself. So much for Thursday.

At the close he desired the intermission of a day, that he might recollect his spirits and strength against the next time of Charge, and with much difficulty obtained rest till Saturday.

On Saturday they proceeded to the 16th Article, which Mr. Palmer charged thus: That the Lord of Strafford having established a Tyrannical and Independent Authority, by giving summary Decrees and Sentences, had deprived the Subject of all just remedy; for in that Kingdom there was no Supreme to himself to whom they might appeal: And lest their just Grievances might be made known to his Majesty, he had obtained a restraint, that no complaint should be made of injustice or oppression done there, till the first address had been made to himself, and that no person should come out of that Kingdom but upon Licence obtained from himself.

To which the Earl replied to this effect.

That the Deputy Faulkland had set out the same Proclamation, That the same restraint was contained in the Statute of 25 Hen. 6. upon which the Proclamation was founded: That he had the King's express Warrant for the Proclamation: That he had also power to do it by the Commission granted to him: and that the Lords of the Council and the Justices not only yielded, but pressed him unto it. That it was done upon just cause, for had the Ports been open, divers would have taken liberty to go to Spain, to Doway, Rhemes or St. Omers, which might have proved of dangerous and mischievous consequence to the State. That the Earl of D'elmond stood at the time of this restraint charged with Treason before the Council of Ireland, for practising against the Life of one Sir Valentine Coke. That the Lord Roch was then a Prisoner for Debt in the Castle of Dublin, and therefore incapable of a Licence; That Parry was not Fined for coming over without Licence, but for several contempts against the Council-board in Ireland, and that in his Sentence he had but only a casting Voice, as the Lord Keeper in the Star-Chamber: He concluded, that he hoped the least suspicion of Treason could not accrue to him from these actings: and for oppression or misdemeanour when it should be laid to his charge, he made no doubt but he was able to answer it.

The 17th and 18th Articles were waved, and on the close of the day Mr. Whitlock charged him with the 19th Article, saying, That he did not only Tyrannize over the bodies, but also over the consciences of men, and to that purpose did contrive and frame a new and unusual Oath enjoined to the Scots in Ireland, and because some of tenderness of conscience did refuse to take the same, he had fined them in great summs of money, banished a great number from that Kingdom, called all that Nation Traitors and Rebels, and said if ever he returned home from England, he would root them out both stock and branch.

For proof of this,

1. Sir James Montgomery was produced, who declared at large how that Oath was contrived.

2. Sir Robert Maxwell of Ochyarden who spake to the same purpose.

3. Sir John Clotworthy, who declared that a great number had fled the Kingdom for fear of that Oath.

4. One Mr. Samuel, who deposed, that upon the 10th of October 1638. he heard the Deputy say these words, That if he returned, he would root them out stock and branch.

They concluded, that this was one of the chiefest crimes he had done against the Privilege and Liberty of the Subject.

The Earl's Reply to the nineteenth Article.

The Earl Replied, That every new Article acquainted him with a new Treason, that if he had done any thing in all his Life acceptable to the King and Country, he conceived it to be this: And to these particulars he answered to this purpose,

1. He desired the Lords would call to mind the condition of those times, no man (pointing to my Lord Steward) knows better than your Lordship, who had in the expedition against the Scots, the chiefest Place in his Majesties Service: I would be very sorry (said he) to rub old sores, especially seeing I hope things are in a fair way to a firm Peace, and I wish that I may not be deceived, that is, that it may be so; only thus much I may say, we had then greater fears and apprehensions in Ireland, lest the Scots in that Kingdom (who were above 100000 Souls) might have joined with their Country-men at home, for the disturbance of our Peace: and we detected a Treason of betraying of the Castle of Knockfergus, to a great man in that Kingdom (whose name I now spare) by one Freeman, who upon the discovery was Executed.

The Council-board in Ireland resolved to prescribe the Scots an Oath, whereby they might declare their discontent to their Country-mens proceedings, and oblige themselves to the King's Service: But while we were about this, they of their own accord came to Dublin to Petition for it, and took it with a wonderful Alacrity and Free-heartedness, so that it is a marvellous thing for any man to say it was invented or violently enjoined by me.

2. About the same time the same Oath, Verbum Verbo, was by the Council of England prescribed to the Scots at London and elsewhere, which was no small encouragement to us in Ireland.

3. I had (said he) which I never shewed, because I had no need before this time, a special Warrant from the King, all written with his own hand to that effect: And when the King commands a matter not contrary to the Law, truly, I (said he) do conceive it both contrary to Law and Conscience, not to yield him all due Obedience.

For the proof brought against him, there was nothing insisted on, to be of any moment but the words.

For the first words, That he had called all the Nation Rebels and Traitors, He said, there was no proof at all, nor indeed could there be any, for if I had said it (said he) I had been perfectly out of my wits; and he thanked God, such irrational speeches used not to escape him: He honoured that Kingdom very much, because it was the Native Soil of our dread Sovereign, his Gracious Master, and because he knew a great part, yea, (he hoped) the greatest part of them had been and ever will be as Loyal and Dutiful to the King as any other of his Subjects; and of those who had subscribed that unhappy Combination, he knew a great many had done it against their hearts and wills, and would ever be ready upon occasion to remonstrate the same, by adhering to the King's Service; so that this accusation was nothing but a wresting and perverting his words and meaning of purpose to make him odious, and irritate a whole Nation against him.

For other words they were proved only by one Witness, which could make no sufficient faith, and that Witness too he could evidence, if not of Perjury, yet of a notable mistake; for he had sworn positively that he had spoken those words the 10th of October, whereas he came out of Ireland into England the 12th of September before, and was at London the 21th.

For those that had fled the Kingdom because of that Oath, he knew none such, and if they did, they fled into Scotland, which might sufficiently argue their intention and resolutions: for his part, if they were not willing to give that testimony of their Loyalty to their Prince, although he had known of their departure, he would have been very loth to have kept them against their wills, but should have been gladly rid of them, and have made them a Bridge to be gone rather than to stay.

Upon Munday, Mr. Whitlock proceeded to the 20th Article, but said, because the matter was consimilis natura, they would join the five next Articles together, because all of them tended to one period, to shew what bad design he had to have subdued the Kingdoms both of England and Scotland by force of Arms, to reduce them to that arbitrary Government he had lately introduced into Ireland.

The Earl intreated they would proceed Article by Article as they had hitherto done, he said, five Articles were many, the matter weighty, his Memory treacherous, and his Judgement weak.

It was sharply Replied by Mr. Glyn, that it doth not become the Prisoner at the Bar to prescribe them in what way they should give in their Evidence.

The Earl modestly answered, That if he stood in his place, he would crave the like favour, unless his abilities did furnish him with more strength than he could find in himself, for his part he was contented they should proceed any way, alwaies provided they would grant him a competent time for Replying.

Then Whitlock went on, and told the Lords, That some things in those Articles concerned the Scottish, some things the English Nation; that which concerned the Scottish, he reduced to five Heads.

1. That the Deputy had said at the Council-board, that the Scots demands contained sufficient matter to perswade to an offensive War.

2. That the same demands did strike at the Root and Life of Monarchical Government, and were only to be answered by the Sword.

3. That he had caused some Scottish Goods and Ships to be seized on in Ireland.

4. That he had engaged the Irish Parliament by their Declaration in that War against the Scots.

5. That by all possible means he put bad thoughts and suspicions into his Majesty against his Scottish Subjects, and laboured to make a National 1641. tional Quarrel between them and England: which if the King's Piety, and the Prudence of better State-men had not prevented, could not have been soldred up again without much blood.

Concerning England, his Speeches were either before, or after the Parliament.

1. Before his Creature and Bosome friend Sir George Ratcliff, he had said to Sir Rob. King, when he was doubting how the King might have moneys to pay the Armies, that the King had 400000 lib. in his purse, 30000 Men in the field, and his sword by his side, and if he wanted money afterwards, who would pity him.

2. That is Brother Sir George Wentworth had said to Sir Robert Barrington, upon the dissolution of the last Parliament, that seeing the English would not grant supply to the King, it seems they were weary of their Peace, and desired to be conquered a second time.

3. That he himself upon a discourse with the Primate of Ireland, had said, That he was much of the mind of those English Divines, who maintained it lawful for a King, having tried the affection and benevolence of his people, and then denied their help, upon an inevitable necessity, and to prevent danger of the Kingdom, that he might use his Prerogative for his own supply, and the defence of his Subjects.

4. To the Lord Conwey in a discourse he had said, that if the Parliament (meaning the last Parliament) should not grant a competent supply, then the King was acquitted before God and Man, and might use the Authority put into his hands.

5. He did say at the Council-Board, that if the Parliament should deny to help the King, he would take any other way he could for his Majesties service and assistance.

His expressions after the Parliament were two.

1. That the Parliament had forsaken the King, and denied to supply him, and that the King should not suffer himself to be over-mastered by the frowardness, obstinacy, and stubbornness of his people.

2. That if his Majesty pleased to imploy Forces, he had some in Ireland, that might serve to reduce this Kingdom.

The Proofs of the Scots Particulars were these,

1. The Earl of Traquayr, who told them, that when he gave in the demands of the Scots, he heard him say, That it was time for the King to put himself into a posture of War, but that 1. All the Council of England said the same as well as he. 2. That it was a double supposition, First, that the demands were truly given in: Secondly, that there was no other Remedy left but Arms to reduce them.

2. The Earl of Mortons testimony, being sick himself, was produced, and it was one and the same with the Article.

3. Sir Henry Vane was examined, who declared that he had heard the Earl advise the King to an offensive War, when his own Judgement was for a defensive.

4. The testimony of the Earl of Northumberland was produced, which was the very same with that of Sir Henry Vane.

5. The Lord Treasurer deposed the same with Traquayr.

6. One Beane from Ireland deposed, that he had known Ships seized on there, but by whose procurement or warrant he knew not.

To the Articles about England.

1. Sir Robert King, and the Lord Ranelagh, deposed the same, that they had heard Sir George Ratcliff speak those words in the Article.

2. Sir Robert Barrington of Sir George Wentworth.

3. The Lord Primate of Ireland's Testimony, who was sick, was the same with the Article.

4. The Lord Conwey deposed the same with the Article.

5. Sir Henry Vane deposed, he did hear those words said at the Council-Table, if the Parliament should deny to help the King, he would take any other way he could for his Majesties service and assistance.

For the two Expressions after the Parliament.

Sir Thomas Jermayn, the Lord Newburgh, the Earl of Bristol, and the Earl of Holland were examined to the first: but the testimony they gave did not reach to prove the words.

And to the second, Sir Henry Vane was examined, who declared that he said either those words, or the like.

At this some of the Lords spake.

1. The Lord Savile, who desired of Sir Henry Vane to know whether he said, their, or this, or that Kingdom, and withal said it was very hard to condemn a man for such petit circumstances.

2. The Earl of Southampton desired to know whether Sir Henry Vane would swear these words positively or not: Sir Henry said, positively either them, or the like; The Earl replied, that under favour, those, or the like, could not be positive.

3. The Earl of Clare desired to know, what could be meant by this Kingdom; for his part, he said, he thought it meant of the Kingdom of Scotland, to which the word (Thk) might very well be relative, that Kingdom being only mentioned in the preceding discourse: and that he was the more ready to be of that opinion, because he could not see, by what Grammatical construction it could be gathered from his words, that he meant to reduce England, which neither then was, neither is now (God be thanked) out of the way of Obedience, nor upon Rebellious Courses.

The Prosecutors at last concluded the Charge, that the words were so monstrous that to aggravate them was to allay them, and therefore they would singly leave them to the Judgement of the Lords.

The Earls reply was;

That though the heaping up of these Articles had put him to a great confusion, yet he would endeavour to bring his Answer to the best method he could, and first he would reply to the Proof, then add something in general for himself, in what a hard taking and lamentable condition he was, to have his private Discourses, his intimate and bosom friends searcht and sifted to the least circumstance, that he might seem guilty of that, which by God's assistance he should never be.

To the Lord Traquayres depositions, he thought their proofs did not much stick upon him; for upon the suppositions, First, that the demands were true: Secondly, that they were not justifiable: Thirdly, that no other course could prevail: He could not see what other advice he could possibly give the King, than to put himself into a posture of War, especially seeing that there was frequent Reports of the Scots Invading or entering into England, neither was he of any other mind, than all the rest of the Council-board.

For that of Mortons, he doth not positively remember the words, but if the demands were read, perhaps they would imply nothing less, and if so, how otherwise to be answered but by the Sword? All other means being first assayed, which is ever to be supposed.

For Sir Henry Vane, and Northumberlands testimony about perswading of an offensive War, He said, he remembered it very well, and thought it as free for him to give his Opinion for an offensive, as they for a defensive War: Opinions (said he) if they be attended with obstinacy or pertinacy, may make a Heretick, but that they make a Traytor, I never heard till now, nor (under favour) shall I be unwilling to acknowledge my weakness, and correct my Errors, whereof no man hath more, nor is more sensible of them, than my self; yet if that Opinion of mine had been followed, it might perhaps have spared us some money, and some reputation too, of which we have been prodigal enough.

For the last about the Ships, it proves nothing, but what he would willingly confess, viz. That some Ships were there detained, and that by himself, and his own direction, as Vice-Admiral of Conaught, but it was at the Command of the Lord Admiral the Earl of Northumberland, and produced his Letter to that purpose.

To the English Proofs, he marvelled much (he said) how Sir George Ratcliffes words could be put upon him; Sir George (though alledged to be his bosom friend) yet had thoughts of his own: No man (said he) can commit Treason by an Attorney, and should I by my friend Sir George as by a Proxy, it would be something strange.

For his Brother, He never knew him before so rash, but that was nothing to him, except they could prove a nearer Identity than nature had instituted, and that his Brothers words and his were all one: yet withal he conceived, that his Brothers words might be very well understood of the Scots Conquering England, but not at all of the Irish; and so he wished with all his heart he had not spoken something which is like Propheeie.

To the Primates Testimony (with all reverence to his integrity be it spoken) he is but one Witness, and in Law can prove nothing: add to this (said he) that it was a private discourse between him and me, and perhaps spoken by me tentandi gratia, and how far this should be laid to a man's charge, Let your Lordships judge.

Yea, this seems to me against humanity it self, and will make the Society of Men so dangerous and loathing to us, that our dwelling Houses will be turned to Cells, and our Towns to Desarts: 1641. That which God and Nature have bestowed upon us, our Tongues (for the greater comfort of venting our own conceptions, or craving the advice of wise and learned Men) shall become to be snares and burdens to us, by a curious and needless fear; yet if my words be taken (said he) with all that went before and followed after, I see no danger in them.

To the Lord Conwey, I may reply the same; with this addition, that it is a very natural motion for a Man to preserve himself, every Creature hath this Priviledge, and shall we deny it to Man, provided this be done in a lawful, though in an extraordinary way; this grain of Salt must be added to all my discourse.

To that of Sir Henry Vane, of offering my Service to the King, I thank him for the Testimony, and think he hath done me much Honour thereby; but if he or anybody else do suspect that his Majesty will employ me in any unlawful Enterprises, I shall think them more liable to the Charge of Treason than my self.

And then he went on saying;

To the first of the subsequent Testimonies, concerning that Expression, That the Parliament had forsaken the King, and denied to supply him, &c. (pretended in the Charge against me, to be said the same day of the dissolution of the Parliament, and urged as a consequence of Malice in me, for having first advised the dissolution, and then endeavoured to incense his Majesty against his people) though no testimony hath yet proved the words, nor is it I hope, believed that I was the principal cause of the dissolution of the Parliament, yet I shall crave leave to relate the matters that occurred previous thereunto.

Before I came to the Council Table, it was Voted by the Lords to demand twelve Subsidies; and Sir Henry Vane was ordered to demand no less; but coming in the interim, I perswaded the Lords to Vote it again, and resume the debate; whereupon it was agreed, That if the Parliament would not grant twelve Subsidies, Sir Henry should descend to eight, and rather than fail to six; but he not observing his instructions, demanded twelve only without abatement or going lower; so that the height of this demand, urged the Parliament to deny, and their denial moved his Majesty to dissolve the Parliament, whereof Sir Henry Vane as I humbly conceive, was the chief occasion.

To that part of the Testimony proved by Sir Henry Vane, That if his Majesty pleased to employ Forces, he had some in Ireland which would serve to reduce the Kingdom: He said to this purpose;

This lies sore upon me, but to that which the Earl of Clare hath said already, give me leave to add this, That the Testimony of one man is not a sufficient Witness, nor can a man be accused, much less condemned of Treason upon this: and for that read the Statutes of H. 7. 12. and of Ed. 6. 5. But to give you further satisfaction, I shall desire all the Lords of the Council which were then present, may be examined, whether they heard those words or not, there were but eight present, with the Arch-bishop, and Sir Francis Windebank; Sir Henry 1641. Henry Vane gives the Testimony, I deny it, four only remain.

Upon the this Testimony of the Lords was taken.

1. The Earl of Northumberland's testimony was read, wherein was declared expressly, that he had never heard those words, nor any like them, but that he spake with great honour and regard of England to the King.

2. The Marquess Hamilton declared that he never heard such words, but that he had often heard the Earl say, that the King was to use his Royal power candide & caste, that it would never be well for this Kingdom till the Prerogative of the Crown and the Privilege of the Subject went in one pace together, and that Parliaments were the happiest means to keep a correspondence betwixt the King and people.

The very same was delivered by the Lord Treasurer and the Lord Cottington; Now, my Lords, said he, you may marvel how these words rested only on the Ears of Sir Henry Vane: but my Lords, (said he) that I may remove all scruples from you, I will make it evident, that there was not the least intention that the Irish Army should set a foot in England, and then I hope you will conceive that I had no meaning to reduce this Kingdom.

This he made clear by the testimony of the Earl of Northumberland, the Oaths of Marquess Hamilton, Lord Cottington, Lord Treasurer, Sir Thomas Lucas, who only were private to that matter.

For other of my words, my Lords, (said he) I desire you would not take them by halves, if so, who should be free from Treason? Certainly if such a President take footing, Westminster-Hall shall be more troubled with Treason than with Common-Law: Look therefore to the antecedents and consequents of my speeches, and you shall find the State of the Question clearly altered: The Antecedents were upon an absolute or inevitable necessity upon a present invasion, when the remedy of Parliament cannot be expected; the consequents to the Kingdom with accompts afterwards to the Parliament: The Qualification too in a lawful, convenient and ordinary way, so far as the present necessity can permit. Add but these, and which of you are not of my mind? Is the King endowed with no power from the Law? Is he not Publicus inspector regni? stands it not him in hand to do something on present necessities?

And that these were his words, he then proved again, by the Marquess, the Lord Treasurer, Lord Cottington, Sir Tho. Fermine.

My Lords, What I have kept to the last (said he) is this, and I would intreat you seriously to think of it: If a man's table, his bed, his house, his brother, his friends, (and that too after they have given an Oath of secrecy) are to be rack'd to find out Treason against him; Let my misfortune, my Lords, be your advertisement, your wise Ancestors were glad to put bands and limits to this Lion Treason, if you give it large scope of words to range into, he will at last pull you or yours all to pieces.

But my Lords, I never did think till now, that matter of opinion should be objected as matter of Treason.

For first, Opinions are free, and men may argue both Pro and Con in all faculties without any stain of reputation, otherwise all consultations were vain.

2. I may be of another judgement, than I declare my self to be of opinion, perhaps to gain better arguments for the maintenance of my own Grounds.

3. Many and my self oftentimes have pronounced an opinion, yet upon hearing better Judgements, have presently changed it.

4. We use to strain our opinions too high sometimes that we may meet in a just moderation with those whom we conceive in the other extremity to be too low.

5. It is expressly commanded by that Stat. Henr. 6. 9. that though a man should say the King is not lawful Heir to the Crown, and may be deposed, yet he is not to be charged with Treason, but only with Felony, and I hope my Lords, those words are of a more transcendent and superlative nature than any alledged by me to be spoken; But, my Lords, said he, Lay it to your hearts: it must come to you, you and yours, your Posterity are they whom God and Nature, Birth and Education, have fitted to beautifie the Royal Throne, and to sustain the weighty affairs of the Kingdom. If to give your Opinions in Political agitation shall be accounted Treason, who will be willing to serve the King, or what a Dilemma are you in? if being sworn Counsellours you speak not your minds freely, you are convicted of Perjury, if you do, perhaps of Treason; what detriment, what incommodity shall fall to the King and Kingdom, if this be permitted? Which of you hereafter will adventure, yea dare adventure so much as to help by your advice, unless you be weary of your Lives, your Estates, your Posterity, yea your very honour? Let me never live longer than to see this confusion, nay I may say it, this inhumanity in England; for my part, my Lords, I here confess my self, I ever have, and ever shall speak my opinion freely in anything that may concern the Honour and Safety of my Gracious King, or my Dear Country, though the Sword be two-edged, fearing him rather who killeth the Soul, than he whose power reacheth only to the body.

Nor do I see how I am culpable of Treason, unless it be Treason for not being infallible, yet if it be so, my Lords, you have this rag of mortality before you loaden with many infirmities, though you pull this into shreds, yet there is no great loss, there may be perhaps a great gain; If I have seemed to have dared too far to give testimony to the World of an innocent conscience towards God, and a resolute loyalty towards my Prince (which have ever been my only Pole-stars in the whole course of my life) and if by spilling of mine there be not a way found to trace out the Blood of the Nobility, (which I hope your Lordships will look to) there will be no disadvantage at all suffered by the loss of Me.

Tuesday was a day of Rest.

Upon Wednesday Mr. Whitlock charged thus: That 1641. That the precedent Articles were of so high a consequence, and of so transcendent a nature, that nothing wanted to make up the perfect measure of the most horrid Treason and monstrous attempt that ever by a Native was intended against his King and Countrey, but putting these designed projects into Execution, which had undoubtedly hapned to the subversion both of Church and State, had not the clemency and goodness of the Prince, and the piety and carefulness of the well affected Peers timely foreseen and prevented the same; that still the Principles of Tyranny and Oppression had lodged within his bosome, and therefore had burst forth into these expressions and advices contained in the following Articles, where first they charged him in the twenty fifth with three things.

1. That he had advised the King to rigorous and unlawful exaction of Ship-money.

2. That he had given Counsel, That if the Sheriffs should deny their best indeavours and assistance to that effect, they should be sent for and fined by the Star-chamber and Imprisonment.

3. That when the Aldermen of London had in all humility presented the causes why the Ship-money could not be collected amongst them, and had given in their reasons why they refused to give in a list of their names within their City, who were able to afford the Loan-money; He in a contemptuous and Tyrannical manner in the face of the Council-board had said to the King, Sir, these men because of their obstinacy and forwardness deserved very well to be fined, ransomed and laid by the heels: And it will never go well with your service untill some of them be hanged for example to others.

The proofs were these,

1. The Bishop of London, Lord Treasurer, who declared that he remembered the words very well, that the Earl had advised the King to cause the Ship-money to be gathered in, but he remembered withal that both himself and all the Council had done the like, and that it was upon a present necessity and defect of money for entertaining the Army, which (the condition of the Army considered) they all conceived was by any means to be kept on foot.

2. Alderman Wiseman declared, that upon an humble Remonstrance made to the Council-board, that the City would take it ill, if a Tax roll should be delivered of their Estates who were thought able for the loan-money; the Lord Strafford said, they deserved to be fined, ransomed, and laid by the heels; But for the words of hanging them up, he heard not at all.

3. The Earl of Berkshire declared, that the Lord Strafford had said, that upon the refusal of such a service enjoyned by the Kings peremptory command, it was his opinion they might be fined.

4. Alderman Garway attested the preceding words, and withal added, that the Earl to his best remembrance, had said, it were well for the Kings service if some of them were hanged up.

They closed up the charge, saying, That by such undutiful Expressions he had invaded the propriety of the Subject, and had put such discontent upon the City, that they were the less willing upon occasion to concur for advantage of the Kings Service.

The Earl replied, That though all the charge were, in the most strict and rigid way verified against him, yet he could not conceive by what Interpretation of Law it could be reach'd home to High Treason; And to that common objection (that the Treason was not individual, but accumulative) he replied, that, under favour, he thought that were as much as to say, No Treason at all; Because,

1. That neither in Statute Law, Common Law nor practice, there was ever till this time heard of such a matter as accumulative Treason, or a Treason by way of consequence, but that it is a word newly coined to attend a charge newly invented, such a one as never was before.

2. That Treason was a thing of a simple and specificative nature, and therefore could not be so by accumulation, but either must be so in some or either of the Articles, or else could not be so at all.

3. That a heap or Accumulation should be, and not be of Homo-geneous things, and therefore that which in its first being is not Treasonable, can never confer to make up an accumulative Treason. Cumulus, an heap of grain, so called, because every or at least some of the individuals are grain, if otherwise, an heap it may be, but not an heap of grain: Just so perhaps these Articles may make up an heap of Felonies, Oppressions, Errours, Misdemeanors, and such like (and to the things themselves, I shall give an answer, when under that name they shall be charged against me) but they can no wayes confer to the making up of Treason, unless some, at the least, be Treason in the Individual.

2. That the Testimonies brought against him were all of them single, not two one way, and therefore could not make faith in matter of debt, much less in matter of life and death: That it was against the Statute expressly, to impeach a man of High Treason under the Evidence of two famous Witnesses, much less to adjudge and convince him upon attestation of one.

3. To the Lord Treasurers testimony, he did with all his heart condescend unto it: but upon these grounds only, that there was a present necessity of money, that all the Council-board had so voiced with him, yea before himself, and he alwayes thought it presumption in a man not to follow the wiser and more Judicious: And that then there was a sentence of the Star-Chamber for the right of paying ship-money: for his part he would never be more prudent than his teachers, nor give judgement against the Judges: And therefore he thought it not far amiss to advise the King for collecting of that which by Law was his own, in such a present and urgent necessity, and although his opinion (and it was no more) had been amiss, he hoped, that though in case of Religion being attended with stubbornness and pertinacy, it might come home to Heresie, yet could it not reach so far as Treason; unless it be Treason 1641. for a man to speak his judgement freely, when he is upon his Oath to do the same.

4. For the words about fining, he had already acknowledged them in his General answer to be true, but with these qualifications, that it was his opinion only, that it was upon the refusal (as he conceived) of a just service, that he had spoken them by no means to prejudice the Citizens, but to make them the more quick and active in the Kings Service: That no ill consequence at all happened upon them: that they were words might have been spared indeed, but innocently though suddenly spoken, which he hoped might proceed from a man of such a hasty and incircumspect humour as himself (made so both by nature and his much infirmity of body) without any mind at all to Treason: And that if all Cholerick Expressions of that nature should be accounted Treasonable, there would be more suits of that kind fly up and down Westminster-hall than Common Law.

5. To these words attested by Alderman Garway, he positively denyed them, and hoped they should never rise up against him in Judgement, because the testimony was single and not positive, but only to his best remembrance, and that it was exceeding strange, that not any one man neither of the Council or the other Aldermen were so quick to observe them, but only Alderman Garway, which he thought sufficient to nullifie that single testimony, except he could demonstrate himself to have some rare singular faculty of hearing. In the close, he desired the Lords from his misfortunes to provide for their own Safety, and seriously to consider what a way was chalked out to ruine them, both in their lives and their estates, if for every opinion given in Council, or words suddenly or hastily spoken, they (who are born to wield the great affairs of the Kingdom) should be arraigned and sentenced as Traytors.

Then they went to the 26th Article, and charged thus.

That the Lord Strafford having by his wicked advices exhausted the Kings Treasury, did also counsel him,

1. To embase the coin by allay of copper money.

2. To seize upon all the Bullion in the Mint.

3. That in discourse with some of the Aldermen, about the business, he had said, the City was more ready to countenance and relieve the Rebels than the King: And that the King of France did manage such businesses not by Treaties or Request, but by sending forth his Commissaries to take account of mens Estates, accompanied with Troops of Horse.

The proofs were,

First, Sir Thomas Edmonds, who declared that in his discourse with the Lord Strafford, having remonstrated unto him, that Merchants goods were seized on beyond Seas because of the money taken out of the Mint, he told him, that if the Londoners suffered it, it was deservedly, because they had refused the King a small Loan of Money upon Security, and that he thought them more ready to help the Rebels than the King.

Secondly, Mr. Palmer declared, that he spake something about the King of France, but whether with relation to England or no, he did not remember.

Thirdly, Sir William Parkise attested in the same words, and withal, that the Lord Cottington was then present, and could declare the whole business.

Fourthly, Sir Ralph Freeman declared, that in a discourse with the Lord Strafford, he had said, that the Servants in the Mint-house would refuse to work in Copper-money: And he replied, That then it were well to send those Servants to the House of Correction.

They closed the Charge, That by such undutiful Counsel and words he had given more than sufficient proof of his design and purpose to subdue this Kingdom and subvert the fundamental Laws and Priviledges of the same.

The Earl Replied,

That he expected some proofs to evidence the two first particulars, but heard of none: for the following words he confessed, probably they might proceed from the door of his lips: nor did he think it much amiss, considering the present posture, to call that faction Rebels: As for the last words objected against him in that Article, he said, that being in conference with some of the Londoners, there came to his hands at that instant a Letter from the Earl of Leicester, then at Paris, wherein were the Gazets inclosed, relating that the Cardinal had given order to levy Money by Souldiers: This he only told the Lord Cottington standing by, but made not the least application thereof to the English affairs: he said moreover, there was no great likelihood that he had committed real acts of Treason, when his adverse party was content to trifle away so much time about words, neither was there any Treason in them, though they had been fully verified, and therefore in that (as in all other Articles) he reserved a power for his Counsel to dispute in matter of Law.

The Earls answer to the 26th. Article.

They then went to the 27th Article, and charged thus, That immediately after his appointment to be Lieutenant General to the Army here in England, he shewed what principles of Arbitrary Government lurked within his bosome, for by his own immediate authority, without and against Law, he had laid Imposts upon many of the Kings Subjects; whereof they mentioned three particulars:

1. That he imposed 8 d. per diem for a Souldier upon the County of York, for entertaining the Trained bands there one whole moneth.

2. That he sent out Warrants for collecting the same, and threatened to imprison such as refused to pay.

3. That he said it was a crime nigh to the crime of High Treason not to pay the same.

4. They added in his general replies, he had brought two things for his defence: 1. That the money was freely and voluntarily offered by those in Yorkshire. 2. That the great Council of the Peers had notice of the same: but to both they had the following answers to make, viz.

To the first, That a Petition was indeed preferred by the Yorkshire-men to the King, and a moneths pay offered, but that the Lord Strafford had refused to present the same upon this exception only, because in the same they had petitioned for a Parliament, whereby he evidently declared 1641. red what little inclination he had to that way. To the second, they appealed to all the Lords whether any such order did pass before the Council of the Peers at York.

The Proofs were :

1. A Warrant issued by Colonel Pennyman, for this money, and another by Sir Edward Osbourn.

2. Mr. John Burrows, who declared that he was Clerk to the great Council, but did remember of no order, and withal added, that it might have passed at that time when he was at Rippon.

3. Mr. Dunstan, who declared, that he had known that money to be levied by some Muskettiers.

4. By Sir William Ingram, who declared that he heard the Earl say, that to refuse the same came nigh to the crime of High-Treason.

They concluded the Charge, that by these particulars, it was more than evident what unhappy purposes and trayterous designs he had to subdue this Kingdom, and subvert the fundamental Laws and Priviledges.

The Earl replied :

1. To the Petition, That it was true, a Petition was drawn up by the York-shire Gentlemen, and as true, that he had refused to present the same, because of that Clause about the Parliament : but the matter was thus : At his Majesties coming to York, it was thought necessary for the defence of that County to keep the Trained Bands on foot, because the Enemy was upon the Borders ; and therefore the King directed him to write to all the Free-holders in York-shire to see what they would do for their own defence. The time and place were designed by the King, but the night before the meeting a small number convented, and in a private and factious way did draw up that Petition, upon the morrow at their appointed Diet, in presence of the whole number, the Petition was presented to him, where he did advise them to leave out that Clause, and that because he knew the King out of his own gracious disposition had intended to call a Parliament, which he desired should rather be freely done, than upon the constraint and importunity of Petitions : Moreover, it would seem a mercenary thing in them at one and the same time to offer a benevolence, and withal to Petition for his favour. Upon this Remonstrance they were all willing to recall the Petition, and directed him by word of mouth to offer unto the King the moneths pay in their names, which he did accordingly, in the presence of them, to their no small advantage.

This he proved by Sir William Pennyman, Sir Paul Neal, Sir George Wentworth, Sir William Savil, Sir Thomas Danby, who all of them declared as much in ample terms, and withal added, That nothing was done upon better grounds of necessity and obedience, than the offer of that money, and that they never had heard any man grudge against it to this time.

For the second about the Council of Peers, he alledged, That he never made mention of any Order of theirs ; but he remembered very well it was twice propounded before them, that the King had approved it at that time as a just and necessary act, and none of the Council contradicted it, which he conceived as a tacite approbation and an Order in equivalence.

But though that had not been, there was nothing done in the business but at the special desires of the Gentlemen themselves, and for their necessary defence and protection : And though he had done it by himself alone, yet he conceived he had so much power by his Commission, causing the Commission to that effect to be read : That albeit he should mistake his Commission and do some inferiour act beyond it (because military proceedings are not alwayes warranted by the Common Law) yet it should not be imputed as an Act of Treason to him. And to this effect read a Statute of 7 Hen. 2.

To the proof :

1. Colonel Pennymans Warrant, or Sir Robert Osbornes nothing concerned him, and he doubted not but those worthy Gentlemen could justify their own acts, and that he had enough to do to answer his own misdemeanors.

2. Sir John Burrows, he was at Rippon, when that Proposition was made.

3. That asnot the Warrant, so neither the Execution troubled him at all.

4. For Sir William Ingram, he was but a single testimony, and that such an one as he could produce an evidence to testify, he had mistaken himself in his testimony upon Oath, if it were not to disadvantage the Gentleman.

He concluded, that he had done nothing in that business, but upon the Petition of that County, the Kings especial command, the connivence at least of the Great Council, and upon a present necessity for the defence and safety of the County.

And so much for Wednesday.

Upon Thursday, the Committee for the Charge declared, That they had done with all the Articles, and were content to wave the last for reasons best known to themselves ; only Sir Walter Earl added, That he had some Observations to bring forth upon the 22th. Article, which he conceived might do much to prove the Lord Straffords design for landing the Irish forces in England.

And they were :

1. That in his Commission he had power to land them in Wales, or in any part of England or Scotland, which were altogether superfluous, unless there had been some purpose for the same.

2. That within two days before the date of the Commission, Letters were sent to the Lords Bridgewater, and Pembroke, from Sir Francis Windebank to assist the Earl of Worcester, in levying Forces for the Kings service, and these might be supposed to have intended a joyning with the Irish.

3. That the Lord Ranelagh at the raising of the Irish Army did fear such a design as this.

4. That the Town of Ayre in Scotland, where the Lord Strafford pretended he would land those Forces, was fortified with a Bulwark, a Garrison, and Block-house, which would prohibit landing there : that the Earl of Argyles bounds were divided thence by the Sea, and that the Birk or entry into the Town was very dangerous and shallow.

The proofs were only the reading of the Commission granted to the Lord Strafford.

Walter Earls observations on the 22th
Article.

The Earls Reply.

1. That his Commission was the same Verbatim with Northumberland for England, and that it was drawn up by the Council-board here, and sent over unto him: so no more design in him than in the Gentlemen of the English Army, nor no larger than that was put upon him.

2. That this was the first time that he heard of any such Letters, neither did they concern him more than any of the house.

3. That he was not bound to purge the Lord Ranelagh from all his fears; and that he had his own fears too, which God forbid should be evidence of Treason against any man whatsoever.

4. That it seemed the Gentlemen had better information from that Kingdom than himself, yet he would be confident to say, at Ayre there was never such a thing as Block-house or Garrison: But to remove all scruples (for indeed the Road or Landing-place is not there safe) he declared, that it was his intention to have landed some miles above Ayre, and made only his Magazine at that Town.

To the Earl of Argyles bounds, he hoped the Gentleman knew they came not on foot out of Ireland, but had Ships to waft and transport themselves, and that one of his prime Houses (Rosneth) was within some few miles of the same.

The Lord Digby finding Sir Walter Earls a little puzzell'd, endeavoured to bring him off, and told the Lords in such a business as the plotting of Treason they must be content sometimes with dark probabilities.

The Earl having thus answered the Charge against him, it was moved by one of the Prosecutors, that if he have any thing to say further in his defence, he should do it presently; but he desired time till the next morning, which was (not without difficulty) granted.

The next morning the Lords met, but the Lieutenant of the Tower appeared without his Prisoner, certifying that the Earl was taken with a great fit of the stone that night, and continued so ill as he could not go abroad without danger of his life. The Commons thought this an excuse to gain time, but the Lords believed the relation: Mr. Glyn moved, that if he did not appear upon Saturday morning, he should lose the Priviledge to speak in his own defence afterwards, and they permitted to proceed: But the Lord Steward said, That the Lords had appointed some of their number to go to the Tower, and learn the just cause of his stay, and if by any means he were able, he should be obliged to come; but if not, humanity and common equity would excuse him. These Lords that went to the Tower found the Earl much eased of his pain by the application of some remedies, which the Physicians had administered unto him: so that the next day he appeared before them, and one of the Prosecutors proffered new proofs concerning the two and twentieth Article, upon which the Earl craved the freedom for himself concerning some testimonies not yet exhibited on his behalf, whence ensued a hot contest betwixt the two Houses, which took up two days debate, but at last the reasons of the Lords prevailed, who declared, that in the common dispensation of equity, the accused should have equal allowance to superinduct new proofs as well as the Accusers, and it was agreed that all further testimony should be waved on both sides:

Upon Tuesday the Earl appeared, and the Lord Steward told him, that the Lords had ordered, that both their testimonies should be waved, and if he had any thing to say further in his own defence, he should proceed, so that that day might put an end to what concerned the matter of fact. The Earl replied; That in all humility and obedience he would submit himself to that or any other their Decrees whatsoever, though it should reach as far home unto him as his own life; but withal humbly begged, That if hereafter he should be troubled (for they were to speak last) with new matter, or with supplemental proof, he might have leave to speak something in his defence.

The Lord Steward answered, it is all the reason in the world:

Whereupon the Earl made a summary repetition of the several particulars of the former defence, which ended, he continued his Speech thus;

My Lords,

There remains another kind of Treason, that I should be guilty of, for endeavouring to subvert the fundamental Laws of the Land; That this should be Treason together, that is not Treason in one part; a Treason accumulative, that when it will not do it alone, being weaved up with others, it should do it, seems very strange. Under favour, my Lords, I conceive there is neither Statute nor Common Law which doth declare this endeavoring to subvert the Fundamental Laws of the Land to be High Treason, for I have been diligent in the inquiry, as you know it deeply concerns me, and could never discover it: It is hard to be questioned for life and honour upon a Law that cannot be shewn: for it is a rule in Sir Edward Coke: De non apparentibus & non existentibus eadem est ratio. Jesu! Where hath this fire lain hid so many hundred of years without smoke to discover it, till it thus burst forth to consume me and my children? That punishment should precede promulgation of a Law; To be punished by a Law subsequent to the fact is extreme hard: What can be safe, if this be admitted? My Lords, it is hard in another respect, that there should be no token set, by which we should know this offence; no admonition by which we should avoid it: If a man pass the Thames in a Boat, and split himself upon an Anchor, and no Buoy be floating to discover it, he who oweth the Anchor shall make satisfaction; but if a Buoy be set there, every man passeth upon his own peril: Now where is this mark, where the token upon this Crime to declare it to be High Treason? My Lords be pleased to give that regard to the Peerage of England, as never to expose yourselves to such moot-points, such constructive interpretations of Law. If there must be a trial of Wits, let the subject-matter be of somewhat else than the lives and honours of Peers. It will be wisdom for your selves, for your Posterity, and for the whole Kingdom to cast into the fire these bloody and mysterious Volumes of constructive and arbitrary Treason, as the Primitive Christians did their books of curious Arts, and betake your selves to the plain letter of the Law and Statute, that telleth us what is, and what is not Treason, without being more ambitious to be more learned in the Art of killing than our Fore-fathers: It is now full 240 years since any man was touched for this alledged Crime to the height before my self; Let us not awaken these sleeping Lions to our destructions, by raking up a few musty Records that have lain by the Walls so many ages, forgotten or neglected. May your Lordships please not to add this to my other misfortunes; for my sins be-slave me, not for Treason; let not a President be desired from me, so disadvantageous as this will be in the consequence to the whole Kingdom; Do not through me wound the interest of the Common-wealth: And howsoever these Gentlemen say, they speak for the Common-wealth, yet in this particular I indeed speak for it, and shew the inconveniences and mischiefs which will fall upon it; for as it is said in the Statute of the First of Hen. 4. No man will know what to do or say for fear of such penalties: Do not, my Lords, put such difficulties upon Ministers of State, that men of Wisdom, of Honour, of Fortune, may not with cheerfulness and safety be employed for the publick; if you weigh and measure them by grains and scruples, the publick affairs of the Kingdom will lye waste; no man will meddle with them who hath anything to lose. My Lords, I have troubled you longer than I should have done, were it not an interest of those dear pledges a Saint in Heaven hath left me. [At this he stop'd a while, offering up some tears to her ashes] What I forfeit my self is nothing, but that my destruction should extend to my Posterity, it woundeth me to the very soul: you will pardon my infirmity, something I should have added, but am not able, therefore let it pass: And now, my Lords, for my self, I have been by the blessing of Almighty God taught, that the afflictions of this present life, are not to be compared to the Eternal weight of Glory which shall be revealed hereafter: And so, my Lords, even so, with all tranquillity of mind, I freely submit my self to your Judgement: and whether that Judgement be of life or death,

—TE DEUM LAUDAMUS.

As soon as the Earl had ended, Mr. Glyn and Mr. Pym spent some time in repetition of the Charge, wherein they proceeded Article by Article, endeavouring by Rhetorical declamations to render his offences as odious as they could.

The Earl allowed to plead by his Counsel.

Matters of fact being thus transacted, the Earl moved that he might be allowed to plead by his Counsel as to matter of Law: to which the Lords agreed, but the Commons would not till after three days Conference assent thereunto; and on Wednesday when they met in their house, they considered and debated much in what manner to proceed further against the Earl of Strafford.

By the modesty of his behaviour he had much insinuated into the good opinion of the Lords, and many of the Commons, and by the clearness of his answers to the several parts of his charge, his Crimes appeared not to be specifically comprehended under the Letter of any Statute Declaratory of Treason: but the Prosecutors perceiving hereby that the Judgement of the Lords upon the whole matter might not answer their Expectation, urged, that though he were not guilty of Treason, or any of those offences enumerated in the Statute of 25 Ed. 3. yet so great were his Crimes, that according to a branch of that Statute, they ought to be declared Treason. For it is therein mentioned, that if any other case supposed to be Treason, which is not in that Statute specified, should happen, no judgement should be given till the cause be shewed, and declared before the King and his Parliament, whether it ought to be judged Treason, or other Felony. This branch (they said) gave the Parliament power to declare Treason, and in the enumeration of his offences, they argued, That his intentions to subvert the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, was Treason at Common Law before the making of the fore-named Statute: and such Treasons were not thereby taken away, but by the words before recited, might be declared as often as occasion should require; but because many doubts arose concerning such Treasons, the wisdom of those times thought it not fit to submit the Judgement thereof to any less authority than the Parliament: These Debates produced a resolution in the house to declare him guilty of Treason: but because they had no President since the first of Hen. the 4th. of any fact declared Treason in Parliament, that was not expressed in the letter of some Statute, they doubted a little of the way of Declaring Treason, but at last concluded to do it by bill of Attainder.

This was much oppos'd by Selden, Bridgeman, and Holburne, three Eminent Lawyers, at that time Members of the Commons House, who made it manifest, that the Salvo of the Statute of the 15th. Edw. 3. was repeal'd, and that no man could be convict of Treason but by the letter of that Statute; nevertheless, being put to a question, the Majority of Voices carried it for a Bill, and a Committee was appointed to prepare it.

The Commons pass the Bill of Attainder against the Earl of Strafford.

The Arguments by those and others then us'd against it, shall not be here inserted, because most of them were alledged by the Counsel for the Earl, and when those come to be mentioned, they will be related. There had been three Conferences betwixt the two Houses of these matters.

The Lords at the first, of the two last of the three Conferences (for the first was not a free Conference) told the Commons that they had resolv'd to give full audience to the Earl of Strafford's Counsel in matter of Law, and that they as competent Judges would by themselves give Judgement in the cause, as that which was most suitable to the Practice, Laws and Statutes of the Kingdom, the safety of the Nobility, and to Common Justice; to which those of the Commons reply'd, that their House was resolv'd to go on with the

The Lords resolve to hear the Earls Counsel in matter of Law.

1641. the Bill of Attainder, and if the same should be rejected by the Lords, they fear'd a rupture and division might ensue to the ruine and desolation of the Kingdom, for no content would be given to the Subject, unless the man who had so much intruded upon their right, might be punish'd as a Traytor: and for the practice and Laws of the Kingdom, they said no man had ever found such a favourable hearing; and that the Proceſs against the Duke of Norfolk and Somerset, and the Earl of Essex, were all of them closed on one day.

On the next day they met at another Conference, where the Lords told those of the Commons that they should expect nothing from their house, but what should tend to the Peace and Preservation of the Kingdom, nor was there a more forceable argument for that, than to preserve the Laws and Customes thereof, lest innovation so much complained of by them, might unhappily be found among themselves, that the Subjects should have all that Justice could afford, but that an act of Injustice would never give satisfaction to the world nor safety to themselves, the eyes of all foreign States being fixed upon the business in agitation, and the wisdom of our Nation either to be much advanced or depressed by their Judgements in this case; That the Proceſs against Norfolk, and Essex, (for Somerset was convicted only of Felony, and had not so much animadversion to save himself by his Book) were for direct and formal Treason comprised in one or two individual Acts, but this against the Lord Strafford only Arbitrary and accumulative, to be pick'd out of the Articles. And therefore that it was impossible to have a full examination of them all, to give sentence against him; And those Noble-men were charg'd with some breach of Statutes formerly made, but here a new Statute was to be made, or else he to be found guiltless: They concluded, that they had given Order for his appearance on Saturday, and that in the great Hall at Westminster, where the House of Commons might, if they pleased, be present.

The Commons Con-
to be there.

After some deliberation with their House, the Commons Conſerrers answered, that since the Lords had so resolved, they should deny to be there, and to hear what his Counsel could say for him, for to reply any more in publick, they neither could nor would, because of the Bill already read, only if their Lordships should take any scruple in the matter of Law, they would be ready to give them satisfaction in a private Conference, and to give publick satisfaction also therein.

The next day the Lords and Commons convened in the great Hall, but they that were of the Committee for the prosecution did not stand at the Barr as before, but sat promiscuously with the rest of their fellows; so that a mouth was not opened for the House of Commons all that day: After they were set, the Lord Steward told the Earl, That the Lords had resolved to give him a fair hearing in the matter of Law, and therefore desired that the Counsel in urging thereof might keep that distance, moderation, and respect to the Judicatory, that was fitting, and not at all to meddle with the matter of fact.

The Earl replied, That in all humility he acknowledged that favour from the Lords, and that it was such an one too, as he could not but expect from such honourable Peers, and just persons, in whose integrity and goodness (under that which he had placed above) he had reposed his chiefest confidence: for his Counsel they knew much better than himself, what concerned the point of discretion and Reverence, and that he doubted not but that they would give all satisfaction and obedience therein.

Then his Counsel were called to the Barr, which were Mr. Lane the Princes Attorney, Mr. Gardiner the Recorder of London, and two others.

The Earls
Counsel called to the Barr.

Mr. Lane spake first to this purpose.

My Lords, I shall not at all touch the matter of Law farther than to clear your Judgements in one Statute only, viz. 25 Edw. 3. because when the same was alledged by the Lord Strafford, in his own defence, that not being convicted of the Letter thereof, he could not be convicted of Treason: I remember the Salvo of the Statute was much insisted upon by those from the House of Commons, as much conducing to their ends. My Lords, I will first speak of the Statute it self, and then of its Salvo or provision: The Statute is, That if any man shall intend the death of the King, his Queen, their Children; Kill the Chancellor, or Judge upon the Bench, imbase the Kings Coyn, or counterfeit the Broad Seal, &c. he shall be convicted and punished as a Traytor. That the Lord Strafford comes not within the Letter of this Statute, is not so much as once alledged, nor indeed it cannot be with any reason; all that can be said is, that by relation or by argument, a minore ad majus, he may be drawn into it, yet that this cannot be, I humbly offer these considerations.

Mr. Lanes
Speech to the Lords in his behalf.

First, This is a declarative Law, and such are not to be taken by way of consequence, equity or construction, but by the Letter only, otherwise they should imply a contradiction to themselves, and be no more declarative Laws, but Laws of construction or constitutive.

2. This is a penal Law, and such (if our grounds hitherto unquestioned hold good) can admit of no constructions or inferences, for penalties are to perswade the keeping of known Laws, not of Laws conjectural, ambiguous, and by consequence, which perhaps the most learned may not in their disputes question, much less the Subject (who is not obliged to interpret the Statute) doubt of in the point of obedience, yea, rather without any doubt, he is rather to obey the Letter of the Statute, and conceive (and that truly) that he is not liable to the penalty.

3. We have a notable Law, 13 Eliz. cap. 2. whereby it is declared, that the bringing in of Bulls from Rome, to stir up the Subject to mutiny and Rebellion, shall be punished as Treason: Now if by interpretation or by consequence this sence might have been thrust upon the preceeding Statutes, the making of this had been superfluous; yea, the persons then charged with that Crime, might have been impeached of Treason, even before the making of this Act.

Anno 21 Edw. 3. We have a Statute, declaring 1641. claring, that for a Servant to kill his Master is an Act of Treason; and in the 23 year of the same King, a Process of Treason was framed against a man for killing his Father, grounded upon the same argument a minori ad majus: But it was found (and the sentence is yet in the Records that although in the 21 year of Edw. 3. that Argument might have been admitted, yet in the 27 it could not, by reason of the declarative Law, intervening in the 25 year; and this Case comes very home to the point in Law.

My Lords, I will not demand what kind of offence it may be for a man to subvert the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, the Crime doubtless is unnatural and monstrous, and the punishment must keep the same proportion, only I presume to offer these few things to your Lordships consideration:

1. That one or more Acts of Injustice whether maliciously or ignorantly done, can in no sense of Law be called the subversion of the Fundamental Laws; if so, as many Judges (perhaps) so many Traytors; it is very incident to mans nature to err, nor doth the Lord Strafford plead his innocency in oversights, but in Treason.

2. I do remember the Case of John de la Pole Duke of Suffolk, this man in the 28 of Hen. 6. was charged by the House of Commons with Articles of Treason, and those too very like to these against my Lord Strafford.

1. That he had given the King bad advices.
2. That he had embased his Coin.
3. That he had sessed men of War.
4. That he had given out summary Decrees.
5. That he had imposed Taxes.
6. That he had corrupted the Fountains of Justice.
7. That he had perswaded the King to unnecessary War, and the giving over of Anjou in France.

And for all these, though he was charged with High Treason for wronging the right of the Subject, and subverting the Fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, yet after a long agitation, the matter was found by the Lords of Parliament not to imply Treason, but only Felony. Add to this another, who in the 23 of Hen. 8. was charged for subverting the English Laws, and yet no Treason charg'd upon him. Add to both, the charge of Richard Larks pleaded at the Common Pleas, who was charged with Treason for subverting the Law, but convicted only of Felony. by which you may see, my Lords, what to this time hath been subverting the Laws.

3. It is very considerable, that the Lord Strafford is not charged to have subverted, but only to have intended to subvert the fundamental Laws, and this I conceive, if there were no more, might keep him free from that Statute of the 25 of Edw. 3. For although as touching the King, his Queen and Children, intention is treasonable: yet in all other things there mentioned, there must be action beside intention; for it is not said, if a man do intend to kill a Chancellour, it shall be Treason, but if he doth kill him; and if he doth actually counterfeit the Broad Seal: and although a man should prepare a furnace, make ready his stamp melt his Bullion, yet if he gives not the Kings impression upon the Coin, all his intentions, yea, his preparations will not serve to make up a Treason.

Ye see therefore, my Lords, that the body of the Statute cannot stick against the Lord Strafford, neither in Letter nor consequence, this is not, that must not be; all that can be said is, that the fact may be Treason by the Common Law. For my part I profess my ignorance, who ever thought the Common Law might declare, but never make a Treason; it might be presupposed that there is a Statute whereupon to build a declaration, and therefore to say there is no Statute for it, it is to say, it is no Treason at all; the Statute ever makes the Treason: and to be declared Treason either by Common Law, or by Parliament, are but two different wayes of proceedings, and must both resolve into one Principle, nay, and which comes home to the point, In the 21 of Edw. 3. To kill a man employed in the Kings War was Treason, and the 23. to kill the Kings Messenger was Treason by declaration of the Common Law, but alwayes by reason of the Statute, yet none of these are Treasons, but Felonies only, because of the intervening Statute of the 25 of Edw. 3. such hath ever been thought the force of its Letter and Declaration: and so I will leave it and a word or two of the Salvo, which is this, that because all particulars could not be enumerated, therefore what the Parliament should declare to be Treasonable in time to come, should be punished as a Treason.

And according to this reservative, in the 8th year of King Richard 2. one charged before the Kings Bench, was afterward referred to the Parliament; and there though the fact was not contained in the body of the Statute, yet because of the Proviso aforementioned, it was adjudged Treason.

In the 11 year of the same King, the Duke of Ireland, and Nevil Archbishop of York were impeached of High Treason by Gloucester, Arundel, and Warwick, and notwithstanding the Statute were convicted thereof by the Salvo; but in 21 of the same Rich. 2. the tide turned, and the King had such a hand with the Parliament, that the Sentence was recalled, and those three Noblemen themselves were adjudged Traytors. Again, in 1 Hen. 4. his Successor, that Revocation of the 21 Rich. 2. was repealed, and the Sentence of the 11th of his Reign established; such were the tossings to and fro of Treason, and all because of that uncertain Proviso.

Therefore it was that in the same Parliament 1 Hen. 4. A Petition was preferred by the Nobility, to have Treason limited within some Statute.

Because they knew not what to speak or what to do for fear thereof: And in Cap. 10. an Act was made upon this Petition, that the Salvo should be holden repealed in all times to come, and nothing esteemed Treason but what was literally contained in 25 Edw. 3. and therefore it is said in the Records, That there was great joy at the making of this Act, in that the drawn sword hanging over every mans head by this slender thred of a consequence or illation, was removed by that Act.

1641. Ad. Add to this, that in the 1 of Qu. Mary, Cap. 1. the same is repeated, That no man shall be punished in life or estate as a Traytor, but for the Crime contained in the Statute of the 25 Edw. 3. without the least mention of the pretended Salvo.

The Earl of Northumberland's Case comes nigh to the point, he was charged with Treason, the 5 of Hen. 4. and if the Statute of the 1 of H. 4. Chap. 10. whereby this Proviso is repealed, had not interven'd, no doubt he had been condemned of Treason, but he was only convicted of Felony, and that because he could not be drawn within the Letter of the Statute of the 25 of Edward 3. And I dare confidently say it, that since that Act was made the 1 of Henry 4. Chap. 10. whereby the Proviso is repealed, no man hath ever been declared a Traytor either by King or Parliament, except it were upon that, or some other Statute literally and declaratively taken. These two things I do offer to your Lordships considerations: That the Lord Strafford cannot be impeached of Treason by the Statute of the 25 Edw. 3. and that the Salvo contained in the same, stands repealed almost two hundred years ago. And this is all I conceive to be necessary for that Statute which was alledged by the Lord Strafford in his defence for matter of Law.

The Recorder said, he could add nothing to what the former Counsel had spoken for matter of Law; but if their Lordships would state unto him any further questions, he was ready to give his resolution according to his best ability.

No answer was made to this motion, but the Lords and Commons adjourned to their respective Houses, without appointing any time for the next meeting.

The Commons were resolv'd to proceed upon the Bill of Attainder, which was so extraordinary a thing, that it did not pass without great debate. The Lord Digby then a Member of the Commons House, and one of the most active Prosecutors of him, was so satisfied with his Answers at his Tryal, that he could not but shew a dislike to the passage of it, upon every occasion that occur'd in the reading or debating thereof, which made Pym and some others that were resolv'd on the business, to do what they could to blast his credit in the House, but yet when the last reading of the Bill was in the Commons House, he gave so generous a testimony against it, That it may not be unfit to record what he then said, in this History:

Mr. Speaker,

We are now upon the point of giving (as much as in us lies) the final Sentence unto death or life, on a great Minister of State, and Peer of this Kingdom, Thomas Earl of Strafford, a name of hatred in the present age by his practices, and fit to be made a terror to future ages by his punishment.

I have had the honour to be employed by the House in this great business, from the first hour that it was taken into consideration: it was a matter of great trust, (and I will say it with confidence) that I have not only served the House in it with industry, according to my ability, but with most exact faithfulness and secrecy.

1641. And as I have hitherto discharged my duty to this House, and to my Countrey in the progress of this great cause, so I trust I shall do now in the last period of it to God, and to a good Conscience.

I do wish the peace of that unto my self, and the blessings of Almighty God to me and my Posterity, according as my judgement on the life of this man shall be consonant with my heart, and the best of my understanding in all integrity.

I know well, Master Speaker, that by some things I have said of late, whilst this Bill was in agitation, I have raised some prejudices upon me in this cause.

Yea, some (I thank them for their plain-dealing) have been so free as to tell me, that I suffered much by the backwardness I have shewn in this Bill of Attainder of the Earl of Strafford, against whom I have been formerly so keen, so active.

Mr. Speaker, I desire of you and the rest of this House a suspension of Judgement concerning me, till I have opened my heart unto you freely and clearly in this business.

Truly Sir, I am still the same in my opinions and affections as unto the Earl of Strafford, I confidently believe him the most dangerous Minister, the most insupportable to free Subjects, that can be charactered.

I believe his practises in themselves as high, as tyrannical as any Subject ever ventur'd on, and the malignity of them hugely aggravated by those rare abilities of his, whereof God hath given him the use, but the Devil the application. In a word, I believe him still that grand Apostate to the Common-wealth, who must not expect to be pardoned in this world, till he be dispatch'd to the other. And yet let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, my hand must not be to that dispatch, I protest as my Conscience stands informed, I had rather it were off.

Let me unfold unto you the Myserie, Mr. Speaker.

I will not dwell much upon justifying unto you my seeming variance at this time from what I was formerly, by putting you in mind of the difference between Prosecutors and Judges.

How mis-becoming that fervour would be in a Judge, which perhaps was commendable in a Prosecutor. Judges we are now, and must put on another personage.

It is honest and noble to be earnest in order to the discovery of truth, but when that hath been brought as far as it can to light, our judgement thereupon ought to be calm and cautious.

In prosecution upon probable grounds, we are accountable only for our industry or remissness, but in Judgement we are deeply responsible to God Almighty, for its rectitude or obliquity. In cases of life, the Judge is God's Steward of the parties blood, and must give a strict account for every drop.

But as I told you, Mr. Speaker, I will not insist long upon this ground of difference in me now, from what I was formerly.

The truth on't is, Sir, the same ground whereupon I wish the rest of the five to whom you first first committed the consideration of my Lord of Strafford) brought down our opinion that it was fit he should be accused of Treason, upon the same ground I was engaged with earnestness in his prosecution; and had the same ground remained in that force of belief with me, which till very lately it did, I should not have been tender in his condemnation. But truly Sir, to deal plainly with you, that ground of our accusation, that spur to our prosecution, and that which should be in the basis of my judgement of the Earl of Strafford as unto Treason, is to my understanding quite vanished away.

This it was Mr. Speaker:

His advising the King to employ the Army of Ireland to reduce England.

This I was assured would be proved, before I gave my consent to his Accusation. I was confirmed in the same belief during the prosecution, and fortified in it most of all since Sir Henry Vanes preparatory examinations, by the assurances which that worthy Member Master Pym gave me, that his Testimony would be made convincing, by some Notes of what passed at the Juncto concurrent with it, which I ever understanding to be of some other Counsellour, you see now prove but a Copy of the same Secretaries Notes, discover'd and produced in the manner you have heard, and those, dis-joynted fragments of the venomous part of discourses, no results; no Conclusions of Counsels, which are the only things that Secretaries should register; there being no use at all of the other, but to accuse and to bring men into danger.

But Sir, this is not that which overthrows the evidence with me, concerning the Army of Ireland, nor yet that all the Juncto upon their Oaths remember nothing of it.

But this Sir, which I shall tell you, is that which works with me, under favour, to an utter overthrow of this evidence, as unto that of the Army of Ireland; Before whilst I was a Prosecutor, and under eye of secrecy, I might not discover any weakness of the cause, which now as a Judge I must. Master Secretary was examined thrice upon Oath at the preparatory Committee.

The first time he was questioned to all the Interrogatories, and to that part of the seventh which concerns the Army of Ireland, he said positively in these words, I cannot charge him with that. But for the rest, he desired time to recollect himself, which was granted him.

Some dayes after he was examined a second time, and then deposed these words, concerning the Kings being absolved from Rules of Government, and so forth, very clearly, but being prest to that part, concerning the Irish Army, again, said he could say nothing to that.

Here we thought we had done with him, till divers weeks after my Lord of Northumberland and all others of the Juncto, denying to have heard any thing concerning those words of reducing England by the Irish Army, it was thought fit to examine the Secretary once more, and then he deposes these words to have been said by the Earl of Strafford to his Majesty:

You have an Army which you may imploy here to reduce (or some word to that sense) this Kingdom.

Mr. Speaker, these are the circumstances, which I confess with my conscience, thrust quite out of doors that grand Article of our Charge, concerning his desperate advice to the King, of employing the Irish Army here.

Let not this I beseech you, be driven to an aspersiō upon Master Secretary, as if he should have sworn otherwise than he knew or believ'd, he is too worthy to do that; only let thus much be inferred from it, that he who twice upon Oath with time of recollection, could not remember any thing of such a business, might well a third time mis-remember somewhat: and in this business the difference of one letter; here for there, or that for this, quite alters the case, the latter also being the more probable, since it is confest of all hands, that the debate then was concerning a War with Scotland, and you may remember at the Bar he once said to imploy there. And thus, Mr. Speaker, I have faithfully given you an account what it is that hath blunted the edge of the Hatchet or Bill with me towards my Lord of Strafford.

This was that whereupon I accused him with a free heart, prosecuted him with earnestness, and had it to my understanding been proved, should have condemned him with innocence; Whereas now I cannot satisfy my conscience to do it.

I profess I can have no notion of any bodies intents to subvert the Laws treasonably, or by force, and this design of force not appearing, all his other wicked practices cannot amount so high with me.

I can find a more easie and more natural spring, from whence to derive all his other Crimes, than from an intent to bring in Tyranny, and to make his own Posterity as well as us slaves; as from Revenge, from Pride, from Avarice, from Passion, and Insolence of Nature.

But had this of the Irish Army been proved, it would have diffused a complexion of Treason over all, it would have been a Withe indeed, to bind all those other scattered and lesser branches, as it were into a Faggot of Treason.

I do not say but the rest may represent him a man as worthy to dye, and perhaps worthier than many a Traytor. I do not say, but they may justly direct us to Enact that they shall be Treason for the future.

But God keep me from giving Judgement of death on any Man, and of ruine to his innocent Posterity, upon a Law made à posteriori.

Let the Mark be set on the door where the Plague is, and then let him that will enter, dye.

I know, Master Speaker, there is in Parliament a double power of life and death by Bill, a Judicial power, and a Legislative: the measure of the one is what's legally just, and the other, what is prudentially and politickly fit for the good and preservation of the whole. But those two, under favour, are not to be confound-

ded in Judgement. We must not piece up want of Legality with matter of Convenience, nor the defaultance of prudential fitness, with a pretence of legal Justice.

To condemn my Lord of Strafford Judicially as for Treason, my conscience is not assured that the matter will bear it.

And to do it by the Legislative power, my reason consultively cannot agree to that, since I am perswaded neither the Lords nor the King will pass the Bill, and consequently, that our passing it will be a cause of great divisions and combustions in the State.

And therefore my humble advice is, that laying aside this Bill of Attainder, we may think of another, saving only life, such as may secure the State from my Lord of Strafford, without endangering it as much by division concerning his punishment, as he hath endangered it by his practices.

If this may not be hearkened unto, let me conclude in saying that unto you all, which I have thoroughly inculcated to mine own conscience upon this occasion. Let every man lay his hand upon his heart, and sadly consider what we are going to do, with a breath, either Justice or Murder; Justice on the one side, or murder heightened and aggravated to its supreamest extent: For as the Casuists say, that he who lies with his Sister, commits Incest, but he that marries his Sister, sins higher, by applying Gods Ordinance to his Crime: So doubtless, he that commits murder with the Sword of Justice, heightens that Crime to the utmost.

The danger being so great, and the case so doubtful, that I see the best Lawyers in diametrical opposition concerning it, Let every man wipe his heart, as he does his eyes, when he would judge of a nice and subtil object. The eye if it be prelincted with any colour, is vitiated in its discerning. Let us take heed of a blood-shotten eye of Judgement.

Let every man purge his heart clear of all passions (I know this great and wise Body Politick can have none, but I speak to individuals, from the weakness which I find in my self.) Away with personal animosities, away with all flutteries to the people, in being the sharper against him, because he is odious to them; away with all fears, lest by the sparing of his blood they may be incensed; away with all such considerations, as that it is not fit for a Parliament, that one accused by it of Treason should escape with life.

Let not former vehemence of any against him, nor fear from thence, that he cannot be safe while that man lives, be an ingredient in the sentence of any one of us.

Of all these corruptives of Judgement, Mr. Speaker, I do before God discharge my self to the uttermost of my power.

And do with a clear Conscience wash my hands of this mans Blood, by this solemn Protestation, That my Vote goes not to the taking off the Earl of Straffords life.

The Earls enemies greatly offended at

At this Speech those were much offended who designed the death of this Earl, and they were so factious in the pursuit of it, that they took the Names of all the dissenters upon a division of the House when the Bill pass'd, and caus'd them to be dispersed among their party in the City, who came in great tumults to Westminster to clamour for Justice, and in the Old Palace-Yard in Westminster those dissenters were posted up, to be exposed to the fury of the ungoverned multitude, made at this time so mad and violent, that some of them were heard to say, If they could not have the Earl of Straffords life, they would have the Kings; and in their Paper they called the moderate part of the House of Commons Straffordians. The Names of whom were these; Lord Digby, Lord Compton, Lord Buckhurst, Sir Robert Hatton, Sir Thomas Fanshaw, Sir Edward Alford, Sir Nicholas Slanning, Sir Thomas Danby, Sir George Wentworth, Sir Peter Wentworth, Sir Frederick Cornwallis, Sir William Carnaby, Sir Richard Winn, Sir Gervase Clifton, Sir William Witherington, Sir William Pennyman, Sir Patrick Curwent, Sir Richard Lee, Sir Henry Slingsby, Sir William Portman, Mr. Gervase Hollis, Mr. Sidney Godolphin, Mr. Cook, Mr. Coventry, Mr. Ben. Weston, Mr. Will. Weston, Mr. Selden, Mr. Alford, Mr. Floyd, Mr. Herbert, Captain Digby, Sergeant Hide, Mr. Taylor, Mr. Griffith, Mr. Scowen, Mr. Bridgeman, Mr. Fettiplace, Dr. Turner, Captain Charles Price, Dr. Parry, Civilian, Mr. Arundel, Mr. Newport, Mr. Holburn, Mr. Noel, Mr. Kirton, Mr. Pollard, Mr. Price, Mr. Travannian, Mr. Jane, Mr. Edgcombe, Mr. Chilckly, Mr. Mallery, Mr. Porter, Mr. White Secretary to the Earl of Dorset, and Mr. Warwick.

The same afternoon this Bill of Attainder was carried up to the Lords House, where it rested many dayes, and had probably never passed, had not many of the Peers been terrified from coming to the House by the tumultuous multitude, in whom such fears and jealousies were infused by the artifices of some of the Members of both Houses, that when any debate was like to be carried against them in either House, they would send for great numbers of them with swords and clubs, who would menace, reproach, and assault such Members as disliked them; But notwithstanding all this violence of prosecution, the Lords were much unsatisfied, and so many scruples were started by them, that a conference was desired with the Commons to resolve them, and it was agreed that Oliver St. John the Kings Solicitor should on the 29th of this Moneth give their Lordships an account in publick in Westminster-Hall of the reasons impelling the House of Commons to proceed by Bill, ordering also that the Earl of Strafford should then be present. Whilest these things were in agitation, many consultations were had about raising money for the paying and disbanding the English and Scotch Armies in the North, and other matters relating thereunto.

The Commons had Voted to give three hundred thousand pounds to the Scots as a fit proportion for recompense of their losses and necessities occasion'd by this War, notwithstanding the great Levies made by them for their subsistence in the Northern Counties; but those that invited them hither, for their own purposes were effected, cared not into what extremity the Kingdom was brought,

These transactions were carried on with great heat by a clamorous pretended necessity of Reformation in Church and State, and the people were perswaded to believe their Religion and Liberties had been lost if the Scots had not interposed at this time; wherefore that the time of the Armies stay may be prolonged till such alterations in Church and State were made as they designed, all things were urged that might heighten the jealousies of the people, and at this time many apprehensions were raised of danger by the exercise of Popery and their access to the Court, as also of the continuance of the Army in Ireland: So that a Petition was presented to the King, for three things touching those matters:

A Petition presented to the King.

1. For removing of all Papists from Court:
2. For disarming of them generally throughout the Kingdom.
3. For disbanding the Irish Army.

To all which the King the 28th delivered answer contrarily thus:

The Kings
Answer to the Petition.

For the first, They all knew what legal trust the Crown hath in that particular, therefore he shall not need to say anything to give them assurance that he shall use it so, as there shall be no just cause of scandal.

For the second, He is content it shall be done according to Law.

For the last, He had entred into consultation about it, and found many difficulties therein, and he doth so wish the disbanding of all Armies, as he doth conjure them speedily, and heartily to joyn with him in disbanding those two in England.

The day after the King had given his answer, the Earl of Strafford in pursuance of what was before resolved, was brought into Westminster-Hall before a Committee of both Houses of Parliament, where Mr. St. John did endeavour to satisfy the Lords in the reasonableness of the Bill of Attainder to induce them to pass it; for though their Proofs at the Tryal were insufficient, and nothing but legal evidence could prevail in Judicature, by this way both Lords and Commons might proceed by the light of their own Consciences without any further proof whatsoever: And so it was expressly affirmed by Mr. St. John in the speech he then made, wherein he said:

Mr. St. J. has Reasons to the Lords for the Bill of Attainder.

That although single testimony might be sufficient to satisfy private Consciences, yet how far it would have been satisfactory in a judicial way, where forms of Law are more to be stood upon, was not so clear; whereas in this way of Bill private satisfaction to each mans Conscience is sufficient, although no evidence had been given at all.

And towards the conclusion of what he said after many aggravations of the Earls offences tending (as he said) to subvert our Laws; he told them, He that would not have had others to have Law, should not have any himself. It is true (said he) we give Law to Hares and Deer, because they be Beasts of Chase. It was never accounted either cruelty or foul play to knock Foxes and Wolves on the head, as they can be found, because these be Beasts of prey: the Warrener sets Traps for Powlcats and other Vermin, for preservation of the Warren.

Upon the Close of this Speech the Lords and Commons rose, nor was there a word spoken but by Mr. St. John, only the Earl by a kind of dumb eloquence, often holding up his hands towards Heaven, all along the Speech made his reply with a deep silence; and the next day, he petitioned the Lords to be heard again, alleadging that his Lawyers had not fully spoken at their last meeting; but this was denyed him, and many of the Lords shewed greater propensity towards the Earls condemnation than before; whereof the King being inform'd, he came the next day to the House of Peers, and having sent for the House of Commons, he spoke to them to this purpose:

The Earls
Petition for a second hearing denyed.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I had no intention to have spoken to you of this business to day, which is the great business of the Earl of Strafford, because I would do nothing which might hinder your occasions. But Judgement being ready to be past on him, I think it most necessary to declare my conscience therein.

The Kings
Speech concerning the Earl of Strafford.

I am sure you know I have been present at the hearing of this great Cause, from one end to the other: and I must tell you that in my Conscience I cannot condemn him of High Treason.

It is not fit for me to argue this business, I am sure you will not expect it, a positive Doctrine best becomes the mouth of a Prince, yet must I tell you three truths, which I am sure no man can tell so well as my self.

1. That I had never any intention of bringing over the Irish Army into England, nor ever was advised by any body so to do.

2. That there was never any debate before me, either in publick Council, or private Committee, of the disloyalty of my English Subjects, nor ever had I any suspicion of them.

3. That I was never Counsell'd by any to alter the least of any of the Laws of England, much less to alter all the Laws. Nay, I tell you this, I think no body durst ever be so impudent as to move me to it; For if they had, I should have made them such an Example, and put such a mark upon them, that all Posterity should know my intentions by it, they being ever to govern by the Law, and no otherwise.

I desire rightly to be understood, for though I tell you in my Conscience I cannot condemn him of High Treason, yet cannot I clear him of Misdemeanors; therefore I hope you may find out a way to satisfy Justice, and your own fears, and not oppress my Conscience.

My Lords, I hope you know what a tender Conscience is, and I must declare unto you, that to satisfy my People I would do great matters, but in this of Conscience, neither fear, nor any

1641. other respect whatsoever, shall ever make me go against it.

Certainly I have not deserved so ill of this Parliament at this time, that they should press me in this tender point, therefore I cannot suspect you will go about it. Nay, I must confess for Mis-demeanors; I am so clear in them, that though I will not chalk out the way, yet I will shew you that I think my Lord of Strafford is not fit hereafter to serve Me, or the Common-Wealth in any Place of Trust, no not so much as a Constable. Therefore I leave it to you my Lords, to find out some such way as to bring me out of this strait, and keep your selves and the Kingdom from such inconveniencies.

The Solemnization of the Marriage of the Prince of Orange and the Lady Mary, eldest Daughter to the King. Tumults at Westminster.

This coming of the King, and the Speech then made, relisht so ill with the two Houses, that few of them attended on the Solemnities of the next day, May 2. being Sunday, on which the Kings eldest Daughter married to the Prince of Orange, and the next day five or six thousand of Prentices and other tumultuous Citizens came down to Westminster, most of them arm'd with swords, and demanded of the Lords as they went to the House, Justice and Execution against the Earl of Strafford, and many of them they likewise affronted in their passage.

The same day intimation was given to the House of Commons of practices upon the English Army, to bring them up to London to awe the Parliament; which was an artifice used by some leading men, to add to those distractions already raised to fill the minds of the people with fears and jealousies, when in truth all that appeared in reference thereunto amounted only to this:

A Petition from the Army presented to the Parliament.

Observation being made of the great tumults about Westminster, which seem'd to threaten the safety of such of the Members of both Houses as were known not to agree with the designs of some passionate men, who countenanc'd the delivering of Petitions attended and subscrib'd by the hands of many thousands against the Laws and establish'd Government of the Kingdom, (which yet seem'd to receive some countenance, and to carry some authority, as instances of the affections of so many persons:) it fell into the thoughts of some Officers of the Army of known, and publick affections to their Countrey, that a Petition of a modest and a dutiful nature from the whole Army, For the composing and settling all Grievances in the Church and State by Law, might for the reason of it prevail with the whole House, and coming from such a Body might confirm those, who might be shaken with any fears of power or force by the Tumults: but even this in the debate of it had so many intervening difficulties, that it was laid aside two months before any discovery, yet nevertheless this Alarm gave occasion to the Commons immediately to frame a Protestation, which the same day it was made, was imposed upon all the Members before they were permitted to go out of the House, and was taken by all of them, except the Lord Digby and an Uncle of his, and shortly after, it was sent to the Lords, and by them taken also, and afterwards by an order of the House of Commons, all the Subjects of England were injoyn'd to take it, under pain of being thought unfit of bearing any office either in Church or Commonwealth, to which the Lords would not consent. The Protestation was in these words;

I A. B. do in the presence of Almighty God, promise, vow, and protest, to maintain and defend, as far as lawfully I may, with my life, power, and estate, the true Reformed Protestant Religion, expressed in the Doctrine of the Church of England, against all Popery and Popish Innovations within this Realm contrary to the same Doctrine, and according to the Duty of my Allegiance to his Majesties Royal Person, Honour and Estate; as also the Power and Priviledges of Parliament, the lawful Rights and Liberties of the Subject, and every Person that maketh this Protestation in whatsoever he shall do in the lawfull pursuance of the same. And to my power, and as far as lawfully I may, I will oppose, and by all good wayes and means, endeavour to bring to condign Punishment all such as shall either by Force, Practice, Plots, Counsels and Conspiracies, or otherwise do any thing, to the contrary of any thing in this present Protestation contained. And further, That I shall in all just and honourable wayes, endeavour to preserve the union and Peace between the three Kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland: And neither for fear, nor other respect shall relinquish this Promise, Vow and Protestation.

The Protestation taken by both Houses, and the Subjects of Eng. and.

How this Protestation was observ'd by most of them that took it, will be discovered hereafter.

On the fifth of May, ground was taken from the great apprehensions of the House of Commons, that the Parliament might be dissolv'd before Justice should be done upon Delinquents, publick Grievances redrest, a firm Peace betwixt England and Scotland concluded, and before Provision should be made for the re-payment of such moneys as should be taken up upon Credit to answer the immediate emergencies that were at that time in the State, to debate of the necessity of a Bill for the continuance of this Parliament not to be prorogu'd or adjourn'd, but by Act of Parliament, in which there was such haste made, that within two dayes after the first mention of it, it was pass'd in the House of Commons, and carried up to the Lords, where it staid not long, for the temptation was too great to let a Bill of this Nature be laid aside, and in a few dayes after it came before them, (viz.) On Saturday the eighth of May, both that, and the Bill of Attainder were pass'd; The Bill of Attainder had a hard passage, of forty five present, there were nineteen against it, there were many of the Earls friends that absent-ed themselves for fear of the tumults, otherwise the suffrages for him, had more than counterpois'd the Votes for his death: the same day they sent to the King, to desire access to him, which was granted, and about four a clock they attend-ed in the Banqueting house at Whitehall, where after some stay, these two Bills were presented to him, with a signification, that the present danger of the Kingdom could not admit of delay, and therefore they humbly besought him, to give his Royal assent thereunto; The King told them they should expect his answer on Monday, and so they parted from each other.

A Bill for the continuance of the Parliament passed by both Houses. The Lords also pass the Bill of Attainder.

They present both to the King, requesting his Royal assent.

On the next day which was Sunday, the King sends 1641. sends for the Arch-bishop of Armagh, the Bishops of London, Durham, Lincoln, and Carlisle, whom he desired as Casuits to advise him, whether in Justice he ought to pass the Bill of Attainder against the Earl? all but the Bishop of Lincoln, were very tender in this affair, the matters of fact they say he could himself best judge of, having been present at the Tryal; and for the matter of Law, what was Treason, and what not, he was to rest in the Opinion of the Judges, whose office it was to declare the Law, and who were sworn therein to carry themselves indifferently betwixt him and his Subjects, that the King might shew mercy to him, and pardon his offence, without any scruple of conscience, they said no man doubted, if other reasons of State did not hinder, of which the major part desired neither to be Judges nor Advisers; but the Bishop of Lincoln went a little farther, he urged the opinion of the Judges, and the Judgement of the Parliament thereupon, representing the terrible consequences of an enraged multitude, and that no other expedient could be found out to appease the people: It is not said the King was convinced by any thing said to him at this Conference, but the motive superiour to all, was a Letter he received from the Earl, wherein he thus concluded.

The King consults with the Bishops about the Case of the Earl as to matter of Conscience.

SIR,

The Earls Letter to the King for the freeing of his Conscience.

(To set Your Majesties Conscience at liberty,) I do most humbly beseech You, for the preventing of such mischiefs as may happen by Your refusal, to pass the Bill. By this means to remove praised be God, I cannot say this accursed, but I confess this unfortunate thing forth of the way, towards that blessed agreement which God (I trust) shall forever establish betwixt You and Your Subjects. Sir, My consent herein shall more acquit You to God, than all the World can do besides: To a willing man there is no injury done. And as by Gods Grace I forgive all the World, with a calmness and meekness of infinite contentment to my dislodging Soul; So Sir, I can give up the life of this World with all cheerfulness imaginable, in the just acknowledgement of Your exceeding Favours, and only beg that in Your Goodness, You would vouchsafe to cast Your gracious regard upon my poor Son, and his three Sisters, less or more, and no otherwise than their unfortunate Father shall appear more or less guilty of this death. God preserve Your Majesty.

Your Majesties Most Humble and Faithful Subject, and Servant,

STRAFFORD.

The King signs a Commission to pass the two Bills.

On the next day in the morning he signed a Commission to the Earl of Arundel, the Lord Privy Seal the Earl of Pembroke, and others, for the passing of the two Bills, the one for the continuation of the Parliament, the other the Bill of Attainder against the Earl of Strafford, than which Concession never any thing passed from him with greater Reluctancy at the present, or which he bewailed afterward with greater remorse of conscience; for those themselves that framed it, knowing of what dangerous consequence it might be hereafter to the lives and fortunes of the Subjects to let such a president remain in force; a clause was added to the Bill, that it should not be drawn into example for the time to come: which because it may seem strange to them that know it not, we shall here insert so much of the enacting part thereof as concerns this point, (for the Preamble is only a recital of the heads of the Accusation.)

Be it therefore enacted by the Kings Most Excellent Majesty, and by the Lords and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same; That the said Earl of Strafford for the heinous Crimes and Offences aforesaid; stand and be adjudged and attainted of High Treason, and shall suffer such pain of death, and incur such forfeiture of his Goods and Chattels, Lands, Tenements, and Hereditaments, of any Estate of Free-hold or Inheritance in the said Kingdoms of England and Ireland, which the said Earl or any other to his use, or in trust for him, have, or had the first day of the sitting of this present Parliament, or at any time since. Provided that no Judge or Judges, Justice or Justices whatsoever, shall adjudge or interpret any act or thing to be Treason, nor hear or determine any Treason, nor in any other manner than he or they should or ought to have done before the making of this Act, and as if this Act had never been made.

Thus have we Treason and no Treason in the self-same action; that being judged Treason in this one man. which never was to be judged Treason in any other.

What inducements the King had to pass this Act, and with what regret he did it, we have heard, but * who drew him to the other may be now inquired, some attribute it to the Lord Say then Master of the Wards, and one of his Majesties Privy Council, who as it is reported when the King asked him if a continuance for seven years might not serve the turn, made answer, that he hoped they would dispatch all businesses in so many Moneths, and that if his Majesty passed the Bill, it should be so far from the making the Parliament Perpetual, that he was confident they would desire to be dissolved before three years end; but most lay the blame on the Marquess of Hamilton, who by cutting out so much work for the King in England, doubted not to carry on his designs in Scotland without interruption, for it is credibly said, that he did brag much of this service when he was in that Kingdom, affirming frequently, that he had got a perpetual Parliament for the English, and would procure the like for the Scots before he had done: Although the King signed the Commission for passing of these Acts, yet the Royal assent was not given to them till the tenth of May, and on the next day, the King wrote to the Lords by the Prince of Wales, in these words.

* The Act for continuance of the Parliament.

My Lords,

I did yesterday satisfy the Justice of the Kingdom by passing the Bill of Attainder against the Earl of Strafford. But Mercy being as inherent and inseparable to a King as Justice, I desire in some measure to shew that likewise, by suffering that unfortunate man to fulfil the natural course of his life in some close imprisonment, yet so, that if

The King gives his Royal assent to the two Acts.

The King's Letter to the Lords in behalf of the Earl of Strafford.

1641. if he ever make the least offer to escape, or offer directly or indirectly to meddle in any sort of publick business, especially with me, either by Message or Letter, it shall cost him his life without further process. This, if it may be done without the discontentment of my people, will be an unspeakable contentment to me.

To which end, as in the first place, I by this Letter do earnestly desire your approbation, and to endear it the more, have chosen him to carry it, who is of all your House most dear unto me: So I desire that by Conference you will endeavour to give the House of Commons contentment; likewise assuring you, that the exercise of Mercy is no more pleasing to me, than to see both Houses of Parliament consent, for my sake, that I should moderate the severity of the Law in so important a Case.

I will not say that your complying with me in this my intended Mercy, shall make me more willing, but certainly it will make me more cheerful in granting your just grievances. But if no less than his life can satisfy my People, I must say, Fiat Justitia. Thus again recommending the consideration of my intentions to you, I rest,

Your unalterable and affectionate friend
Charles R.

If he must dye, it were Charity to reprieve him till Saturday.

The Lords
send to satisfy the King about this matter.

This Letter was twice read in the House of Peers, who after consideration thereof, sent 12 of their number to the King, to signify to him, that neither of the two intentions expressed in the Letter, could with duty in them, or without danger to his Consort the Queen, be possibly admitted. Which being accomplished, and more expressions offered, the King suffered no more words to come from them, but said, that what he intended by his Letter, was with an If, if it may be done without discontentment to his people. If it cannot be, I say again the same that I wrote, Fiat Justitia.

My other intention proceeding out of Charity, for a few dayes respite, was upon certain information that his estate was so distracted that it necessarily required some few dayes for the settlement thereof.

Whereunto the Lords answered, their purpose was to be suiters to his Majesty for favour to be shewed to his innocent Children, and if himself had made any provision for them, that the same might hold. This was well pleasing to his Majesty, who hereupon departed from the Lords. At his Majesties departure they offered up into his hands the Letter itself which he had sent. But he pleased to say, What I have written to you, I shall be content it be registred by you in your House. In it you see my mind, I hope you will use it to mine Honour.

Upon Wednesday the 12 of May, the Earl was summoned to his period: He was conveyed from the Tower by a Court of Guard, formed of the Trained Bands. Before him went the Marshalls men, next the Sheriffs Officers with Halberts, then the Warders of the Tower, then the Earls Gentleman-Usher bare-headed, and next him the Earl himself accompanied with the Primate of Armagh and others. Upon his first coming forth, being to pass near the Archbishops lodging (who stood at the window waiting for his approach) he lifted up his eyes, and espying the Arch-bishop, bestowed a low obeysance towards him, saying,

My Lord, your Prayers, and your Blessing: the Arch-bishop lifted up his hands, and bestowed both; but overcome with grief fell to the ground in animi deliquio. The Earl proceeding a little farther, he bowed the second time, saying, Farewel my Lord, God protect your innocence.

Being brought to the Scaffold, he addresseth his Speech to the Lord Primate to this effect:

My Lord Primate of Ireland,

It is my very great comfort that I have your Lordship by me this day, in regard I have been known to you this many years, and I do thank God and your Lordship for it that you are here. I am come hither by the good will and pleasure of the Almighty to pay that last debt I owe to sin, and to submit to that judgement which hath passed against me. I do it with a very contented and quiet mind; I thank God, I do freely forgive all the world. I thank God, I can say it, and truly too, my Conscience bearing me witness, that in all my employment since I had the honour to serve his Majesty, I never had any thing in the purpose of my heart, but what tended to the joynt and individual prosperity of King and People, although it hath been my ill fortune to be misconstrued.

There is one thing I desire to free my self of, and I am confident I shall obtain your Christian charity in the belief of it. I was so far from being against Parliaments, that I did alwayes think the Parliaments of England, were the most happy Constitutions that any Kingdom or Nation lived under, and the best means under God to make the King and people happy.

For my death I here acquit all the world, and beseech the God of Heaven heartily to forgive them that contrived it, though in the intentions and purposes of my heart, I am not made guilty of what I die for. And it is a great comfort for me, that his Majesty conceives me not meriting so heavy a punishment as this.

I wish this Kingdom all prosperity and happiness, and desire every one who hears me, to consider seriously, whether the Reformation of a Kingdom should be written in Letters of Blood. Let me never be so unhappy as that the least drop of my Blood should rise up in Judgement against any of you, but I fear you are in the wrong way.

I Profess that I dye a true and obedient Son of the Church of England wherein I was born, and in which I was bred. Peace and prosperity be ever to it.

This said, he desired all present to assist him in his Prayers, wherein he continued near a quarter of an hour, then rising up he bade all his friends farewell, especially by name his Brother Sir George Wentworth, by whom he sent his love to his wife, and blessing to his Children, willing him to charge his Son, never to meddle with the Patrimony of the Church.

Then he addresseth himself to the Block, and having prayed a while, he gave the Executioner the token of his preparedness, whereat the Heads-man doing his office, severed his head from his Body, at the first stroke. Thus dyed this unfortunate Earl. A Gentleman he was of excellent indowments, of a happy fluency in Speech, and of a searching and sound Judgement in Counsel, and alwayes faithful to his Master therein. The Scots designing some alterations in that Kingdom pre-

EIKON BASILIKH. Chap. 2.

For those were prone to create in him great confidence of undertakings, and this was like enough to betray him to great errors and many enemies: whereof he could not but contract good store, while moving in so high a Sphere, and with so vigorous a lustre, he must needs (as the Sun raise many envious exhalations, which condensed by a Popular Odium, were capable to cast a cloud upon the brightest merit and integrity.

The Earls Children restored to their Honour and Estates.

His Children were restored to their Honour and Estates on the Petition of the Lords and Commons; and the Commons were seemingly most favoured therein, to make some recompence to them, or to give proof to the Nobility (lest they should be scared by the example) that not so much the estate as the man was aimed at; but when the Kingdom had need of that head for its service, they could not restore it; for at this time our want of his great abilities makes them better understood than our fruition of them, so dark is our humane understanding in preserving that, which is useful and vertuous amongst us.

The King sent Sir Thomas Roe to the Diet at Ratisbone to assist his Nephew.

Though we were enter'd into great distempers at this time, yet the King was mindful of the restitution of his Nephew the Elector Palatine, who was to attend the Emperour at a Diet to be held at Ratisbone, and Sir Thomas Roe was appointed Embassadour from hence, to assist him there, and to add to the reputation of the Embassie, the Parliament joyned with the King in a Manifesto on the Electors behalf, but no success ensued.

The Parliament now in good security and power, began to think themselves concerned to disband both the Armies.

The Scots by the first cessation, were limited but for a Moneth, but they having resolved not to part with them, till they had procured the passage of several Laws in agitation, their stay was from time to time enlarged, till there was almost nothing left for the King to grant, as by several of the Acts hereafter mentioned may appear.

The Earls of Hartford, Essex, Bedford, Warwick, Lord Say with some others made Privy Counsellors.

The Triennial Parliament before spoken of was a great concession, for thereby the power of calling Parliaments, in case of neglect or refusal, was put into the hands of Sheriffs, and Constables, which every one thought a great foundation of confidence betwixt the King and his People: but because many of the peoples Grievances were conceived to proceed from the great Liberty of the Council-Board, or from some Orders and directions from them, the King admitted to his Privy-Council, the Earls of Hartford, Essex, Bedford, Warwick, the Lord Viscount Say, and some others, all of them eminently in esteem with the people for their reputation of Honour and Justice, that no irregularities might be there committed: and divers of the Kings most eminent Officers surrendered their Offices to the King, to enable him the better to gratifie most of them.

The Bishop of London's Office of Treasurer, was put into the hands of five Commissioners; the Earl of Hartford was sworn Governour of the Prince in the room of the Earl of Newcastle; and the Earl of Essex Lord Chamberlain of the Kings Household in the place of the Earl of Pembroke; the Office of Master of the Wards was resign'd by the Lord Cottingham, and conferr'd on the Lord Say; and the Earl of Leicester was made Lieutenant of Ireland: having thus begun, the King was resolved to proportion remedies to all the visible known Diseases of the State, by the advice and Counsel of both Houses of Parliament, making hitherto no rule to his concession but their asking: Thus they gain'd from him the abolition of the Star-Chamber, a Court formerly erected by Act of Parliament.

The Lord Treasurer and other great Officers resign up their Place.

The High Commission Court had proceeded with too much strictness, having so far out-grown the power of Law that it would not be limited and guided by it, and therefore that Branch of the Statute by which it was erected was repealed.

The Star-Chamber abolished.

The High Commission Court put down.

The Writs for Ship-mony, and all the proceedings in that business were by the Kings consent adjudged void, and the Judgments, Enrolments, and Entries thereupon vacated and cancell'd, though all the Judges had subscrib'd unanimously to the lawfulness of it in time of danger, of which danger the King was declared to be the Judge; and moreover, being brought to a publick Tryal, after it had been argued by Counsel on both sides in the Courts of Justice, and by all the Judges in the Exchequer Chamber, there passed a definitive Sentence for it: but this abrogation of Ship-mony, by a Law was not enough, for Bramston, Trevor, Weston, Davenport, and Crawly five of the Judges that gave their Opinions for it, were Impeached of high Misdemeanors for so doing, and Barkly another of the Judges accused of Treason, but no further prosecution was made therein.

Ship-mony relinquish'd by the King.

Five of the Judges for Ship-mony Impeached of high Misdemeanors, and Barkly Accused of Treason.

Under colour of executing the Forest Laws many had been vexed by presentments, fines, and imprisonments; for remedy whereof, the King passed a Law, for the certainty of the Metes, Limits, and Bounds of all the Forests in England, with great provision for the ease of the Subject in that behalf, likewise he passed a Law against divers incroachments and oppressions in the Stannary Courts, and in an Act for granting the Subsidy of Tonnage and Poundage to him, in the Preamble thereof he parted with his Title of Imposing; a power adjudged good, and exercised by former Kings, and though disputed, never resolved against by Judgement in Parliament. And by an Act for regulating the Office for Clerk of the Market, because the undue execution thereof had been grievous to many of the people; he consented that no Clerk of the Market of his House, should hereafter execute his Office in any part of the Kingdom, but only within the Verge of the Court, and granted the execution of that Office, to the Mayors and Bailiffs of Towns Corporate, and to the Lords of Liberties and Franchises; and in an Act obtained from him for prevention of vexatious proceedings touching the Order of Knighthood, he absolutely parted with and discharg'd a right and duty as unquestionably due due to him by the law as any service he could challenge; He parted also with his propriety in the making of Gun-powder, and consented to an Act, for disclaiming of his Power in pressing Soldiers, enjoyed by all his Predecessors for defence of his Person and the Realm: but that which chiefly protracted the disbanding of the Armies, was a Bill tender'd to the House of Commons, for the abolishing of Bishops root and branch, but that took no effect. And now the Treaty between the two Kingdoms being finished, and an Act pass'd for confirmation thereof, the Armies were suddenly to be disbanded, and for that purpose the Earl of Holland was made General of the English Army, and for the payment of them and other debts of the Kingdom, a Pole-Bill was passed, wherein the whole Kingdom was assessed, every Duke at 100 l. a Marquess at 80 l. Earls 60 l. Viscounts and Barons at 40 l. Knights of the Bath 30 l. Knights Batchelors at 20 l. Esquires 10 l. and every Gentleman disbanding 100 l. per annum, 15 l. and all others of ability, a competent proportion; the meanest through the whole Kingdom was not excused under six pence; As for the 300000 l. voted to be paid to the Scots towards a supply of their losses, it was agreed that 100000 l. thereof should be paid at Midsummer come twelve-moneth, and the other 200000 l. two years after; which was secured to them by Act of Parliament.

The Treaty between the two Kingdoms confirmed.

Earl of Holland made General of the English Army. A Pole Bill rais'd for the payment of the Armies.

Both the Armies disbanded. The King takes a journey into Scotland.

The King confers honour upon many persons during his abode in Scotland.

And on the sixth of August both Armies were disbanded, and four dayes after the King began his Journey to Scotland, to settle the affairs of that Nation, and on the same day both Houses of Parliament adjourn'd themselves to the 20th of October, and a Committee of the House of Commons consisting of fifty Members, was appointed to sit during the recess.

The King at his coming into Scotland, was received there with great demonstrations of affection by the people, and to oblige them to him, he confirmed not only the Articles of the Treaty betwixt the two Nations by Act of Parliament, but all his former concessions also, and all such things as had been acted by them in their general assemblies; And likewise the better to please them, he conferr'd Titles of Honour and Dignity on some, and great places of power, trust and profit on others: amongst these the Marquess of Hamilton was made Duke of Hamilton, General Lesly was created Earl of Leven, who was so transported with a sense of the Kings favour and bounty to him, that he often protested, and once at Perth upon his knees in the House of the Earl of Kenoul, that he would never bear Arms against the King.

A while after the King being at Edenburgh, some information was given to the Marquesses of Hamilton and Argile, that there was some design upon their persons, which made them for some few dayes withdraw themselves from the Parliament out of Edenburgh, but their persons were of such quality and estimation in Scotland, that great care was taken to discover the ground thereof, and after full examination by the Parliament, upon the whole, they themselves, and that great Council were satisfied, that the information first given to them, could not be made good to the proof of any design to the danger of their persons; but the King who was a little reflected on in the first information, could not conceal his resentment of this carriage in Hamilton, and when he delivered to him his Patent of Duke in Parliament (according to the manner of that Nation,) he told him he had not deserved to be mistrusted by him, for he knew well when he was accus'd to him of High Treason, he permitted him even then to lye in his Bed-Chamber: This reproof had no great impression on the new Duke, though he seem'd outwardly much troubled for having given the King so just a cause of displeasure, yet upon the first report of this business at London (without staying to hear the opinion of the Parliament of Scotland, who had fully examin'd it,) strange interpretations were made upon the matter as highly and nearly concerning the peace of England, and a sudden resolution was taken first by the Committee during the recess, and after by the Parliament, to have a guard for the defence of London, Westminster, and both Houses of Parliament, which troubled the minds of the people with the apprehension of new danger, when they were so lately freed from the fears of two Armies.

About the end of October this year, a Rebellion broke out in Ireland, which was carried so close, that no certain notice was given of the conspiracy till the very evening before it was to be put in Execution.

A Bloody Rebellion breaks out in Ireland.

The innocent Protestants were upon a sudden disseized of their Estates, and the persons of above 200000 men, women and children, murdered, within the space of one Moneth, and many of them with exquisite and unheard of tortures. That which increas'd the wonder of most men was, the consideration that the ancient hatred which the Irish, (a thing incident to conquered Nations) had born to the English, did now seem to be forgotten; forty years of peace had compacted those two Nations into one body, and cemented them together by all conjunctures of alliance, by intermarriages, and consanguinity, which was in outward appearance strengthened by frequent entertainments, and all kinds of friendly neighbourhood.

This design was to be put in execution on the 23 of October, upon which day, not only the Castle of Dublin, the Kingdoms chief Magazine, a Storehouse of 10000 arms at that time, but all other Forts and Magazines in that Kingdom, were to be surpriz'd, and all the English and Protestants that joyned not with them to be murdered.

The seizure of Dublin Castle was prevented by timely discovery of the Plot to the two Lords Justices, by one Owen O Conally of Irish Extract, but a Protestant, which discovery was but the very night before that fatal day, and the occasion of it very accidental, by one Hugh Mac Mahon, Grandson to the great Tyrone, a Gentleman of a plentiful Fortune, in the County of Monagan, and one that had been a Lieutenant Colonel in the King of Spains Service, who trusted this Owen with some relations concerning it at a Tavern.

O Conally by discovery of the Plot, prevents the seizure of Dublin Castle.

Upon which discovery, Mac Mahon and the Lord Mac Guire were presently apprehended by the Lords Justices, and many Conspirators of great note escaped that night out of Dublin; so was Dublin saved, that all Ireland might not be lost Mac Mahon and the Lord Mac-Guire apprehended.

1641. lost in one day. But the horrid design was past prevention, as to the general; for the Conspirators were up at the day fix'd in all Counties round about; and poor English Protestants arrived at Dublin every day, robbed and spoiled of all they had, relating how their Houses were seized, how Towns and Villages in all parts were fired, and cruel outrages committed.

The Earl of Leicester chosen Deputy for Ireland.

The Irish Rebellion occasioned by the Insurrection in Scotland.

The Lords Justices, Sir William Parsons, and Sir John Burlace taking those Arms which they found in Dublin, and arming whom they could to defend themselves, dispatched Letters to the King in Scotland, and the Earl of Leicester, then chosen Deputy, but staying in England.

It was generally said, the late insurrection (we must not call it Rebellion) in Scotland gave the first encouragement to this in Ireland, and the pretences were in many of them the same, namely, for Liberty of Conscience, not to have the English Bishops and Liturgie imposed upon them, and these, as those in Scotland, being mighty zealous in their Religion, when once they were possessed with a possibility of compassing their designs, executed whatever the impetuous dictates of Superstition or wicked exhortation of Priests could infuse into them, in this exceeding the actions of the Scots, whose Religion founded on more pious Principles, instructed them not to such bloody wayes of propagation of it.

The King receives intelligence of what hapned in Ireland, and sends Sir James Stuart with instructions thither. He moves the Parliament of Scotland for Aid, which they excuse.

O Conally, the discoverer of the Plot rewarded.

The Lords Justices sent Sir Henry Spotswood to Scotland to the King, with intelligence of all that hapned, and thereupon he sent Sir James Stuart to the Lords of the Privy-Council in Ireland, to acquaint them with his knowledge and instructions, and to carry all that money that his present stores could supply; He moved also the Parliament of Scotland (as being nearest) to a speedy help, but they excused their aids, because Ireland was dependent upon the Crown of England, but they said, if the State of England would use any of their men for that service, they would make propositions in order to it; at the same time likewise he sends Post to the Parliament of England, and a while after Owen O Conally the first discoverer of the Plot, brought Letters to London to the Earl of Leicester with an account of it, wherein the Lords Justices desired some reward might be given to him; upon the receipt of which the Parliament Voted him a gift of five hundred pounds, and an annuity of 200 lib. a year, and at a Conference of both Houses they resolved to consider of the relief of Ireland, and passed several Votes to that end; but little was done for their relief till the King returned to London, which was about the end of November.

The Irish pretend the Kings Commission for what they did, thereby to dishearten the English.

The Irish to dishearten the English from any resistance, bragg'd that the Queen was with their Army; that the King would come amongst them with Auxiliary Forces; that they did but maintain his cause against the Puritans; that they had the Kings Commission for what they did (shewing indeed a Patent that themselves had drawn, but thereto was affixed an old Broad Seal that had been taken from an obsolete Patent out of Farnham Abby by one Plunket, in the presence of many of their Lords and Priests, as was afterwards attested by the Confession of many.) That the Scots were in Confederacy with them, to beget a faith of which, they abstained for some time from the Lives and Fortunes of those of that Nation among them.

On the other side to encourage the Natives of their own party, they produced fictitious Letters wherein they were informed from England, that the Parliament had passed an Act, that all the Irish should be compelled to the Protestant worship; and the refusers for the first offence should forfeit all their Goods, for the second their Estates, and for the third their Lives. Besides, they presented them with the hopes of Liberty; that the English yoke should be shaken off; that they would have a King of their own Nation; and that the Goods and Estates of the English should be divided among the Natives.

And feigned Letters, that the Parliament would compel them to Protestantism.

With these hopes of Spoil and Liberty in the Irish, the Rebellion increased. The Rebels in Ulster under the conduct of Sir Phelim O'neal, assisted by Turbeck O'neal his Brother, Rory MacGuire Brother to the Lord MacGuire, Philip O'Rely, Mulvere O'Rely, Sir Canno MacGenness, called MacRuian, and others had possessed themselves of all the strong places in Ulster, (Londonderry, Colerain, and the Town and Castle of Eniskillen excepted) many places which the English defended, and they could not either surprize by Treachery, or take by plain force, they had surrendered to them upon composition and Articles, which they afterwards most perfidiously broke, butchering and massacring the poor English without pity or compassion to Age or Sex, though they still spared the Scottish Plantations in Ulster, because of their numbers; and likewise for fear of the Scottish Army so easily to be transported into the North parts of Ireland, till such time as their General Sir Phelim O'neal (one of the Race of the late bloody Earl of Tyrone, of English Education, a Gentleman of Lincolns-Inn, and a professed Protestant till some time before, having gathered together a numerous Rabble of the Natives, who daily flocked in to him, fell upon their Quarters; where though he exercised not that cruelty upon their persons which he did upon the English, yet he deprived them both of their Goods and Livings, enforcing many of them to fly away naked to the Scottish shore; from thence he marched into the English Pale, and in the beginning of November he took Dundalk, and soon after he encamped at Arde within seven miles of Tredagh.

The Rebels possessed themselves of all strong places in Ulster.

They contrary to Articles of surrender Massacre the poor English but spare the Scots.

The King finding his stay in Scotland to be somewhat longer than he expected, that the business of Ireland might not suffer thereby, referr'd the whole business of Ireland to the Parliament of England, who had undertaken the Charge and management of the War, wherewith the Earl of Leicester acquainted the Lords Justices, letting them know further, that they had declared a speedy and vigorous assistance, and had designed for their present Supply the sum of 50000 lib. which would be raised with all convenient speed.

The Parliament designs Money for Ireland.

By this time the Lords of the Council of Ireland had armed as many as they were able, and given Commissions for raising of several Regiments, which were put into the hands (for the most part) of Gallant men, as their actions afterwards testified to the World; Sir Charles Coote an active, and valiant man (who was also made

1641. made Governour of Dublin) with great speed made up his Regiment out of the poor robbed and stripped English which had fled to Dublin; Sir Henry Tichbourn a worthy Commander was dispatched away with a Regiment of Foot, to keep Tredagh from the approaching Rebels; the Lord Lambert, and Sir Thomas Lucas, Captain Armstrong, Captain Yarnier, with others raised many Companies of Souldiers there.

The Earl of Ormond made Lieutenant General of the Forces there.

This was done about the middle of November; at which time also the Earl of Ormond with his well armed Troop of Horse came to Dublin; wherewith in few days after, he was by a Commission sent from the Earl of Leicester, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (as likewise by the Kings approbation from Scotland signified in a Letter) made Lieutenant General of all the Forces there, who being a person of great estate, credit and reputation in that Kingdom, and a Protestant, did very eminent Service against the Rebels.

The Parliament in prosecution of their great promises, sent over twenty thousand pounds in money, which arrived seasonably at this time, their treasure being much exhausted, by paying the new Companies they had raised, but with this small relief they were much encouraged, and very successful service was performed in divers places against the Irish, but no levies of men were made in England, till the King had disclaimed his power of pressing Souldiers, and thereby laid himself open to those Arms that were afterward raised against him: the first Souldiers they sent was a Regiment under Sir Simon Hartcourt, who arrived in Ireland on the last of December.

A Regiment sent to Ireland under Sir Simon Hartcourt.

The King returns out of Scotland.

Whil' st that Kingdom was thus distressed, the King returned out of Scotland into England about the end of November, and was by the City of London entertained, feasted and conducted to his Palace at White-Hall with as pompous solemnity, and costly expressions of love and duty as ever any King of England was, and the chief of them afterward were feasted by him at Hampton-Court, where several of the Aldermen had the honour of Knighthood conferred upon them: but this little prospect of happiness was quickly clouded by a Remonstrance of the State of the Kingdom presented to him at Hampton-Court a few days after his arrival there, from the House of Commons, which they prepared for him against his coming to London, wherein all the mistakes and misfortunes which had happened from the Kings first coming to the Crown and before, to that very hour were with great asperity recited.

The Parliament present a Remonstrance to him at Hampton-Court.

Most moderate men wondered at this carriage towards the King, since he had from the first sitting of the Parliament, denied nothing to them they reasonably asked, and when he went to Scotland it was voiced to all, that he parted a gracious King, from a contented people: and in Scotland he gave so much satisfaction to that people (though afterwards as appeared by their unfaithfulness they were perverted) that they caused an Act (then in force) to be published and revived, That it should be detestable and damnable Treason in the highest degree that could be, for any of the Scots Nation conjunctly or singly to levy Arms, or any Military Forces upon any pretence whatsoever, without the Kings Commission.

An Act published in Scotland against levying Arms without the Kings Commission.

Those in the Parliament of England that were ill disposed to the Kings Person and Government (as too many were) were much displeased at these methods of his to gain the affections of his people, and therefore they used all the endeavours they could, to blast him, and this remonstrance as an engine for that work was prepared and brought into the House, where the greatest industry and skill imaginable was used by private solicitations, threats and promises to procure it to pass; the Debate lasted from ten in the morning till three of the Clock the next morning, so that at last they carried it by eleven Voices, when many of the more aged, and persons of best fortunes not accustomed to such watchings were wearied out, and many others not daring to provoke the prevailing faction, left the House: the consent of the Lords was not asked, for of that they despaired, though some of them were too apt to be seduced: this they presented to the King at Hampton-Court, with a Petition before it as sharp as the Remonstrance it self, wherein they desired him;

1641.

A Petition presented with the Remonstrance.

1. To concur with the People for depriving the Bishops of their Votes in Parliament, (for which there was yet no Bill passed.)

2. To imploy such people about him as the Parliament might confide: and,

3. Not to alienate any of the forfeited and escheated Lands in England, which should accrue to the Crown by reason of the Rebellion, and thereupon they promised to undergo the hazard and expences of the War, and to apply themselves to such Counsels and courses, as may support the Royal Estate with honour and plenty at home, and with power and reputation abroad.

This Petition and strange Remonstrance, was graciously received by the King, from the hands of the presenters, who were Members of the Commons House; and he promised to answer to them, but in the mean time desired, that the Remonstrance might not be printed and published to the People: the thing it self, and the printing any thing of the like nature, being never heard of, by the direction of the House of Commons till this Parliament, it being the first appeal to the people, and of fatal consequence, both to the King, and many of the busie Actors in this transaction.

The King receives the Petition.

And desires them not to publish the Remonstrance.

But without giving the King leisure to answer, special direction was given for printing the Remonstrance, and equal care taken for the publishing it in all places and parts of the Kingdom: but this did not hinder the King from performing his promise, to answer their Petition, and vindicate himself from those aspersions that were published in the Remonstrance, to lessen or blemish his Reputation with the people.

They contrariwise order it to be published in all parts of the Kingdom.

The King answers the Petition, and vindicates himself from the aspersions of the Remonstrance.

That part of the Petition, that he would not alienate the forfeited and escheated Lands in Ireland, he did not dislike, he said, it might be a resolution very fit for him to take (though he doubted whether it were seasonable to take resolutions of that nature, before the events of the War were seen) and to all the other parts, he gave such modest and gracious replies, (but yet not without some resentment of their dealing towards him) that many of the prime Actors were much discontented, to find their practices so fully discovered, so that they had recourse to their former perillous remedy, the tumults of the multitude to bring about their next design.

The Commons pass a Bill for disabling all Persons in Holy Orders to exercise Temporal Jurisdiction.

The Tumult upon the Lords fighting the Bill, comes to their House, and clamour against the Bishops.

The Commons justify those Tumults.

The Lords direct a Writ to the Sheriffs and Justices to suppress those Tumults.

Whereupon the Constables and Justices are sent for by the Commons.

The Bishops Protestation against the Actions of the Parliament.

For the Commons having passed a Bill for disabling all persons in holy Orders, to exercise any Temporal Jurisdiction or Authority (wherein the Votes of the Bishops in the House of Peers were taken away) when it came to the Lords House it met with a very cold reception; but the tumultuous Rabble were so insolent, that they assaulted and evil intreated some of the Peers even at the doors of their House, crying out against Bishops, and bending most of their Malice against them, whereby they were deterred from doing their duty; and afterwards they went to White-Hall, and made a stand before the Gate in a great body, saying, They would have no more Porters-Lodge, but would speak with the King when they pleased: and when the Lords at a Conference with the House of Commons, desired they would joyn with them in a Declaration for the suppressing such Tumults, several Speeches were made in justification of them, Mr. Pym saying, God forbid that the House of Commons should proceed in any way to dishearten people to obtain their just desires in such a way.

The Lords having in vain tried this way, appointed by advice of the Judges a Writ to be directed to the Sheriffs and Justices upon divers Statutes to suppress all tumultuous resort, in Obedience to which the Justices appointed the Constables and others to attend about Westminster, to hinder that unlawful confux of people, which was no sooner done, but the Constables and Justices of the Peace were sent for by the House of Commons, and the setting forth a Watch was Voted to be a breach of Privilege, and before any conference with the Lords, by whose direction that Legal Writ issued out, the Watch were discharged, and one of the Justices for doing his Duty according to that Writ was sent to the Tower.

These licentious and unpunished Tumults, gave occasion to the Bishops (who could not repair to the House without danger of their lives) to frame their Petition and Protestation to the King and Peers, which was to this purpose;

They protested themselves to abominate all actions or opinions tending to Popery, or any malignity against the State; but were willing and ready to perform their Duties in Parliament: But whereas coming to perform that Duty and Service, they have been rudely menaced, affronted, and put in fear of their Lives by multitudes of people, and can find no redress or protection upon complaint made; They therefore humbly protest before his Majesty and the Noble Peers, that saving to themselves all their Rights and Interests of Sitting and Voting in that House at other times, they dare not Sit and Vote in the House of Peers, until his Majesty shall further secure them. And because their fears are not in vain, but upon true grounds and objects, they do in all Duty and Humility therefore protest before his Majesty and the Peers, against all Laws, Orders, Votes, Resolutions and Determinations, as in themselves null and of none effect, which in their absence since the 27th of this instant December, 1641. have already passed, as likewise against all such as shall hereafter pass, during this their enforced absence from the said House. Which Protestation they desired the King to command the Clerk of that House to Record.

The Lords were so much displeased at this Protestation, that immediately at a Conference with the Commons, they declared it was of dangerous consequence, and deeply intrenching upon the fundamental Privileges and Being of Parliament, at which the Commons took so great a heat, that after a little debate, they passed a resolution by Vote to accuse them of High Treason, and sent Mr. Glyn to the Lords House to impeach them thereof, which caused their Commitment to the Tower, where they continued about four Months.

The King thinking himself at this time unsafe at White-Hall without a Guard, accepted of the offer of some Gentlemen of the Inns of Court to be a Guard to him, by which means the insolency of the Rabble was in some degree checkt, but they instructed by their heads laboured to make it more unsafe to the King, by seeking on this occasion to raise the rage and jealousy of the whole City against him. For at midnight there were cries made in the Streets of London, that all people should arise to their defence, for the King with his Papists were coming to fire the City, and cut their Throats in their beds; than which though nothing were more false, yet it found the effects of truth; and the people by such Alarms being terrified from sleep, the impressions of those nightly fears lay long upon their Spirits in the day, and filled them almost with madness.

The King upon this sent a message to the Common-Council of London; complaining of tumultuous assemblies of the people from the City daily resorting to Westminster, to the disturbance of that Place and his Palace at White-Hall; but the House of Commons to obviate this, petitioned him for a Guard for security of their Persons, alledging, that there was a malignant party; bitterly envenomed against them, who did daily gather strength and confidence, and were now come to that height of boldness, as to give out insolent and menacing Speeches against the Parliament itself. It was therefore their humble desires, that they might have a Guard out of the City, Commanded by the Earl of Essex, Lord Chamberlain of his Majesties Household, of whose fidelity to the King and Common-Wealth no question was ever made.

This Petition was denied by the King; but with a solemn engagement of himself by the word of a King, that the security of all, and every one of them from violence was, and ever should be as much his care, as the preservation of himself and his Children; and if this general Assurance would not suffice to remove those apprehensions, he would command such a Guard to wait upon them, as he would be responsible for to Almighty God.

The King at such time as he was in Scotland, had expostulated with some of the Chiefs among them, touching their coming into England in a Hostile manner, and found, that some who were now leading Men in the Houses of Parliament, had invited them to it. And having furnish'd himself with sufficient proofs thereof, he commanded his Attorney General to draw up an Impeachment of High Treason against some of them; That is to say, the Lord Kimbolton a Member of the House of Peers, Denzill Hollis Esq; Sir Arthur Haslerig, Mr. Hambden, Mr. Pym, and Mr. Strode, all Members of the House of Commons, appointing him likewise to inform the House of Peers therewith, and with the general matters of the Charge; and at the same time he sent a Serjeant at Arms to the House of Commons, to acquaint them that he did accuse, and intend to prosecute the five Members of that House for High Treason and did require that their Persons might be secured in Custody.

The Articles of their Accusation were, to this purpose.

1. That they had endeavoured to subvert the Government, to deprive the King of his legal Power, and to place on Subjects an Arbitrary and Tyrannical Power.

2. That they had endeavoured by foul aspersions upon his Majesties Government, to alienate the affections of his People from him.

3. That they endeavoured to draw his late Army from his Obedience, to side with them in trayterous Designs.

4. That they trayterously invited and encouraged a forrain Power to Invade his Majesties Kingdom of England.

5. That they trayterously endeavoured to subvert the very Rights and Beings of Parliament.

6. That they have endeavoured by force and terrour, to compel the Parliament to joyn with them in their trayterous Designs, and to that end have actually raised and countenanced Tumults against the King and Parliament.

7. That they have trayterously conspired to levy, and actually have levied War against the King.

The Commons justify the Accused
Members.

The House of Commons did nothing herein, to comply with the Kings intimation to them concerning the accused Members, but when a Serjeant at Arms was sent to arrest their Persons, there came a countermand from them, by which the Serjeant was deterr'd from doing his Office; for they had Voted, if any person came to attach them without order from that House, they might stand upon their defence, and make resistance.

The King seeing this obstruction of Justice, and that opposition was like to be made if he proceeded in the ordinary way of Justice resolved to go himself to the House of Commons, and by a clear discovery of his intentions, prevent all seeming inconveniences, and in this he was so secret (as he thought) that he discovered it not till the very minute of his going.

The King
comes to the House of Commons to demand the delivery of the five Members.

He therefore took with him the Palsegrave, (his Nephew) and about 100 Lords and Gentlemen, and their followers, and went to the House of Commons, where commanding his Attendance to move no further than the Stairs, to offer no violence, nor return any uncivil language to any, although provok'd; He himself, with the Palsegrave only, entered the House, and demanded that the accused Persons may be delivered into his hands, with whom he promises to deal no otherwise than according to Law; but they whom he sought, being before inform'd, as it is reported, of the Kings coming, by the secret intelligence of the Countess of Carlisle, had forsok the place, and withdrawn themselves into the City, wherefore the King having renewed his Charge, without injury to any, immediately departed.

This Act of the Kings was Voted by the Commons a breach of Priviledge, and strange Reports and Scandals were raised against him in the City of London, by the friends of the accused Members, as that he had offered violence to the House of Commons, and came thither with force to murder several Members, and used threatening speeches against the Parliament, with which the City was so possess'd, that unusual Watches were set, and Guards placed in several places thereof, as if some desperate attempt or assault were to be made upon it; and as if all men were now absolved from the rules of Obedience; Publick direction is given, for drawing down the Train-bands of the City to Westminster on a day appointed, to guard and bring in triumph the Persons accused of High Treason, as such worthy Patriots, that the Commonwealth it self could not subsist, but with reference to them.

This coming to the knowledge of the King, although many gallant and faithful Servants proffered their Service, to curb any insolencies that should be attempted on him, yet was he resolved to withdraw himself, with the Queen and their Children to Hampton-Court, to give time for their jealousies and rumors to waste and perish. And though the King was not conscious to himself of any error in his first proceeding against these Members, remembering that in a Petition from both Houses of Parliament in the beginning of his Reign, in the Case of the Earl of Arundel it was asserted, that in case of Treason, Felony, and breach of Peace, Priviledge of Parliament doth not extend; yet neither his desisting from the Prosecution of that Impeachment, nor any thing that he could either say or do, would give satisfaction.

The King
removes to Hampton Court.

But that nothing might be omitted in him to manifest the clearness of his intentions, he sent a Message to the Parliament of the twentieth of January, wherein in gracious expressions he proposed; That since particular Grievances and Distractions were too many, and would be too tedious to be presented by themselves, that they would comprise and digest them into one entire Body, that so both he and themselves might be able to make the more clear Judgement of them; And that it should then appear, by what he would do, how far he hath been from intending or designing any of those things, which the too great fears and jealousies of some Persons, seemed to apprehend; and how ready he would be to equal or exceed the greatest examples of most indulgent Princes in their Acts of Grace and Favour to the People.

The Kings
Message to
ment.

This Message was received by the Parliament with thanks, and most people expected very good effects of it, but the accused Members and their faction, fearing this good disposition of the King might put an end to their Empire, cast about all wayes how they might obstruct the settlement of affairs, and in a Petition to the King on pretence the better to enable them to discharge their duties in those matters, they desired him to raise up to them a sure ground of confidence by putting the Tower of London into their hands, together with the Command of the Royal Navy, as also all the Forts, Castles, and Train-Bands of the Kingdom, all which they comprehended under the Name of the Militia: This Petition was ill relish'd relish'd by him, but he concealed his resentment for some time, and about the midst of February he and the Queen went to Canterbury with the Princess Mary, and from thence to Dover, and there she imbarqued her self with her Daughter, and accompanied her to Holland: The Kings stay at Canterbury and Dover was not long, nor the place so remote, but that some business passed, of which the greatest was, The Bill for taking away the Bishops Votes in Parliament; from Canterbury the King came to Greenwich, and from thence he sent for the Prince of Wales, and the Duke of York to come to him, to accompany him to York, whither he forthwith went, as to a place of safety, where he might better find a way to compose those differences which now began to imbroyl the Kingdom.

The King removes to York.

The Parliament send after him in his journey to York two Petitions for the Militia, one came to him at Theobalds, and the other at Huntingdon, to both of which he gave a denial; but since they could not have it by his consent, they took it without it, and both Houses passed it by an Ordinance, and settled it in divers Counties in the hands of such as they reposed confidence.

The King issues out Commissions of Array.

The King and Parliament differ about who shall be chief Commander at Sea.

The King looked upon this as the beginning of a War against him, and therefore that he might not be surprized, he issued out several Commissions of Array to persons of the most eminent quality, to muster, train and array the Subjects for defence of himself and the Kingdom; and because of the indisposition of the Earl of Northumberland to command the Fleet, the King appointed Sir John Pennington in his place; but the Parliament by a Message of the 28th of March, disliked of that choice, and recommended the Earl of Warwick to the King; but this the King would not admit of; nevertheless they authorized him to command the Fleet without the Kings consent, and within a few moneths they used such arts, that he became possessed of the whole Navy: At Hull the King had a Magazine of Arms, and ammunition provided for the late intended War against the Scots, which was laid up there, when the occasion of that War was taken away. Of this Town he intended to possess himself, and to make use of his own Arms and Ammunition for his own Preservation; but coming before the Gates of the Town, he was denied Entrance by Sir John Hotham, who by the appointment of the House of Commons, had newly taken Charge of that place.

Sir John Hotham denies the King entrance into Hull.

He thereupon is proclaimed Traytor. The Parliament justifie Sir John Hotham.

The King thereupon proclaimed him Traytor, and by letters to the Parliament complained to them of the indignity, and required satisfaction, but they justified him therein, and sent a Committee of the Lords and Commons to reside there, for the better securing of the Garrison to them, and they gave the Governour power to raise the Train-bands for his defence. The King was forced for the time to indure this indignity, but being very intent on subduing the Rebellion of Ireland, he sent a Message to the Parliament to declare his intention to go thither in Person, and acquainted them with his purpose in order thereunto, to raise two thousand Foot, and two hundred Horse in the Counties near Chester for a Guard to his Person, which was so grateful news to the Lords Justices and Council of Ireland, that they very much rejoiced thereat; but the Parliament were so jealous of any thing that tended to the Kings security, that they resolved to oppose it, but in regard it was a popular action, they were forced to use art in it; They shewed many inconveniences in the undertaking such a journey, both in the hazard of the Kings Person, and interruption of the proceedings of Parliament; but the chief matter was an apprehension, that hereby the King might have a good occasion of raising Souldiers for his defence against the designs and contrivances against him; wherefore in the conclusion of their answer to the Kings Message, They declare, That they cannot consent to any levies but such as they shall advise and direct, and if any be otherwise raised, they must declare against them.

1642. The Parliament oppose the Kings intention to go in person into Ireland.

The King did hereupon decline the levying of Guards and his Journey to Ireland, but reflecting now upon the affront of Sir John Hotham to him, and hearing that the Parliament against his consent had raised Guards to themselves, He summoned the Gentry of York-shire to a meeting, and acquainted them, That his Magazine at Hull was going to be taken from him against his will, the Militia against the Law, and his consent, put in Execution, and Sir John Hotham's Treason countenanced; so that upon these considerations, he was resolved to have a Guard to secure his Person, in which he desired their assistance, that he might be able to protect them, the Laws, and the true Protestant Religion from violation, or injury.

The King summons the Gentry of York-shire to his assistance.

The Kings desires herein were with great affection complied with, but the Parliament, upon notice thereof, declared, That it is against the Laws and Liberties of the Kingdom, that any of the Subjects thereof, should be commanded by the King to attend him at his pleasure, and that whosoever, upon pretence of his Majesties command, shall take up Arms in a War-like manner, shall be esteemed disturbers of the Peace, and to be proceeded against accordingly; but this did not terrifie the people of York-shire from doing their duty to the King.

The Parliament's Declaration.

The breach now began to grow very wide, and many Members of both Houses repaired to the King to York, insomuch that in a very short space, there were more of the Peers at York, than sitting with the Parliament at Westminster.

Many Members of both Houses repair to the King to York.

The Commons, that they might not seem dejected at this time, sent up an impeachment to the House of Lords against nine of those Peers that deserted, that is to say, The Earl of Northampton, the Earl of Devonshire, the Earl of Dover, the Earl of Monmouth, the Lord Howard of Charleton, and the Lord Rich for high Crimes and Misdemeanors; the substance whereof was, For that contrary to their duty, they had deserted their attendance on the House, absenting themselves, after a Vote passed in both Houses, That the King seduced by wicked Counsel, intended to make War against the Parliament, and that whosoever served or assisted him in that War, was adjudged a Traytor.

The Commons impeach nine of the Peers.

The nine Lords censured.

Upon the impeachment, the House of Peers entered into debate thereof, and the nine Lords were censured :

1. Never to sit more as Members of that House.
2. That they should be utterly incapable of any benefits or Priviledges of Parliament, and that they should suffer imprisonment during their pleasure.

The Lord
Littleton flies to York with the Great Seal.

Not long after this, the Lord Keeper Littleton sent away the great Seal to the King, by one Mr. Eliot who was sent to him for it, and the next day he himself followed it, and came safe to the King at York; but this departure of the Seal, put the Parliament to a great plunge, and they sent (in vain) to intercept it in its passage.

The King found himself in very good esteem in the Northern parts, but he was rather willing to prevent the effusion of Blood, by any reasonable accommodation, than ingage the Nation in a Civil War; and during his abode at York many Messages and Replies to that purpose passed between him and the Parliament, and at last, that they might not seem altogether averse from Peace, about the beginning of June they sent a Petition to the King with nineteen Propositions.

The Propositions were :

The Parliaments Propositions to the King.

1. That all the Kings Privy Council, great Officers, and Ministers of State may be put out, excepting such as the Parliament shall approve, and to assign them an Oath.
2. That all Affairs of State be managed by the Parliament, except such matters as are transferred by them to the Privy Council, and to be concluded by the Major part of the Nobility under their hands: the full number not to exceed 25, nor under 15; and if any place fall void in the interval of Parliament, then the major part of the Council to choose one to be confirmed at the next Session of Parliament.
3. That all the Great Officers of the Kingdom shall be chosen with approbation of Parliament, &c. as before said.
4. The Government and Education of the King's Children by Parliament, &c. ut supra.
5. Their Marriages to be treated and concluded by Parliament, &c.
6. The Laws against Papists, Priests, and others be executed without Toleration or Dispensation, except by Parliament.
7. No Popish Lord or Peer to have Vote in Parliament, and their Children to be educated in the Protestant Faith.
8. To reform Church-Government as the Parliament shall advise.
9. To settle the Militia as the Parliament have ordered, and for the King to recall all his Declarations published against their Ordinances therein.
10. All Privy Counsellors and Judges to take Oath for maintenance of the Petition of Right, and other Statutes which shall be made this Parliament.
11. All Officers placed by Parliament to hold their places quam diu bene se gesserint.

12. All Members of Parliament put out during this time to be restored again.

13. The Justice of Parliament to pass upon all Delinquents, and they to appear or abide their censure.

14. The General Pardon to pass with Exceptions, as the Parliament shall advise.

15. All Forts and Castles of the Kingdom to be disposed of by Parliament, ut supra.

16. The King to discharge all his Guards and Forces now in being, and not to raise any other, but in case of actual Rebellion.

17. The King to enter into a strict alliance with all Reformed States, for their assistance to recover the Rights of his Royal Sister and her Princely Issue to those Dignities and Dominions which belong unto them.

18. To clear the Lord Kimbolton and the five Members by Act of Parliament.

19. No Peer hereafter to be made, shall sit in Parliament without their consent.

And these Articles being confirmed, the Parliament engage to make him a happy Prince.

The King shewed great dislike at these Propositions, for indeed they seemed rather calculated to gratifie the ambition of some of those that framed them, than for any other purpose, and the answer he gave was more smart than usually his answers were.

The King
rejects the
ons.

Amongst other things, he told them, That they had contrary to Law pressed their Ordinances on the people, wrested from him the Command of the Militia, countenanced the Treason of Hotham, and had directed to the People Invektives against his Government, asperst him with the favouring of Papists; and with an utter dislike of the Propositions, he protested, that if he were vanquishd and a Prisoner, in worse condition than any the most unfortunate of his Predecessors had ever been reduced unto, he would never stoop so low, as to grant those demands, and to make himself of a King of England, a Duke of Venice.

And now both sides prepared for War, and on the 10th of June an Order was made by both Houses of Parliament, for bringing in of Money and Plate to Guild-Hall for their Service, wherein it was exprest, that whosoever should bring any Money or Plate, or furnish any with Horse and Arms, should have their moneys repaid with Interest, according to eight in the hundred, for which both Houses of Parliament did ingage the Publick Faith.

Both sides make preparation for War.

The King was not wanting to his own Preservation in the mean time, and to do whatsoever might give encouragement to the business he had in hand; and first he assembled all the Peers then at York to attend him, and made to them a short Declaration, wherein he expressed himself to them in these words :

We do declare, that we will require no obedience from you, but what is warranted by the known laws, as We expect that you shall not yield to any Commands not Legally grounded, or imposed by any other. We will defend you all, and all such as shall refuse any such Commands, whether they proceed from any Votes and Orders of both Houses, or any other way, from all danger whatsoever. We will

And we will not (as is falsely pretended) engage you in any War against the Parliament, except it be for our necessary defence against such as do insolently Invade, or attempt against us and our Adherents.

Upon this Declaration of the King those Lords and others of his Council made a Promise to him, and subscribed it with their hands as followeth.

The Peers Engagement to the King.

We do engage our selves not to obey any Orders or Commands whatsoever, not warranted by the known Laws of the Land. We engage our selves to Defend your Majesties Person, Crown, and Dignity, with your just and legal Prerogative, against all Persons and Power whatsoever. We will Defend the true Protestant Religion Established by the Law of the Land, the lawful Liberties of the Subjects of England, and the just Priviledges of your Majesty, and both Houses of Parliament. Lastly, We engage our selves not to obey any Rule, Order, or Ordinance whatsoever, concerning the Militia, that hath not the Royal assent.

The King forbids the Lord Mayor of London to raise Arms or Money.

The King immediately wrote a Letter to the Lord Mayor of London, and the Aldermen and Sheriffs, forbidding by expresse Command any Contribution of Money or Plate towards the raising of any Arms whatsoever for the Parliament; and invited all his loving Subjects (to prevent their own danger and the danger of the Kingdom from a Malignant party,) to contribute Money or Plate to Him, and they shall be repayed with consideration of 8 in the Hundred, and immediately upon it, he made a Profession before those forementioned Lords and Counsellors about him; disavowing any preparations, or intentions to levy War against the Parliament; upon which the Lords and others then present at York, made this further Declaration and Profession, subscribed under their hands.

The Lords and others at York in a Declaration

We whose Names are under-written, in Obedience to his Majesties desire, and out of the Duty which we owe to his Majesties Honour, and to truth, being here upon the place, & Witnesses of his Majesties frequent and earnest Declarations, and professions of his abhorring all Designs of making War upon the Parliament; and not seeing any colour of Preparations or Counsels that might reasonably beget the belief of any such Design, do profess before God, and testifie to all the World, that we are fully perswaded that his Majesty hath no such intention; but that all his endeavours tend to the firm and constant settlement of the true Protestant Religion, and the just Priviledges of Parliament, the Liberty of the Subject, and the Law, Peace and Prosperity of this Kingdom.

acquit the King from any Designs of making War against the Parliament.

The King was strengthened with some Arms and Ammunition from Holland, from the endeavours of the Queen; but more strengthened by this Protestation in his behalf, concerning his intention of not making War against the Parliament, proceeded in his business with great circumspection and indefatigable industry, and from York he went to Newark, where he made a Speech to the Gentry of Nottinghamshire in a loving and winning way, commending their affections towards him: another Speech he made at Lincoln to the Gentry of that County full of Protestations concerning his good intentions not only to them but to the whole Kingdom, and the Laws and Liberties of it; so that within three weeks both in his own Person, and by his Messengers with Speeches, Proclamations, and Declarations, he advanced his business in a wonderful manner. From Lincoln he removed to York, and from thence to Beverley, from whence he sent a Message to both Houses, and a Proclamation concerning his going to Hull, to take it in, requiring before his journey that it might be delivered to him: Which they answered with a Petition, praying him to disband all his Forces about Hull, to recal his Commission of Array, dismiss his Guards, and come to his Parliament; at which the King was much displeased, and the Parliament Voted, that an Army should be raised, whereof by the Vote of both Houses the Earl of Essex was chosen General, with whom they protested to live and dye in that cause; the King had about 3000 Foot, most of them Trainband-men, and 1000 Horse before Hull.

The King takes a journey into Nottinghamshire and Lincolnshire, to win those Places to his party.

The King resolves to reduce Hull.

The Parliament raise an Army under the Command of the Earl of Essex.

Hotham upon the Kings advance, having the advantage of a Spring-tide, drew up the Sluces and drowned all the Countrey about the Town.

The Parliament took all care imaginable to supply the Town, which they reinforced with 500 Souldiers, under the Command of Sir John Meldrum. The King finding so great a strength to oppose him, and considering the preciousness of that time which he consumed there without hope of success, resolved to march away: some about him, laid the fault of his not prevailing, upon the unskilfulness of the Countrey Captains, and the unexperienced rawness of the Souldiers, it was said, the King might have sped better, if Sir John Pennington could have brought part of the Navy to his assistance, to have straitned them by Sea, but that was seized by the Earl of Warwick.

The King leaves Hull.

The Earl of Warwick gets the Command of the Navy.

The Earl of Essex was very busie in raising his Army, the Earl of Bedford was made General of the 1642. the Horle, Sir John Merrick Major General of the Army; the Lord Roberts, the Lord St. John the Lord Rochford, the Lord Gray of Growby, Mr Denzil Hollis, Mr. Hambden, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir William Waller, Sir Samuel Luke, Sir Henry Cholmley, and Mr. Grantham, all Members of Parliament, had Commissions for Regiments.

The Earl of Essex and the rest of the Parliament Commanders proclaimed Rebels by the King.

The King in the meantime was not idle, he went to Leicester, where he summoned the Gentry and Freeholders, and by his great affability won many of them to an opinion of his Cause, and from thence by the first of August he returns to York, where he summoned the County, and acquainted them with the Parliaments preparations for War, and desired their advice and assistance, for the Parliament had now published a Declaration for the raising of all power and force by Train-bands or otherwise to lead against all Traytors and their Adherents that oppose the Parliament, and them to kill and slay, as enemies to the peace of the Kingdom, and in it they named most of the Kings Lord Lieutenants and Commissioners of Array in the several Counties. The King then recommended to them the completing of a Regiment for the Prince, and that he might not be behind hand with the Parliament, he publishes a Proclamation, wherein the Earl of Essex was proclaimed a Rebel and Traytor to the King and Crown, and all Colonels and Officers authorized by the Parliament that should not instantly lay down their Arms, were declared guilty of High Treason.

To obviate this, the Parliament had declared, That whosoever shall return from the King to the Parliaments Army within ten days after publication, should have reception and pardon, excepting Persons impeacht of Delinquency or Treason, or such as have been eminent Actors against them, and except the Duke of Richmond, the Earls of Bristol, Cumberland, Newcastle, Rivers, and Carnarvon, the Viscounts Newark and Faulkland, Secretary Nicholas, Endymion Porter, and Mr. Edward Hyde.

The King hearing the Parliament intended to send an Army Westward, gave Commission under the Great Seal of England, to the Marquess of Hartford, to be his Lieutenant General within the Counties of Devon, Cornwall, Somerset, Dorset, Wilts, Southampton, Berks, Oxford, Hereford, Monmouth, Radnor, Brecknock, Glamorgan, Carnarvon, Pembroke and Cardigan; and sent to encourage Colonel Goring, who kept Portsmouth at that time for him.

The King sets up his Standard at Nottingham, He sends to treat with the Parliament.

The preparations were very great on both sides, and on the 20th of August the King set up his Standard at Nottingham, from whence he sent up a Message to both Houses by the Earls of Southampton and Dorset, and Sir John Culpepper for a Treaty of Peace.

When they came to Westminster they were not permitted to sit in Parliament, whereof they were Members, nor could the Earl of Southampton (against whom there was least exception) be admitted to deliver it, but it was sent into the House of Peers by the Usher of the Black Rod.

In the Message the King signified, That observing that many mistakes had arisen by the Messages, Petitions, and Answers, betwixt him and the two Houses of Parliament, which might be prevented by some other way of Treaty, wherein the matters in difference might be more clearly understood, and more freely transacted, he proposed that a certain number of persons might be sent, and enabled by the Parliament to a Treaty in some indifferent place, with the like number authorized by him.

The Parliament answered to this effect, That until he take down his Standard, and recal those Proclamations and Declarations whereby he declared the actions of both Houses to be treasonable, and their persons Traytors, and whereby he had put them and the whole Kingdom out of his protection, they cannot admit of any such Treaty.

The Parliaments answer to the Kings Message.

The King replied to this, That he never did declare both Houses of Parliament Traytors, or set up his Standard against them, much less to put them and the Kingdom out of his protection; and to remove all scruples which might hinder a Treaty, he promised so that a day be appointed by them for the revoking their Declarations against all persons as Traytors, or otherwise for assisting him, he will upon the same day recal his Proclamations and Declarations, and take down his Standard.

The Kings reply.

To this the Parliament answered by Petition, insisting upon their former request, To recal his Proclamations, concluding, that they can never allow themselves to be ballanced with those persons about the King, whom they stiled persons of desperate dispositions and Counsels.

Thus did they contend for some time by Declarations and Proclamations, which proved all fruitless, for the Parliament having in their power all the Kings Revenue and his Navy, together with the strength and riches of the City of London, and great contributions from them and others of money and plate, thought the Kings forces so inconsiderable in respect of theirs, that they despised all the overtures he made for peace, or put such expressions into the answers they made to them, that he could not with honour and safety approve of them.

About the beginning of September Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice, the second and third Sons of the late King of Bohemia, came to offer their service to the King their Uncle, whom presently he put into Command, Prince Rupert within a fortnight after his arrival commanded a small party of those Forces which the King had at that time gathered together; with which he marched into divers parts of Warwickshire, Nottinghamshire, Leicestershire, Worcestershire, and Cheshire, his forces still encreasing as he marched, Prince Rupert and Pr. Maurice put into command by the King.

And whilst the Prince was thus active with his party, the King moved on slowly with those forces which he had, through Darbyshire, Staffordshire, Leicestershire, and Nottinghamshire, and so on to Shrewsbury, where he intended to Quarter for a time, as a fit Rendezvouze for those Troops and Companies he expected from Wales and other adjacent parts, for those of Denbigh and Flintshire, 1642. shire, and generally all Wales were very cordial to him and his Cause.

To Shrewsbury the King caused a Mint to be brought, and there coined all the Plate which he then had, or was then and soon after presented to him; for the University of Cambridge, and many Noblemen, Gentlemen, and others, about that time had sent their Plate to him, and many others had furnished him both with Men, Horses, and Arms; and within few dayes after his coming thither, his strength by his diligence and address was wonderfully increased, even beyond his own hope, for he had summoned the Gentry and Freeholders, and made to them a Speech so full of affectionate Expressions, as rendred him to their thoughts, an injured Prince, and moved compassionate affections towards him: the Speech it self was in these words;

Gentlemen,

His Speech to the Gentry.

It is some benefit to Me, from the insolencies and misfortunes which have driven me about, that they have brought me to so good a part of my Kingdom, and to so faithful a part of my people: I hope neither you nor I shall repent my coming hither; I will do my part that you may not; and of you I was confident before I came. The residence of an Army is not usually pleasant to any place; and mine may carry more fear with it, since it may be thought (being robb'd and spoiled of all mine own, and such terrour used to fright and keep all men from supplying me) I must only live upon the aid and relief of my people. But be not afraid, I would to God my poor Subjects suffered no more by the insolence and violence of that Army raised against me, (though they have made themselves wanton even with plenty) than you shall do by mine; and yet I fear I cannot prevent all disorders; I will do my best: And this I promise you, no man shall be a loser by me, if I can help it.

I have sent hither for a Mint, I will melt down all my own Plate, and expose all my Land to Sale or Mortgage, that if it be possible, I may not bring the least pressure upon you: In the mean time, I have summoned you hither to do that for me and your selves, for the maintenance of your Religion, and the Law of the Land (by which you enjoy all that you have) which other men do against us. Do not suffer so good a cause to be lost, for want of supplying me with that, which will be taken from you by those who pursue me with this violence. And whilst these ill men sacrifice their Money, Plate, and utmost industry to destroy the Commonwealth, be you no less liberal to preserve it. Assure your selves, if it please God to bless me with success, I shall remember the assistance that every particular man here gives me, to his advantage. However, it will hereafter (how furiously soever the minds of men are now possessed) be honour and comfort to you, that with some charge and trouble to your selves, you did your part to support your King, and preserve the Kingdom.

God had so blessed the just endeavours of the King, that before the middle of October, which was about three weeks after his first coming to Shrewsbury, with a small body of an Army, he was grown to a strength consisting of 6000 foot, three thousand brave horse, and two thousand dragoons in one body, besides what he had in other parts, of which he gave the chief command, under himself, to the Earl of Lindsey, and the next to General Ruthen a Scotch Gentleman of great experience, and Prince Rupert was made General of the Horse, and the next in command to him was Commissary Wilmott.

Whilst the King and the Parliament were gathering their forces together, several parties were employed in divers parts of the Kingdom; Colonel Goring was besieged in Portsmouth by Sir John Meincles Regiment of Foot, and the County Trained-Bands, with one Troop of Horse, to which place a Squadron of the Fleet was also sent to straiten it the more, and the Garrison Soldiers were so practised on, the Governour had no confidence in them, so that though the Marquess of Hartford hastened to his relief with some Forces he had newly raised, yet he was necessitated to surrender the Town before he could help him, and had conditions to be transported in one of the Kings Ships to the Brill in Holland, whither he was conveyed accordingly; But the Marquess of Hartford, though he could not secure Portsmouth, yet he seized on Sherborne Castle in Dorsetshire, and passed by the Earl of Bedford, (who commanded in those parts a party of the Parliaments Troops) and marched over Severn into Wales to raise more Forces for the King, giving the Earl a little brush in his passage.

The Parliament Army raised under the Earl of Essex, was now grown to a considerable Bulk, consisting of about 16000 Horse and Foot united in one Army, besides parties abroad, their general Rendezvous was at Northampton, where the Lord Brooke, Lord Roberts, Colonel Hamden, and many others of the chief Commanders staid with them, expecting the presence of the General, and on the ninth of September, he set out of London with great solemnity; the Parliament sent a Petition to him at Northampton, to be by him presented to the King; the effect of which was, To entreat his Majesty to withdraw his presence from those wicked persons about him, (for so all the Kings party were called by them) and not to mix his danger with theirs, but that he would return to his Parliament without his Forces, and by their advice compose the present distempers.

The Earl of Essex after he had been at Northampton a while, had increased his Army to the number of 20000, from whence he marched to Coventry, and from thence to Warwick, and having left some Companies in both those Towns for their security, he march'd away towards Worcester, upon intelligence that the King himself intended to come thither with his Forces.

Sir John Byron had first entred Worcester for the King, whom Captain Fiennes had endeavour'd to dislodge, with some Troops of the Parliament and Countrey Volunteers which he had gotten together, with whom he assaulted the Town on the West side of Severn, supposing some of Essex his Troops were marching towards the Town on the other side, (as he was informed by a Spie,) but those proved to be a party of the Kings Horse under Prince Rupert, who march'd into the Town with 500 Horse, and made Fiennes draw off to a distance. The Prince had notice that Colonel Sandys with a Regiment of Parliament Horse, together Glocester and Bristol Garrisons for the Parliament.

The Kings party powerful in the North.

And in Cornwall.

The Prince after the fight drew into Worcester, but hearing Essex was marching thither with his whole Army, he went away to Ludlow, twenty miles from thence; nor was his intelligence ill, for immediately after the fight Essex came to Worcester with his Army, where he lay a Month, and from thence he sent the Earl of Stamford with a Party to Hereford to impede the Kings levies in South-Wales, and sent other Forces to possess Glocester and Bristol. The Parliament began now to apprehend the Kings strength; for many began to appear for him in several parts of the Kingdom; in York-shire and the Northern parts, the Marquess of Newcastle, the Earl of Cumberland, Sir Marmaduke Langdale, Sir Francis Wortly, and many others had raised many Souldiers, and were so powerful, that the Lord Fairfax, Sir Thomas Fairfax his Son, Sir John Hotham, and his Son Capt. Hotham, who had gathered some men together for the Parliament, were not able to appear against them: In Cornwall a body was framing under Sir Bevil Greenvil and Sir Nicholas Slanng; and Sir Ralph Hopton a person of good conduct and courage was hastening to them to assist in their Levies, and many others in several parts of the Kingdom were arming on both sides.

Whilst the affairs of England were in this Military posture, Ireland was neglected, some few Regiments were sent over from Scotland, and the Earl of Leicesters Regiment under Colonel Monk from England, but in no proportion to the necessities of that Kingdom, nevertheless they made many impressions upon their Enemies into Lemster and Ulster, but Munster was but meanly supplied.

The Title of the Act.

The King had consented to an Act of Parliament before he left London, For the speedy and effectual reducing of the Rebels in his Majesties Kingdom of Ireland to their due obedience; wherein several persons were invited as Adventurers to advance money for that service, who were to be repaid in Land for the same when the Rebels should be subdued, according to the proportions following, for each adventure of 200 lib. one thousand Acres in Ulster: for three hundred pounds, one thousand Acres in Conaght; for 450 lib. one thousand Acres in Munster; for six hundred pounds, one thousand Acres in Lemster; all according to the English measure, and consisting of Meadow, Arable and profitable Pasture, the Bogs, Woods, and barren Mountains being to be cast in, over and above, and to be holden in free and common Soccage of the King, as of his Castle of Dublin, and so for greater or lesser sums: and it is particularly enacted, That no part of that money which should be paid in according to the Act, shall be employed to any other purpose, than the reducing of those Rebels, until they shall be declared to be subdued. The Parliament nevertheless to enable them the better to set out their Army, had diverted 100000 l. of this Money, whereat the King was very much offended and relented it very sharply in one of his Messages to them; but they answered, That they did intend speedily to repay it, and to recapitulate, did charge the King with intercepting 9000 Suits of Cloathes, with a Chirurgeons chest, and some draught Horses going into Ireland for the Train of Artillery there; but the Parliament made yet bolder, and made use of the greatest part of a Brigade raised under my Lord Wharton and one Colonel Horton, deligned for Munster, against the King in a Battle which was this year fought, of which hereafter; but by this proceeding on both sides, it was evident they both thought the security of England more considerable to them than that of Ireland, which could not well subsist without this.

1642. The Parliament divert some of the money designed for the relief of Ireland, for setting out their own Army.

It was now about the middle of October when the King came from Shrewsbury, he marched along by Coventry and summoned the Town, but by the example of Hull, he was denied entrance.

The King denied entrance into Coventry.

Marching on, he came and lay at Southam, being but a small distance from Essex his Army, from whence he struck a terror into the City of London it self, for he was then nearer to London than Essex was, insomuch that both Houses began to apprehend his approach, and Ordered that the Train Bands should be speedily raised for a Guard, and some works for planting of Ordnance in special places about the City of London and Suburbs, and the Parliament sent twelve Companies to possess and guard Windfor Castle.

The Earl thought it his chief work to march as near to the King as he could; and on the 22th of October he lodged at Keinton within six miles of the King, who then lay at one Sir William Chause's house near thereunto, and his Forces lodged at Cropredy and Edgecor.

The King the next morning drew his Army to Edgehil, and Essex intended to rest all Sunday in Keinton, to expect two Regiments of Foot, eleven Troops of Horse, and seven Pieces of Cannon who were a dayes march behind him, but when he heard the Kings Army was in the field, he drew his Army into Battalia, consisting of 12000 Foot in twelve Regiments, and 40 Troops of Horse and Dragoons; the Kings Army was esteemed about ten thousand Foot, and about 4000 Horse and Dragoons, but most of the Foot were very ill armed; at the bottom of Edgehil, there was a large Plain, called the Vale of the Red Horse, where Essex drew his Army into Battalia, about a half mile distant from the foot of Edgehil; the main Battel of the Kings Army was led on by the Earl of Lindsey on foot, with a Pike in his hand, Prince Rupert commanded the Kings right wing, wherein was the greatest strength of Horse, and General Ruthen, and Commissary Wilmot in the left; the right wing of the

The Battel at Edgehil.

1642. the Parliaments Horse was commanded by Sir Philip Stapleton, and the left which had the greatest force, by Sir James Ramsey then Commissary General; the General himself was in the Main Body, and Sir John Meldrum had the Van: the King perceiving the Hedges near the hill lined by some Muskettiers of Essex his Army, sent Major Bostock and Captain Hammond of Sir Lewis Dives his Regiment down the Hill to remove them, but in the mean time my Lord of Essex caused three pieces of Cannon to be fired upon the Kings Army, which was answered from the King with the like number, and then the Battel began, and was continued with such fury, that near six thousand were slain upon the place; and the Parliaments Army was in great danger to have been totally ruined that day, with so absolute a Victory on the Kings side, that in all probability this blow might have put a conclusion to the War; if it had not been for a Brigade of fresh Men, which was seasonably brought in under the Command of Hambden to their Relief. This succour gave Essex his broken Troops time to rally, and put them in a Condition of maintaining the dispute, which they did with so much resolution, that it was a long while doubtful what might be the event of the Battel: till in the end, Prince Rupert having wholly routed Essex his left Wing, fell in to the assistance of those Regiments that were over-powr'd, and secured the Victory to the Kings party, which was before dubious. Those of Quality that were lost of the Kings side, were, the Earl of Lindsey, the Lord Aubigny, and Sir Edward Verney: of the Parliaments side many were slain, but there being but few of equal note in that Service to those of the Kings, they are not remembred, only mention is made of the Lord St. John, Col. Charles Essex, and Lieutenant Col. Ramsey; the Lord Willoughby of Eresby, Colonel Vavasor, and Sir Edward Stradling of the Kings party were taken prisoners; the Kings Standard was taken, but regained by Captain Smith, who for that service was in the field knighted Banneret; each part pretended to the Victory, but it went clearly on the Kings side, who though he lost his General, yet he kept the field, and possess'd the dead bodies, and rifled all the Wagons and Carriages of the Enemy; and not so only, but he made his way open to London, which the Earl before endeavoured to hinder, and in his way in the very fight as it were of the Earl of Essex, he took Banbury Castle, where he had fifteen hundred Arms, and finally entred triumphantly into Oxford, with no fewer than an hundred and fifty Colours. Amongst the papers of the Earl of Essex, a Letter was found from one Blake that attended the King, and held correspondence with the Enemy, for which he was tried by a Court Martial, and condemned and executed betwixt Abington and Oxford.

Banbury Castle taken by the King.

The Earl after the Battel marched to Warwick, and left the Countrey clear to London to the King, and he after a very short stay at Oxford, Marched through Abington to Henley, where his Army was two or three dayes refreshed, and from thence he made a nearer approach towards London, and came to Colebrook; in the mean time the Earl of Essex had also marched with his Army nearer to London, and on the seventh of November came himself to Westminster, where he was welcomed by both Houses of Parliament, and had a present of 5000 lib. given to him.

Whilst the King was at Colebrook, the Parliament sent a Petition to him by two Peers, and three Commoners, wherein in very humble terms, they desired his Majesty to stay at some convenient place not far from London, till such time as Committees of Parliament might attend him; with some Propositions for the removal of the present Distempers; the King liked well of this Petition, and sent back the Messengers with a very complying answer, signifying, that he would reside at his Castle at Windsor, or any other place if that should not be liked, till such time as Committees might be sent to him: but the same night that he had dispatcht these Messengers, news was brought that Essex had advanced with his Army, and the Artillery towards him, and that having possess'd himself of Windsor, Kingston, and Aton, if Brentford were likewise possess'd, the Kings Army would be so straitned, that it could neither well move nor subsist; whereupon a Council of War being called, it was resolved that part of the Army should advance, and dispossess the Enemy from Brentford, which was accordingly done, and there was for some time a very sharp fight, betwixt the Kings Forces and those of the Parliament that were there lodged, but the Kings party prevailed, killed the Commander in chief then present, and several others, and took 500 prisoners, and as many Arms, with 15 pieces of Ordnance, 11 Colours and store of Ammunition; and the King was resolved the next day to have marched to London, had not advice come, that both the remainder of that Army under Essex, & the Auxiliaries of London under the Earl of Warwick, were drawn upon Turnham-Green to oppose his marching further; whereupon he passed his Troops over Kingston-Bridge to Otlands, and from thence to Redding, where he left a good Garrison, and marched with his Forces to Oxford.

1642. The Earl of Essex comes to Westminster and is received with great honour. The Parliament present a Petition to the King at Colebrook.

The fight at Brentford, in which the Kings party prevailed.

The King marched to Oxford.

The City of London were very much instigated by some Incendiaries upon this action of the Kings, and were wrought on to Petition the Parliament to proceed no further in the business of accommodation, for which they had the thanks of both Houses; though the Parliament in a Message to the King, did confess, that they gave direction to the Earl of Essex to draw the Army out of London, and that part of it was quartered at Brentford, whilst the Committee was with the King, but they endeavoured to excuse it, by saying, that they sent a Messenger with a Letter to know whether his Majesty intended forbearance of Hostility, who found the parties in fight, and could not pass.

The Kings Forces in the North, became very considerable; the Earl of Newcastle, and the Earl of Cumberland being joyned, made up 8000 Horse and Foot, and their power daily increased, so that the Lord Fairfax and his Son Sir Thomas, Captain Hotham, Sir Hugh Cholmley, Sir Edward Loftus, Sir Mathew Bointon, Sir Henry Anderson and others, who commanded for the Parliament in these parts, were ill able to withstand them; and the Kings side received a good addition of strength in those parts, by the landing of Colonel Goring at Newcastle with two hundred Commanders from Holland, and other provisions of War, which made the Lord Fairfax and those with him implore aid from the Parliament, and they therefore form'd an association of the Counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Cambridge, the Isle of Ely, and the City of Norwich, whereof the Lord Grey of Wark was by Commission of the Earl of Essex made Commander in chief, with authority to raise Forces.

In February General King a Scotch Commander of great experience in Military affairs, came out of Holland, landed at Newcastle, joyned himself with the Earl of Newcastle, and passed to York with 6000 Arms. In the same Moneth also the Queen landed from Holland at Burlington Bay, with great Provision of Arms and Ammunition, and many Commanders of note in her Retinue, and was conveyed by the Earl of Newcastle to the City of York, to which place, the Earl of Montross, and the Lord Ogilby came to her out of Scotland with 120 Horse; and Sir Hugh Cholmely, who had the Government of Scarborough for the Parliament, declar'd for the King, and presented himself at York with 300 men to the Q. for his Service: Sir John Hotham also and his Son, were at the same time inclin'd to desert the Parliaments cause, but their intentions were discovered, and they were both seized upon at Hull, & sent up to London, where they long remained Prisoners in the Tower, before the time of their Tryal and Execution.

The Parliament having fortified Gloucester with a good Garrison, thought of enlarging their quarters towards Oxford, and had in order thereunto, drawn a great strength into Cirencester, the King was not well pleased with this neighbourhood, but ordered Prince Rupert with 4000 horse and foot, to take the Town, who marching by as if he intended to attempt Sudeley Castle, (which had been lately before taken by * Massey.) when they expected him not, turn'd his whole force upon them, and after about an hours resistance made himself Master of the place, where he took eleven hundred Prisoners, and three Thousand Arms.

The King was not so exalted by these successes to be well pleased with a War, that brought so much calamity to his people, and therefore he proposed a Treaty to the Parliament, to which after many delays they consented, and about the beginning of March, the Earl of Northumberland, Mr. Pierpoint, Sir William Ermine, Sir John Holland, and Mr. Bulstrode Whitlock attended him at Oxford with Propositions of Peace; but they were such as rather did beseech a conquering than a losing side, yet the King was resolv'd to treat upon them; howsoever, he found the Commissioners so straitned in time, and so tyed to such particular instructions as the Houses had given them, that nothing could be yielded to which might conduce to the composing of the present distempers, so that after many Messages betwixt London and Oxford, the Parliament sent to their Commissioners to return to London upon the 17th of April; upon which the Earl of Essex immediately advanc'd with his Army to besiege Redding then a Garrison for the King.

The King upon the first notice sent a supply of 700 Musketeers to the Town, and some store of Ammunition, but all could not avail to the holding out of the Town against so great an Army, continually supply'd from London with fresh Men, Provisions and Ammunition.

The King therefore after a while sent a good body of Horse and Foot to relieve the Town, who assaulted a quarter of the Parliaments Army at Causum Bridge within a mile of it, where many of the Kings Forces were slain, and forced to retreat, but those in the Garrison were thought to have failed in performance of their Duty, in not drawing out a sufficient party to have made a diversion at the same time, but the failure herein was imputed to Colonel Fielding then Lieutenant Governor for Sir Arthur Aston the Governor, who was disabled from service by a bruise or wound he had received in the siege, so that within 16 days of Essex his first sitting down before the Town, it was render'd to him upon Terms, but honourable enough, viz. All the Forces to march out in war-like manner with 50 Carts for carriage, free passage to Oxford, the Town to be sav'd from plunder, and that whosoever would, might have liberty to leave it within six weeks after.

The Town of Redding was infected with a Pestilential Feaver when Essex enter'd it, which caused a great sickness and mortality amongst his Souldiers, besides which, they were much discontented for want of Pay, so that when he removed to Causum House to avoid the Infection, many of his Souldiers unanimously disbanded and went away; but though he gain'd nothing by this Town, the murmur at Oxford was great for the losing of it, and Colonel Fielding was accused of Treachery therein, and being found guilty by a Court Martial, was sentenced to be shot to death, but by the Kings clemency he was pardoned.

About this time scarce any County of England was free from the War, and in most places the Kings parties were Victorious; in Warwickshire, Northamptonshire, and Staffordshire, many encounters passed betwixt the Kings Forces under Prince Rupert and the Earl of Northampton of the Kings side, and the Lord Brooke, Sir John Gell, and Sir William Breerton for the Parliament, by one of which the Earl of Northampton lost his life, and the Lord Brooke was slain before the Town of Litchfield, which was afterward taken by his Souldiers, and again retaken by Prince Rupert.

In Yorkshire and those more Northern parts the Lord Fairfax and his Son did take some Towns, and do more than could be expected from so little force, but after a while, the whole Country was subdued by the Kings Arms, and they were forced into Hull.

The greatest part of Wales was for the King; but to prevent the increase of his good fortune, the Earl of Stamford was sent with an Army into the West, where Sir Ralph Hopton, with some Forces of the Kings, lay before Plymouth then a Garrison for the Parliament, but upon the Earls advance, he drew from thence, and fought and defeated a great part of the Earls Forces; after this a Truce was made betwixt the Earl and Sir 1643. Ralph Hopton for twenty dayes, and in the mean time Sir George Chudleigh who had been very active and successful for the Parliament in Devonshire, began to reflect upon his past actions, and by considering the pretences of both parties, resolved with himself not to hazard his life and reputation, but upon what he thought a most just cause, and hereupon he quitted his side, and joyned with the Kings Forces; but to satisfie his friends with the Reason of his so doing, he publish'd a short declaration to this effect.

Sir George Chudleigh's Declaration, shewing the reason of his deserting the Parliament.

That Petitions of Right are commendable, and Remonstrances may be lawful, but Arms, though defensive, are very doubtful. My Lot (saith he) fell to be cast on the Parliaments side, by a strong opinion of the goodness of their Cause, which to my Judgement then appeared to be so; Religion and the Subjects Liberty seemed to me to be in danger, but the destruction of Kingdoms cannot be the way to save it, nor can the losse of Christian Subjects, nor the Subjects losse of their Estates by Plunder or Assessment concur with Piety, nor yet with propriety: as for Religion, which is the chief, his Majesty (whom God long preserve) hath given us unquestionable Security, I have cast my self at my Sovereigns feet, and implored his gracious pardon. I will contend no more in word or deed. And this my Resolution with the undisputable grounds thereof, I thought good to declare to my friends and Countrymen, that they may understand my change to proceed from no compulsion.

The Earl of Stamford overthrown at Stratton in Cornwall.

This addition of strength was very advantageous to the King; for shortly after in a Battel fought at Stratton in Cornwal, the Earl of Stamford was overthrown, and inforced to betake himself to the City of Exeter, whither Sir Ralph and Sir George Chudleigh with the Devonshire and Cornish Forces followed him, and with part of their Troops so straitened it, that they had opportunity to imploy the main body of their Army in other Service, which with the conjunction of the Marquess of Hartford who had raised many Regiments, the greatest part of the West was reduced to the Kings obedience. Bristol was designed to be seized on for the King about the beginning of May, by one Mr. Robert Yeomans, late Sheriff of the City, and William Yeomans his Brother, with Mr. George Bouchier, and Mr. Edward Dacres, and some others of their friends, who had Commission from the King to lift Forces, and possess themselves of the Town; and for the better enabling them thereunto, Prince Rupert hover'd thereabouts with a party of 5000 men, but the raising and lifting of Souldiers made the matter so communicative, that it was discovered to the Governor, who caused the four above-mentioned to be seized on, and tryed by a Court-Martial, who condemn'd them all, and Robert Yeomans and Bouchier were on the 30th of May executed; and the like fate hapned to some worthy Gentlemen and other Eminent Citizens of London, who intended to have contrived a mean to have put a period to the present War, by stopping the issues of it in the Fountain, by securing the City of London, and seizing several Members of Parliament. It was detected by one Roe a Servant to Mr. Tomkins, on the last day of May; The chief Yeomans and Bouchier executed at Bristol, for endeavouring to seize the Town for the King. The like happened to several Gentlemen and Citizens of London, for a Design said to seize it.

Actors were, Mr. Edmond Waller a Member of the House of Commons, Mr. Tomkins, Mr. Chaloner, Mr. Hasell, Mr. White, and Mr. Blinkorne, who were to be strengthened in their endeavours by the Kings Commission of Array brought to London privately by the Lady Aubigny; but upon this detection, all was blasted, and the persons before named, were all tried by a Court-Martial at Guild-Hall, and condemned, whereof Mr. Tomkins and Mr. Chaloner were on the 5th of July executed; Mr. Waller after a years Imprisonment in the Tower, paid a fine of ten thousand pounds, and was for ten years banished into France.

Sir William Waller about the time of Edge-Hill Fight, had received a Commission to be Colonel of a Regiment of Horse, and had gained a great Reputation with the Parliament & the City of London, for some service he did that Winter with Colonel Urrey, Colonel Brown, and some others in the taking of Chichester, and hindring Levies for the King in Sussex, so that he was furnished with an Army this Spring, with which he did many acceptable Services to his party in Wiltshire, Glocester-shire, Monmouth and Hereford-shire, wherein he took many Towns possessed by the Kings Souldiers, and was very successful; but whilest he was active in those parts the Parliament pressed the Earl of Essex to march towards Oxford to straiten that Garrison, and take some order by the conjunction of the Forces of the associates, to hinder Prince Ruperts joyning with the Queen; In prosecution whereof, he march'd with his Army to those parts of Buckingham-shire which were nearest to Oxford, and settled his head quarters at Thame; upon his coming thither, the weather was very unseasonable and great rains fell, so that his Souldiers became very weak and sickly, and much mortality ensued, but to put a good face upon his condition, he frequently sent out parties upon several occasions, though little or no service was at any time performed by them, but about the sixteenth of June, intelligence came to Oxford, that a great party of Parliamenteers was then quartered at Postcombe and Chimer in Oxford-shire towards Thame, and Prince Rupert drew out a good party to attack them in their quarters, which he did, and took many prisoners, but upon the Alarm, Colonel Hambden, with Sheffield and others of Essex his Army, drew into Chalgrove-Field, with design to fight the Prince, where he drew towards them, and after a brisk charge or two, he routed them, and took many Prisoners, and Horses and Arms, and kill'd many, Major Gunter was shot dead upon the place, and Colonel Sheffield, and Mr. Hambden were both very much wounded, of which the last died three or four dayes after, it being observed, That he received his wounds in that field where he first executed the Parliaments Commission for the Militia, against the Kings Authority; upon this affront Essex draws his Army off to Bristol, with a purpose to recruit his Regiments with some Forces from the neighbouring Counties, but they were too much busied to spare any assistance. About this time (or a little before) the Parliament resolved upon a very extraordinary action, which was the making of a new great Seal, it had some opposition in the debate, but by a Majority of Voices in both Houses it was voted to be done; yet to put some colour on the enterprize, they passed an Order, That if the Lord Leeper Littleton upon summons did not return with the Great Seal within fourteen days, he should lose his place, and whatever should be sealed therewith by him after that time, should be null and void in Law. But this menacing Vote did not bring the Great Seal from Oxford; so that their new Great Seal was made, and some few months after the use of it authorized by Ordinance of both Houses.

The Parliamentarians beaten at Dunnington in Lincolnshire by Col. Cavendish.

The Queen was now marching with six or seven thousand Horse and Foot, towards the King, but in the way she was so careful of Lincolnshire and Nottinghamshire, that she left twenty Troops of Horse and two thousand Foot with Arms for five hundred more, under the Command of Colonel Charles Cavendish, who did eminent service before and after in those Counties. About the 13th of June she came to Newark, and was there welcomed with a Victory obtained three days before over some of the Parliaments Forces, by the same Colonel Cavendish at Dunnington in Lincolnshire: after some stay at Newark, her Army marched to Burton upon Trent, which was taken by the Lord Ferme Commander in Chief of her Army, and from thence she went by easie marches to Stratford upon Avon, where Prince Rupert came to her with many Troops from Oxford; she had with her when he met her three thousand good Foot, and thirty Troops of Horse and Dragoons, with six pieces of Ordnance, two Mortar-pieces, and a hundred and fifty Waggon, which with those of the Prince made up a better Army than Essex could make to oppose them; for his men were wasted by sickness to a very considerable number, and he drew them to Kingston and other places near London, to lie there till he could recruit. In the mean time the rent bewixt the King and Parliament became wider than ever, for now they proceeded to that height to draw up Articles of High Treason against the Queen; some of them were:

Articles of High Treason against the Queen.

1. That she had pawned the Crown Jewels in Holland.
2. That she had favoured the Rebellion in Ireland.
3. That she had endeavoured to raise a party in Scotland against the Parliament; and that she had gone in the Head of a Popish Army in England, for so they termed the Forces with her (though few or none of that Religion were amongst them) Divers other Articles were framed against her; upon which Mr. Pym carried up an Impeachment to the Lords: they were (or seemed to be) at first surprized at so extraordinary a matter, but after some time they agreed to the Charge.

The successes of Sir William Waller gave so great a reputation to his Army, that the King sent for his Western Forces towards Oxford, to hinder the progress of his fortune; for it was feared at Oxford, if he had not some check he might make himself master of Ludlow and Worcester, and so bring a great tract of Land and many considerable Garrisons into the power of the Parliament: Sir Ralph Hopton in pursuance of his Orders was 1643. marched into Somersetshire, and Prince Maurice with the Earl of Carnarvan and a good strength of Horse, were sent from Oxford to joyn with him. Sir William Waller was come to Bath with his Army, with whom Sir Edward Hungerford, Sir John Horner, and Mr. Strode were joyned, and they marched towards Sir Ralph Hopton; and came so near him, that on the third and fourth of July some skirmishes had passed betwixt some parties of each side, and prisoners were taken of both parties, but on Wednesday the 5th of July the two Armies engaged, at a place called Langdown, about eight miles from Bristol, and the fight was maintained betwixt them from two in the afternoon till one the next morning, at which time the Parliamentarians left the field, and the Kings party had gained a great Victory, if by accident their Ammunition had not blown up, whereby two Captains were slain, & above twenty wounded, whereof Sir Ralph Hopton himself was one, & in the battel Sir Bevil Greenville a person of great renown & integrity to the Kings Cause was slain, together with M. Leak a hopeful young Gentleman, Son to the Earl of Scarsdale, who was found dead in the field with the Colours of the Enemy about his arm, as also one Lieutenant Colonel, one Major, and 2 Captains; what Officers fell on the Parliaments side was not known, because the publishers of such actions were unwilling to be very particular in their relations, that they might not too much discourage their party.

Langdown Fight.

Waller being advertised of what had happened, having got some fresh men from Bristol marched after Hopton, hoping to ingage him before he could get Ammunition to defend himself, so that he was forced to retire to the Devizes a Town in Wiltshire, and there he was by Waller blockt up, and after a while he became so distressed, that he began to treat about the surrender of it, (for Prince Maurice was with the Horse retired towards Oxford) but immediately the fortune of War changed, for the King having notice of Hopton's condition, sent Commissary Wilmot with the Earl of Carnarvan and Crawfords Regiment of Horse and others to the number of fifteen hundred to relieve him; upon whose approach near to Sir William Waller, he drew off to a place called Roundway-down, where the Horse began the fight, but after a while both Horse and foot encountered each other, and Waller's Army was totally vanquished; and four brass Guns, and all the Ammunition and Baggage were taken, with nine Cornets of Horse, and eight and twenty Colours of Foot; Sir Arthur Haslerigg was wounded; and many other Officers, and a great number of Souldiers killed; and this Victory was obtained on the 13th of July, on the same day whereon the King and the Queen met at the foot of Edgekil, where the first Battel betwixt him and the Earl of Essex had been fought, as was before mentioned; their meeting after so long absence and on so sad an occasion was very joyful to each other; they went that night to Sir Thomas Popes house at Wroxon, where they lay all night, and the next morning they came with the Prince, the Duke of Tork, and their Army with the Carriages and Ammunition to Woodstock, and from thence to Oxford, where her coming was rather to a Triumph than a War.

The King being willing to profit himself of this good success to his Forces, ordered Prince Rupert to joyn himself with his Brother and the whole body of his strength in those parts, and to march immediately to Bristol. Before which place he came on the four and twentieth of July, and summoned it to be surrendered to him: Col. Nathanael Fines Son to the Lord Say and Seal was then Governour of the City, who made a shew of great resistance, but yet after three days it was surrendered upon the ensuing Articles:

Bristol delivered up to Prince Rupert.

1. That none of the Citizens should be molested in their persons or goods.
2. That every Officer should march forth with his Arms.
3. That every Trooper should ride out with his Horse and his Sword.
4. That every Souldier should march away with his Sword, Bag, and Baggage.
5. That a safe Convoy should be allowed for twenty miles.

A few dayes after the taking of this City, the King marched thither to see it and settle the Affairs of those parts, where presently after his arrival he received news of the surrender of Dorchester to the Earl of Carnarvon, and a day or two after Portland, Weymouth, and Melcombe submitted to his Forces, so that about this time the King was possessed of all the Western Counties, from the farthest part of Cornwall except some few Garrisons that were blocked up; and now or a little time after the Lord Fairfax and all his Forces were defeated at Adderton Moor, and he and they driven into Hull by the Earl of Newcastle: and from thence Northward even to the borders of Scotland, there was no Army in the field to hinder the King and his Forces from marching whither they pleased: London was then altogether unsatisfied, & many in it favoured the Kings cause, and most of the chief Gentry of the associated Counties were ready upon any appearance for the King to have secured those Counties to him, wherefore it was expected that in this conjuncture of affairs the King would have marched with his Army to London, and the Earl of Newcastle with his into the associated Counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, whereby a sudden end would undoubtedly have been put to this Civil War, which was not only the opinion of those in the Kings Quarters, but many at London and in the Parliament were of the same mind, and some of them deserted the Party and submitted to the King, and others were on the point of quitting the Kingdom. But in the midst of these hopes, the King against his own judgement was at a Council of War over-ruled to go to besiege Gloucester; and a few days after the Earl of Newcastle fate down before Hull; To this fatal City of Gloucester the King in person with his Army marched in the beginning of August, and about the 10th. he fate down before it, and by two Heralds summoned the City to be surrendered to him; to which summons within 2 hours an answer was drawn and consented unto both by the Citizens and Souldiers, which was presented to the King by Major

Pudsey and one Toby Jordan a Citizen of the place, in these words;

We the Inhabitants, Magistrates, Officers, and Souldiers within this Garrison of Gloucester, unto his Majesties gracious Message return this humble answer, That we do keep this City according to Our Oaths and Allegiance to and for the use of his Majesty and his Royal posterity. And do accordingly conceive our selves wholly bound to obey the Commands of his Majesty signified by both Houses of Parliament, and are resolved by Gods help to keep this City accordingly.

The King received this Answer without any expression of choler or indignation, seeming only to wonder at their confidence, for in all appearance they could have no hope of relief, the whole number of Souldiers, Horse, Foot, and Dragoons, together with the Train-Bands, and those Horse and Dragoons, which they on a sudden got from Berkely Castle, amounted to few more than fifteen hundred, forty barrels of powder was all their store, with a very mean and slender Artillery for such a service, & the works were of a great compass and little more than half perfected: so that it was generally believed, the King would rather presently have attempted the Town by a storm, whilst they were yet in some consternation, than wasted his time and Souldiers by a Siege: but by all the intelligence he could get, the Parliament was in no condition to send any Forces to disturb him, and his Council of War thought it better to save his Infantry by a little expence of time, than by exposing the hazard of so many of their lives in an assault. So that a close Siege was made on all sides, though the first had been the wiser Counsel.

The Parliament were very much troubled at the news of this Siege, and used all the endeavours possibly to recruit Essex his broken Army for the relief of it; the first thing they did was to cause 2000 men to be pressed to strengthen some weak Companies, and upon a conference with the Committee of the Militia of the City of London, by consent of the Lord Major and Aldermen, they procured from thence two Regiments of the Train-Bands, three Regiments of Auxiliaries and a Regiment of Horse; nor were they less mindful of the North, for the Army from Scotland which they had invited to their assistance could not be ready soon enough to secure these parts, wherefore they passed an Ordinance for the speedy pressing of 2000 men to be raised out of the six Associate Counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Cambridge, Hartford, and Huntingdon, to be put under the Command of the Earl of Manchester. In preparation whereunto Colonel Oliver Cromwel was very active, he had the year before the Command of a Troop of Horse, with which he secured the Town of Cambridge, and obstructed many Levies for the King in Cambridgeshire, Essex, Suffolk, and Norfolk; but sometime before this he had a Commission to be a Colonel, and by authority thereof he raised a Regiment of Horse consisting of a thousand, with which he was employed in several of the Northwest parts of England, where he joyned as occasion 1643. occasion offered with Sir William Brereton, Sir John Gell, the Lord Grey of Groby, and others, and did very considerable service to his party; his great Design was by this new Army to attempt to change the whole Discipline of the Parliaments Militia, for having observed that the Kings Horse, who were his greatest strength consisted of Gentlemen, or the servants of such, and that these led on by a sense of Honour, did in most encounters worst their enemies, he believed if the Parliament Horse could be framed of the most zealous of their party, such as were persuaded by the Preaching of the Ministers that the Cause was Gods Cause, and that all their religious Liberties were at stake in it, and those that died therein died in the favour of God, and in assurance of Salvation, they might set this sense of Conscience against the other sense of Honour, and be in better hopes of success than before; and this method he put in practice as far as he could in the new raised Forces before-mentioned, whereof most of the Officers were very great zealots, and the Souldiers by degrees became of the same leven, and those were they that effected afterwards what he hoped for from them.

On the 24th of August the Earl of Essex drew all his Army together to Hounslow, where almost all the Members of both Houses of Parliament were present, the remainder of his old Army was well recruited, and he had got some additional Regiments of Horse, besides the Horse and Foot he had from the City, which made a gallant appearance. That night he marched to Colbrook, where he staid a day for some more men that were to come to him, and then he marched to Beckonsfield, and so forward to Beerton, where he cloathed his Army, and marched on.

The King thought it scarce credible that an Army could have been so soon got together; but since it was so, he sent out parties to obstruct their march, but they marched so close, and in so good order, that little obstruction could be given to his progress; so that by the fifth of September he came to Presbury Hills, where he drew up his whole Army in view of the City, and discharged four pieces of great Ordnance to give them notice of his approach, which was at a time when the Kings Forces were prepared ready for a storm, the besieged in want, and their Ammunition consumed to three Barrels of Powder: but upon consultation had by the King with the General Officers, it was resolv'd the Army should draw off, which was done, and all their Huts were set on fire. Essex marched thence to Cheltenham, and stayed there two dayes, and from thence on the eighth of September he went with his whole Army to Gloucester, where he staid two nights till he had furnished the City with Ammunition, Money, and other necessaries, and from thence marched to Tewksbury, staying betwixt the Kings Forces and that Garrison four days, to give them more time the better to furnish themselves with Victuals: whilst he stayed there he had advice, that a body of the Kings Army were then in Cirencester Castle, and there had laid in great stores of Provision; upon which advertisement, want of Victuals and necessaries increasing upon his whole Army, he made a long march with the Van-guard of his Troops to fall upon them, which he did about one of the Clock in the morning, sending in a party of Horse to seize upon the Centinels and Guards, whilst himself with the rest of the Horse begirt the Town, and a Forlorn-hope of Foot with his own Foot Regiment entred into it, and surpris'd two Regiments of Horse (belonging to Sir Nicholas Crispe and Colonel Spencer) here he found thirty load of Provision, which proved a great relief to his Army, then in extream distress for want thereof. Having proved successful in this encounter, he by short marches passed from thence to Cricklade, so to Swinden, intending to pass through Hungerford, but passing over Oburn Chace, Prince Rupert with the greatest part of the Kings Horse charged the whole Army by two commanded parties, one under the Lord Fermyn, and the other under Colonel Urry, who performed their duties so well, that many great Bodies of Essex his Horse and Foot were disordered, with little loss to the Kings Souldiers or Officers, save only to the Marquess de la Vieuville, a young French Nobleman, who was a very brave and Generous Cavalier, and unfortunately slain.

Essex from thence marched to Hungerford, and the Prince sent an Express to the King then at Wantage, desiring him to advance with all haste to Newberry, the better to hinder Essex's march to London, which was the thing he chiefly endeavoured. The King was glad of the advice, and in pursuance of it he marched away to Newberry, where he got before Essex; the next day the Parliament Army marched from Hungerford toward Newberry, but hearing the Kings Forces had possess'd the Town, they lay that night in the field, but the next morning by break of day Essex gave orders to march to a hill, called Biggs-hill near Newberry, which with some struggle he gained, but the Forlorn of the Kings Army by endeavouring to hinder him of so advantageous a place, did there begin the fight, which was very vigorously prosecuted on both sides till night came on, that both parties drew off. The next day Essex found his way open towards Reading, so that although the loss was equal to both Armies (saving that as the Quality of the Commanders were greater on the Kings side, more eminent Persons of that party were slain) yet the Victory was allowed to the Parliament Army, because they gained thereby their way to London, from which the King strove to hinder them. The number of the slain in this Battel is not recorded, Captain Massey, Captain Hunt, and divers other Officers of Essex his Army were killed, but not many of higher rank than Captains; three of the Nobility fell on the Kings side, the Earl of Carnarvon, the Earl of Sunderland, and the Lord Faulkland. After this Fight the King marched to Oxford, and the Earl of Essex drew his Army to Reading, and from thence to the Towns and Villages near London: but the King on the third of October finding Reading free, placed a good Garrison in it.

The Gentlemen of Norfolk hearing the great success of the Marquess of Newcastle in Yorkshire, did expect his march into that and the rest of the associated Counties, and in confidence thereof, they seiz'd on Lyn, and put a Garrison into

A Cessation of Arms agreed upon in Ireland.

Divers places in the West surrendred to the King.

The King being moved with compassion of the sad condition of his Protestant Subjects in Ireland, for want of relief and supply of money, Munition, Arms, Provisions, Cloaths, and all other necessaries: for the Parliament, who had undertaken the managery of that War, and raised great sums of Money for that end, employed the greatest part of it in the War in England against the King, so that many of the English Souldiers, unable to endure the insupportable necessity that lay upon them, did many times seize on Ships, and force the Mariners to transport them to England, which being represented to the King, He in July this year, sent a Commission to the Marquess of Ormond then Lieutenant General of the English Army, to treat with the Irish for a Cessation of Arms for one year, which after some time, upon the 15th of September was agreed to by both parties, and whilst this Cessation was making in Ireland, the King's Armies in the Western parts of England were very prosperous; insomuch, that about the same time, or a little before, Biddiford, Appleford, Barnstable and Exeter, were surrendred to the King by the Victorious Arms of Prince Maurice, who from Exeter marched to Dartmouth, which place was on the sixth of October surrendred likewise to him, so that though the King was unfortunately prevail'd with to lose the opportunity of ending the War, by besieging

Gloucester and Hull, yet was his condition at this time much better than the year before; for where as a twelve month past, he had in all the West but the County of Cornwall, and in Yorkshire no more than that City and Pomfret Castle, and except at Redding, Wallingford, and Abbingdon, not a Souldier quartered out of Oxford, not a Ship nor Port except Newcastle and Falmouth, and as the Parliament themselves published, not ten thousand men in Arms, he had now five Armies in being, and was possessed of all the Western Counties and Garrisons therein, except Plymouth, Lyn and Poole, and of all Yorkshire, Hull only excepted, and in Cheshire none but Namptwich stood out against him, and Wales was wholly His; and though the Parliament got from him Strafford, Warrington, Lyn, Lincoln, and some other considerable Garrisons, the King in lieu of those gained from them, Saltash, Cirencester, Birmingham, Leige, Lichfeild, Bradford, Hallifax, Wakefield, Dainton, Bristol, Bath, Dorchester, Weymouth, Biddiford, Barnstable, Appleford, Tenby, Haverford-west, Pembroke and Exeter, and as to Gloucester, great care was taken to hinder excursions from that Garrison; Sir William Vavasor was sent with a strong party of Horse to engarrison Hereford, with Commission to raise Forces, and to command in Chief in that County and Gloucestershire; Sudeley Castle was garrisoned by the Lord Chandos for the King, which stop'd Gloucester's intercourse with Warwick, the only way of Commerce with London; Berkley Castle was for the King maintained by a Scottish Captain. Sir John Winter was strongly scited in the Forrest of Deane, a Garrison was likewise put into Beverston Castle, and indeed Garrisons there were in every corner of the County, beside several parties of the King's Army which lay abroad in the Fields about it; so that Gloucester was almost as much distressed as if it had been besieged, they being inforced to fight or skirmish for whatever they got. In the mean time, an additional supply of one thousand Foot, and one hundred Horse, under the command of Sir William St. Leger and Colonel Min, landed out of Ireland to the King's aid, and were with eight pieces of Ordnance ordered to advance to Thornbury, the more to distress the City of Gloucester.

The French King sends an Ambassador to mediate between the King and the Parliament.

The French King and the Queen Regent of France, seem'd very sensible of the King's condition, and sent the Count de Harcourt (a Prince of the House of Lorraine, and a great Souldier,) heir Ambassador into England, to offer the mediation of France to compose the differences betwixt the King and the Parliament; He came first to London, and address'd himself to both Houses for a safe conduct to Oxford to the King, which they granted, and on the 18th of October he made his entry into that City, and three daies after, he had publick audience in the great Hall at Christ Church, where the King and Queen received him with great State and Magnificence; and whilst he staid at Oxford, he and his retinue were lodg'd in St. John's Colledge, but finding himself unable to effect any thing of his Embassy, after a few Months stay, he returned. Sir William Waller who had laid long in London to form an Army, had at last got together six thousand Horse and Foot, with which he was about this

ment.

The Scots promised to the Parliament (from whom Commissioners were sent to Edinburgh about that business.) that they would bring into England to their assistance, an Army consisting of one and twenty thousand Horse and Foot, towards the charge of raising whereof, the Parliament sent 100000^l. into Scotland, and great Levies of men were made for this Army, which was now near drawn together, but some at Oxford had so good an opinion of the Scots, that they would hardly be brought to believe they would invade England, till they saw them in the bowels of the Nation; for General Lesley with great imprecations upon himself, as hath been before exprest in this History, protested never to draw his sword against the King, but the ruling party in Scotland to facilitate the raising of this Army, had raised a report that the King was deserted by most of his Nobility.

The King reposing great trust in the Duke of Hamilton, had written to him to use all his power and interest to keep his Country-men at home, which had not been difficult for one of his credit in that Nation; but he by some secret Arts did more inflame them, and to cover his deceit, pretended to fly from Scotland to Oxford, where he came about the last of December, pretending to seek a shelter there for his Loyalty, but the King had so good information of his practices in Scotland, that as soon as he came thither, he and the Earl of Lanerick his Brother, were both forbidden the Court, whereupon Lanerick got privately out of Oxford, and went to London, where he was well received, which increased the King's ill opinion of his Brother, and he was sent prisoner to Pendennis Castle.

Hamilton

Castle.

The King had on the 22^d of December summoned the Members of both Houses, who had deserted those at Westminster to assemble at Oxford on the 22^d of January following, where accordingly they met in the great Hall at Christ's Church, and after the King had made a short Speech to them, he dismissed them to their Seats. The Lords sat in the upper Schools, and the Commons in the Convocation House, and for their better welcome, he advanced Prince Rupert to the Titles of Duke of Cumberland, and Earl of Holderness, and created James his second Son, Duke of Tork, by which name he had been appointed to be called at the time of his Birth, that they might sit and vote amongst them. After they had sat awhile, by a letter they mov'd the Earl of Essex to endeavour Peace, and did also declare against the Invasion of the Scots by another letter sent to them, in which they acquainted them with the falseness of their reports concerning the King, and shewed how inconsiderable a number of Lords were with those that invited them in; the King himself writ also to them to put them in mind of their several engagements to be quiet, but before those Letters could come to Scotland, and indeed some daies before the Parliament had assembled at Oxford, the Scots Army was marched into England, but when the Letters came to the ruling party at Edinburgh, with a strange unheard of insolency, they commanded them to be burnt by the hands of the Hangman, but the dishonour of that Nation was in a great measure repaired by the gallantry and faithfulness of the Marquess of Montrose, who about the time of this their Invasion, was made General Governour of Scotland, and with an incredible Industry by small numbers of Men won many Battels, and overthrew well formed Armies, whereof some relation shall be made hereafter, and had he not been betrayed by those he trusted, he had forc'd that people to Justice and quietness. Upon the entry of the Scotch Army into England, a Letter was writ from Berwick in the name of the Committee of both Kingdoms, subscribed by the Marquess of Argile and Sir William Armine, to Sir Thomas Glemham, who then lay at Anwick with 16 Troops of Horse, two Regiments of Foot, eight Drakes, and twenty pieces of Ordnance, which was to be communicated to the Gentlemen of Northumberland, wherein it was signified, That they came into England to prosecute the ends of the Covenant, namely, the Preservation and Reformation of Religion, the true Honour and Happiness of the King, and the publick Peace and Liberty of his Dominions, hoping that things of so great and considerable consequence would find with him and them such entertainment as might answer the weight and importance of them: Adding, That if misinformation, or any other unhappy grounds should so far prevail with him and the rest, as to reckon them in the number of their Enemies; and if instead of that concurrence with them which they wis'd and hoped to deserve, they found opposition and acts of Hostility, the Law of Nature and their own reason, might tell them what they were to expect. Sir Thomas returned an answer to this Letter, to this purpose.

petter of his own, and by this means he gained time to draw his forces and Artillery to Newcastle, for Anwick was not tenible, and many of the Gentlemen of Northumberland, especially such as were allied to my Lord Grey of Wark, either for fear of the Scots, or affection to their cause, were very backward in their opposition to them, but Newcastle, Tinmouth Shields, and such other places as were Garrisoned by the King's forces, did so obstruct their march, that they passed not Tyne till the second of March, and when they did, the Marquess of Newcastle and General King marched so near them, that they could not advance Southward, but got into Sunderland, where they lay, till the Lord Fairfax and the rest of the Parliament forces made a diversion able enough to give them opportunity to descend into Yorkshire, as hereafter will be shewn.

The Scotch Army descended as far as Torval.

Sir John Meldrum, the Lord Fairfax, Sir Tho. Fairfax, Sir Will. Constable, and Col. Lambert, had out of Lincolnshire and the associated Counties got many men together, and made such impressions upon the Marquess of Newcastle's Quarters, that they became very well able to keep a Body together in Yorkshire, and Sir John Meldrum marched into Nottinghamshire, where he joined with some Troops of the Earl of Manchester, and the Lord Willoughby of Parham to the number of 8000 horse and foot, with which they besieged Newark.

Newark besieged by Meldrum.

The King was much concerned at the news of this Siege, and was resolved at any hazard to relieve the Town, in order whereunto the King sent an Express to Prince Rupert, which came to him on the 12th of March to Chester, wherein he commanded him to draw what forces he could together to raise the Siege of Newark; upon this advice he made hast to Shrewsbury, speeding away Major Legg (General of the Ordnance) before to chuse out so many commanded Musqueteers of the English (of late come out of Ireland) as might be well spared out of that Garrison. These were a thousand Musqueteers of Colonel Broughton's and Colonel Tillier's Regiments, with a hundred and twenty of Colonel Sir Fulk Huns. All these sent down by the Severn, met the Prince at Bridgenorth on Friday. Of horse he took along his own Troop, and Regiment, with twenty of Major General Urrey's; with these Forces he drew along three field pieces. At Wolverhampton next day was his Army recruited by a hundred horse, and 200 foot of Colonel Leveson's. On Munday night he had notice at Ashby de la Zouch, of two thousand two hundred enemies under Sir Edward Hartop, sent out by Meldrum to the pass and Bridge over the Sore, a mile from Loughborough in Leicestershire. Their purpose was either to intercept General Major Porter, or to prevent his joining with my Lord Loughborough: for thither with four Regiments of Horse, and a thousand commanded Musqueteers of my Lord of Newcastle's men, was Porter now come from about Newark, to hinder the farther inroads into Leicestershire. Daily slight Skirmishes here passed. For Meldrum not able to force the passage, and hearing of my Lord of Loughborough's drawing out, stole away. Porter thus disengaged, was the next day together with my Lord Loughborough's Forces conjoined to the Princes. That night they all quartered in a Close by Bingham, eight miles short of Newark,

An express sent by the King to Prince Rupert to raise the Siege.

About two of the Clock, the Moon then well up, the Drums bear, and all marched. Hiderio had the marches been so speedy, as fame it self was prevented; for by Meldrum's own Letter sent to the Lord Fairfax, which was intercepted the night before; they had no more but an uncredited Rumour of Prince Rupert's coming. On this daies march the Prince had notice by his espials, how the enemies were busied all that morning in sending away their Cannons; which proved no other, than their drawing them off their Batteries into their Chief work at the Spittle, or Exter-House, a little more than Musket-shot from the Town; for into that one Quarter had they this morning drawn all their Regiments and Ammunition. The Prince having intelligence of their amassing themselves thus into one body, which he supposed a preparation to march off suddenly; advanced his Van of Horse upon the spur to overtake them: the rest of his Horse had order to keep along with the Foot, Cannon and Ammunition. Coming near the Bacon-hill, a mile short of Newark, he perceived some Horse of the Enemies; who upon his approach, drew down the other side to their own Grose. The Prince thus easily gaining the hill, was earnest to pursue his good fortune, upon his apprehension of having many advantages upon a retreating Enemy: whereupon he gave order to charge them with all the Horse then with him, to engage them till the Reer and Foot should be marched up to him. Trooping thus to the Edge of the Hill, he perceived the most of the enemy in Battalia, (Horse and Foot) near the Spittle: all except four great Bodies of Horse, who expected him at the very descent of the Hill. The Prince thus ordered his own few Forces; first himself with his own Troop of Life-Guards undertook to attack that Body on the left hand, appointing my Lord Loughborough's Troop to second him, and Colonel Charles Gerard's Troop to be as a Reserve a little on my Lords right hand. The Princes Regiment was cast out into five Divisions, two Troops to each Division: in the first and very right-hand of all, were Captain Gardiner, and Captain Richardson; then Captain Cobb, and Captain Martin; then the Lord Grandison and Sir Thomas Dallison; next them the Troops of Sir Lewis Dives, and the Lord Dillon; Major Legg's and Lieutenant Colonel O Neal's Troops being next unto the Life-Guards; this Regiment was seconded by Major General Porter's Regiment: the Field-word, was, King and Queen; theirs Religion. The fight began about nine a Clock, and after a while it grew fierce, especially on the Princes his right wing, the other doubling their Files from three to six deep, and charged two utmost Troops upon the Flanks so hard, that Capt. Martin came timely in to help to beat them off; the Prince himself having pierced deep into the Enemies, and being observed and known, was dangerously at once assaulted by three sturdy Persons, whereof one fell by his own sword; a second being pistoll'd by Master Mortaign one of his own Gentlemen; the third now ready to lay hand on the Princes Collar, had it almost chopt off by Sir Will. Neale; he thus disengaged with a shot only in his Gauntlet, with Sir Richard Crane and his own Troop, charged quite thorow the Body, pursuing them in a Rout home to their

The fight at Newark.

1643. Works at the Spittle, presently after this, his Regiment with their seconds likewise routed the three other bodies, four of the Troops charging even into the Work, and bringing away a Captain prisoner; Loughborow also deported himself honourably, some of his shruak at the second Charge, but he himself rode back to rally and bring them up again: Colonel Gerard was shot in the arm in this encounter, and being by the fall of his Horse much bruised, was taken prisoner.

After a little pause both sides began to make ready for a second Charge; the Prince to make impression, and they to receive it: and though for a good while they disputed it roughly, yet by fine force were they and all the rest driven quite out of the field beyond their own work, Foot and Cannon at the Spittle; divers of them hastening by a Bridge of Boats over that branch of the Trent into the Island: four other Troops, with as many foot Companies, hastened up to Muskam-bridge upon the other side of the Island, and main stream of the River, about three quarters of a mile both from Newark and the Spittle: here they stayed till towards evening; when breaking the Bridge behind them, and throwing one piece of Cannon into the Trent, they hastened to Nottingham. In both these stiff bouts, the Prince took five Cornets, and ninety Prisoners, whereof three Captains, some Gentlemen, three Cornets, besides other Officers, and two Cannoniers. And now as if an universal Truce had been agreed upon, there was some half an hours silence, excepting that the enemies Cannon disturbed it. As for the Prince he now staid for his Foot and the Reer of his Horse, both left full two miles behind, when his Van began to double their march to overtake the enemy; anon came up his Foot, all that day commanded by Col. Tillier: these resting themselves a while upon the hill, the first division being part of those that came from Shrewsbury, were led on by the Colonel, these marched down in the face of the enemy, hooting at their Cannon, and flanked with some Horse, they were wheeled to the right into a Meadow; at their coming, the enemy drew all their Horse and Foot within their Spittle-work, and coming up against this place, both sides saluted one another at too far a distance with a short volley; but Col. Tillier was not to stay here, as being by his Orders to march up to the very Rivers side, to recover the Boat-bridge from the enemy; but this being too well guarded, he was glad to go off, making a stand without reach of Cannon. In this time were divers more bodies brought down into the field, who charged up to the enemies work, and killed many: Loughborow's men being left upon the Hill for a reserve. Thus was the valley bespread with the Princes Battalions: and in this posture stood the Army. Sir Richard Byron Governour of Newark likewise before this, had sent part of his Garrison both (Horse and Foot) into another ground on the South-East side of the Town. And by this time had the Prince notice given him by a Prisoner, and by one of theirs that came over to him, how they were so distressed for want of Victuals; that they were not able to live there two daies. Whereupon he began to resolve upon other

And blockt up they were already in a very narrow room, no more being free than the backside of the Spittle towards the River. Besides which they were on all sides surrounded by his forces. On the South-side by the Town; on the East by the Prince; and on the North by Colonel Tillier. Into the Island on the West, had the Prince sent five hundred Horse, besides 200 of the Newark Troopers. Thus the late blockers found themselves now besieged, and without much hope of sudden relief or safe means for sally: for so well had the Prince ordered them, that had they sallied forwards, he had then fallen on upon their first issuing out, both in front, and flanks with his Army, and the Town had charged them upon their Reer. Had they offered to escape over their Boat bridge, those in the Isle had disturbed their passing, and others entertained their coming over. By this time had the Prince commanded Sir Richard Byron with his own, and Sir Gervase Eyres Horse Regiment with 800 of Sir John Digbys foot, to advance so high into the Island, as to put in betwixt the enemies two Bridges. By which interposition was all intercourse cut off, betwixt their greater Body at the Spittle, and those at Muskam-Bridge: upon this those eight Colours at the Bridge retreated, as aforesaid. Under favour of these Town-forces too, was the Prince resolved to cast up a Redoubt that night betwixt the Bridges, but going to view the Ground, the enemy sent out a Trumpet to desire a Parley. To make way for this, and the more to sweeten and oblige the Prince, had Sir John Meldrum some hours before sent home Colonel Gerard, yet upon the Parole of a Souldier and a Gentleman, to return himself a Prisoner when ever he should be called. They having sent out to Parley quit their Bridge, which the Prince presently possessed by 100 Musqueteers. For the Parley on the Prince his part was appointed Sir Richard Crane, Captain of his Life-Guards, with Sir William Neale, Scout-Master-General, the other sending Sir Miles Hobard, and Sir John Palgrave two Colonels of Norfolk, on their part. The Prince his Horse were so over-marcht, and the Foot so beaten off their Legs by long marches, that he found his men not very able to engage a new, and the enemy were more than was believed; so that he was willing to give them good conditions, and the rather, for that (as by intercepted Letters it appeared) the Lord Fairfax and his Son Sir Thomas, being commanded by the Council of State to march, other places might ere long have need of his presence, so that (at length) he condescended to these Articles.

The Parliamentarians quit their Garrisons in Lincolnshire.

1644. The Marquis of Newcastle receives a loss at Hilton.

Arundel Castle taken by Sir William Waller.

Waller defeats the Lord Hopton at Brandon Heath.

Winchester yielded to Sir William Waller.

Upon this Victory of the Prince, the Garrisons of Gainsbrow, Lincolne and Sleaford, were quitted by the Parliamentarians, and Sterne Castle in Staffordshire was surrendered to Sir Gilbert Gerard for the King; but four daies after the action at Newark, The King's Forces under the Marquess of Newcastle received a considerable loss at a place called Hilton, where for two or three daies several skirmishes were made betwixt the English and Scotch Armies, and on the 25th of March they came to a pretty close engagement, wherein the English Foot were much disordered and one Brigade of the Horse routed, and about two hundred Horse and men were taken, but not without great loss to the Scots, though their numbers were increased with 3000 English Seamen and others which came to them in Sunderland from Hull, and upon this disorder the Marquess enlarged his quarters Southward, but the Scots did not yet advance much farther.

Sir William Waller having taken Arundel Castle in Sussex, and procured a Commission from the Parliament less dependent on Essex than that he had before, marches into Hampshire against the Lord Hopton, who was then very fortunate there, having taken Warder Castle, and many other places. At Brandon Heath near Alesford, both parties met on the 30th of March, and there was a very hot dispute betwixt them, but Waller having the advantage of the ground, and a covert of Trees and Hedges to shelter his foot, did thereby great execution on the King's Party, who pressing too eagerly to gain a Victory, lost it; yet it was not an intire Conquest, for my Lord Hopton retreated to Winchester with all his Cannon, except two heavy pieces which were plunged, and could not easily be drawn off; but Sir John Smith and Col. Butler, and some other Officers, of less note, of his Army, were slain, and 200 common Souldiers, and many others wounded, amongst which the Lord Steward Brother to the Duke of Richmond was one, who died three or four daies after at Abington, of his wounds: He was a young Noble-man of great courage and generosity in all his actions, and very debonaire and affable in his behaviour towards all; on the Parliament side many Officers and Souldiers were killed and wounded, and of the wounded, Colonel Thomson who lost his leg, and Colonel Dalbie, were the most remarkable; after this Fight, the Town of Winchester was yielded to Sir William Waller, but the Castle continued long after a Garrison for the King. The news of the affront lately given to the Marquess of Newcastle's Army by General Lesley, animated Fairfax, and the Forces in Yorkshire, to draw what Troops they could together to endeavour to join with the Scots, who were now upon their march, and in pursuance of this design, the Lord Fairfax marched out of Hull with twenty Troops of Horse, and joined with his Son Sir Thomas and Colonel Lambert, who made up about Sixty Troops more, besides a good body of Foot under Sir John Meldrum, making up in all to the number of seven thousand Horse and Foot, and with this little Army they made as if they intended to march to York, but on the 11th of April, when they came near Selby (where Colonel Bellasis lay with a good body of Men, as a reserve to the Marquess of Newcastle) they drew before the Town, and about eleven of the Clock they assaulted it in three places, and after two hours fight made themselves masters thereof, wherein they took Colonel Bellasis the Commander in Chief, Governour of York, with most of the rest of the Officers, and sixteen hundred common Souldiers, a Drake, and a Saker, seven barrels of Powder, sixteen bundles of Match, great store of Bullets, and two thousand Arms; immediately upon this success, the Marquess of Newcastle retreated to York, to re-inforce that Garrison, in case any attempt should be made upon it; and Fairfax marched to meet the Scots, and joined his Army with theirs at Wetherby, from whence they disposed them to quarters till a resolution should be taken for further action: In the mean time, the Queen being great with Child at Oxford and somewhat apprehensive of a siege there by the Earl of Essex and Sir William Waller, which was the common intelligence of that time, to prevent the inconveniences thereof, set out from Oxford on the 17th of April towards Exeter, where she safely arrived some time after; and two daies after her departure from Oxford, the Parliamentary convention at Oxford were by the King prorogued to the eighth of October, and that prorogation was afterward enlarged to the ninth of November by Proclamation. Prince Rupert was very active in Shropshire, Cheshire, Staffordshire, and Lancashire, to make an Army sufficient to relieve the Marquess of Newcastle, who was somewhat straitned in Yorkshire by the Parliament Forces, where he had done very good service in taking many Garrisons from the Enemy, as Longford House, and Tonge Castle in Shropshire, Stopford in Cheshire, and Bolton in Lancashire, besides the relief of Latham House, (which had been 18 weeks defended by the Countess of Derby against a close siege) and the defeat of many parties that encountered him or his Forces at several times, but we shall leave him for a while to speak of the King's condition at this time.

The Parliament having formed two Armies, whereof the Foot were far the most part made up of London Trained-Bands and Auxiliaries, one under the Earl of Essex, and the other under Sir William Waller; both Armies Rendezvouz'd on the 24th of May at Blewbury in Berkshire, and kept their head-quarters that night at Abington within five miles of Oxford, where they continued five or six daies, and Essex marched from thence to Islip, with purpose to distress Oxford on the North part, and left Sir William Waller at Abington on the South part.

The King perceiving the Parliaments intention to besiege Oxford, was resolved to endeavour to prevent it, by giving their Armies some distant diversion, or at least to remove his person from the incommodities of a siege: The place resolved to go to, was Worcester, which he kept so private, that scarce any knew of it but himself, and

The Queen upon apprehension of danger, removes from Oxford to Exeter. The Parliament at Oxford prorogued.

1644. to amuse the enemy, on the third of June, he sent a party of five or six hundred Horse, under the Command of the Earl of Cleveland, to alarm Abington, who bravely entered the Turnpike and if he had had more forces, might have carried the Town, but having done his business, he retreated with his Party to Oxford, whilst Waller drew his Troops about Abington, expecting the King's march that way, but He that evening appointed his Rendezvouze at Northly, about eight miles from Oxford where he drew up his Army, consisting of about 7000 Horse and Foot, 12 Drakes and 60 Carriages, and having refreshed himself at one Mr. Parrets House there, from whence he marched to Burton on the Water, a Village between Burford and Stow on the Wold, and there lodged at Dr Temples the Parson there.

From Burton the King went to Parshore, and from thence to Worcester.

Essex and Waller having notice of the King's march 18 hours after he was gone, pursued him two several waies; Essex was in some trouble to know what to do, considering that fighting would not so much waste his men, as tedious marches after the King's light Army, when his was incumbered with a heavy train of Artillery, so that he thought it more prudent to put Waller upon this service, and to stay for him at Burford to consult about the prosecution of it. At Burford it was resolved that Essex should march Westward, to bring those Counties into the obedience of the Parliament, whilst Waller should get what Forces he could together, to join with him in pursuit of the King, who was yet at Worcester, from whence on the 11th of June he sent a party out to relieve Dudley Castle that was besieged, and having intelligence that the Parliament Armies were now severed, and hearing that Waller came nearer by tedious and hungry marches, the King advanced to Budely, where he staid four daies, and Waller imagining his intention to be to march towards Prince Rupert, hastned into Staffordshire to get before him, but the King turns back with resolution to be furnished with more men and ammunition from Oxford, and in order thereunto on the 18th of June he came to Witney, where he staid till some forces came to increase his Army, and being as well provided as he could in so short a time; He marched towards the Parliaments associated Counties, and on the 22^d of June he came to Buckingham, where he received the joyful news of the Queens safe delivery of the Princess Henrietta.

Waller to recruit his Army from the Garrisons of Gloucester, Warwick, Coventry, Northampton and Kenelmworth Castle, had on the 26th of June, a Rendezvouze in Keinton field, whereof the King having notice turned his march towards him, and quartered that night at Brackley; two daies after the King coming before Banbury, he found Waller drawn up in Battalia Westward from the Town on the side of Crouch-hill, taking advantage of the Hills, Bogs and Ditches, so that the King marched to Daintry, leaving a guard of Dragoons at Cropledy-bridge, to secure his pass over the River, and thereupon the Army marched over, and the Musqueteers that guarded the Bridge, were gone off, when Waller greedily apprehending to make some advantage upon the King's Rear, puts over 2000 Horse, with a great body of Foot, and 14 pieces of Cannon, sufficient as he thought to disorder it; the King's Rear consisted of the Earl of Cleveland, and the Earl of Northampton's Brigades of Horse, and Sir Bernard Ashley's regiment of Foot: These faced about, and routed all the Enemy that had passed the Bridge; and the Earl of Northampton seeing some of Waller's Horse endeavouring to ford the River, charged and repulsed them: In this fight 300 of Waller's Souldiers were slain, and Weems their General of the Ordnance was taken prisoner, with two Lieutenant Colonels, three Captains, two Lieutenants, four Cornets, with other Ensigns and Officers, 180 common Souldiers, five Gunners, and fourteen great Guns. There was slain on the King's part, Sir William Butler, and Sir William Clark, the Lord Wilmot General of the Horse, was twice Prisoner, but rescued once by Sir Frederick Cornwallis, and the second time by Mr. Robert Howard, who was Knighted for the service of that day. Colonel Nevil was also hurt, and some other Officers and others were taken Prisoners, but there were not above twenty slain.

The King marched to Evesham after this fight, from whence he sent a message to the Parliament to invite them to a Treaty of Peace, and from thence he went on to Bath; Sir William Waller was not in a condition to follow him, but after some time, he went to London to solicit recruits, whilst the King march'd after Essex into the west. In the beginning of this Month, Prince Rupert marched out of Lancashire with a considerable Army for the relief of York, wherein the Marquess of Newcastle had been besieged two months by three Armies, under the Command of the Earl of Manchester, the Lord Fairfax and General Lesley; they all upon approach of the Prince, drew off their Army, and thereupon the Prince and the Marquess of Newcastle marched after them to a plain called Marston-Moor, where on the third of July, a terrible Fight began, in which the Prince at first had much the better, taking their Ordnance, and many of them Prisoners, insomuch that General Lesley and the Lord Fairfax thinking all had been lost, fled many miles from the place where the Battel was fought, and never came to the remainder of their Army, till two daies after the Fight; but in conclusion, by a wonderful and an unexpected fatality the fortune of the day turned, and the Parliament Forces recovered their lost Ordnance, and took some of the Princes Baggage, and with it Sir Charles Lucas, Colonel Porter, and Colonel Tilliard Prisoners. In this Battel were slain on his Majesties part, the Lord Cary, Sir Thomas Metham, Colonel Eure, Colonel Towneley, with some others of note, and about 1500 common Souldiers. On the Parliaments part were slain Sir Charles Fairfax, with many other of their Commanders, and at least 3000 Souldiers.

The sudden departure of the Marquels of Newcastle, and so many other considerable persons at this time, was thought to be occasioned by a general Dissatisfaction among the Officers, concerning the Abilities and Integrity of King; whose direction had a great Influence upon the Action of that day; but however it came to pass, so it was, that being a Scotch-Man he was very hardly spoken of among the Northern Commanders, as neither so great a Souldier as the World believed him, nor so zealous in the Cause, as perhaps he would have been, if it had not been against his own Country-men.

dred to the Parliament.

The Parliament Army had now lain twelve daies before York, since their last approach to it, and preparation was made for a Storm; but Sir Thomas Glemham the Governor sent a Trumpeter out late at night for a Parley, for his Provisions and Ammunition was much wasted, and he had not above 1000 Souldiers besides those that were sick and wounded, to defend the Town: So that upon the 16th of July the City was Surrendered upon very honourable Terms, amongst which the two or three first were, That all Officers and Souldiers should march out with their Horses and Arms, flying Colours, Drums beating, Matches lighted, Bullets in Mouth, with Bag and Baggage, and a Convoy to Skipton, and that no Souldiers shall be plundered: But the Souldiers that were to guard them, in violation of these conditions plundered many of the Waggon, at which the Earl of Manchester and Cromwel were so much displeased, that many of them were censured at a Court Martial, but little restitution was made, and most of them that were accused, agreed in one excuse, viz. That they never heard it was any part of the agreement, that they should march away, and be protected with their Bag and Baggage, and that many of Sir Thomas Glemham's Souldiers set them on to plunder, discovering to them which were the Waggon of Papists, in rifling whereof they assisted and got their share.

Having endeavoured hitherto in the actions of this year, to apply them to the times whereon they were acted, we must now return to describe the motions of the Earl of Essex and the King in the Western parts, which for some weeks together administered the greatest matter for Story.

Whilst the King was at Bath, he received advice that Essex was about the 16th of July, march'd from Teverton in Devonshire towards Plymouth to raise the Siege, which Sir Richard Grenvil had at that time before Plymouth, and disperse his Forces, which was the result of a Council of War then had; when two other Questions were proposed, either to march back to meet the King's Forces, or to besiege Exeter, but neither of those were approved, and they were not very earnest to attempt Exeter, now they knew they had frighted the Queen from thence, who about the 15th or 16th of July safely arrived at Brest in Britanny, where she was very well received, though she got not thither without much hazard, having 100 great shot made at her; and those few small Vessels of her Guard by a Squadron of the Parliament Ships that lay to intercept her.

As soon as the King heard of Essex's advance towards Plymouth, he march'd with his Army into Somersetshire, and at Kingsmore, he summoned the Gentry of the County, and recommended to them the Cure of that County in his absence, and not to suffer themselves to be drawn away from his service: and hearing that upon the March of Essex his Army towards Plymouth, Sir Richard Grenvil had raised his Siege thereof, and was march'd into Cornwall, with his own Regiment, and the Regiments of Colonel Fortescue, Colonel Carew, and Colonel Ackland, and that Essex was marching after him with his Army, he immediately advanced with all his Forces towards Cornwall, but before he could get thither, Essex had much distressed Grenvil, having almost inclosed him with three Regiments of Horse, and a Company of Dragoons under Colonel Bear.

On the first of August the King entred Cornwall, passing over the Tamar at Polton-bridge, and he marched directly to Lifcard, where for some time he settled his head-Quarters; the County was very cordial to him, in so much that not any of Essex's men could straggle from their Quarters without danger to be killed or taken Prisoners by the Country people, which made him (who then Quartered at Liffithiel about 8 miles from Lifcard) keep his Army very much together, and call back those he had sent to attempt on Sir Richard Grenvil; but all his care did not prevent the loss of some of his chief Officers; for Quarter-Master-General Dalbeir, Colonel Allured, Lieutenant Colonel Carleton, and Lieutenant Colonel Bartley, with some other Officers being at the Lord Mohun's House at Bucconock at Dinner, were all, except Dalbeir, surprized by a party of the King's Horse, and brought Prisoners to Lifcard on the 4th of August.

The King by the addition of Prince Maurice his Army was much increased in strength, and in all appearance likely to give himself (as it after happened) a conquest over Essex, but the tenderness he alwaies had towards his Subjects, made him try rather (according to his custom) first to seek Peace before he proceeded to the rigour of War, in order whereunto he writ from Lifcard a Letter to Essex, dated August the 6th which he sent to him by his Nephew, the Lord Beauchamp, but no return was made to it, and a day or two after another Letter was writ to him by the Officers of the Army, to which he sent a negative answer to the Earl of Forth, importing, That he had received a Letter from his Lordship, and some other Commanders, by which a Treaty was desired with him for a general Peace, which he could not admit of without breach of the Trust reposed in him by the Parliament, having no power by his Commission to Treat in a matter of such Importance. During this conjuncture of affairs, an unhappy accident fell out in the King's Army, for in the consultation amongst the Officers of the Letter to be sent to Essex, a very earnest debate

Wilmot* therein, of making the Prince of Wales Mediator in the business, which by some disaffected to that Lord was improved to his prejudice, as if he intended to make a division in the Army; and thereupon the King was perswaded to secure him, and send him away with a Guard to Oxford; which caused a great Consternation in the Army, for he was very well beloved of the Souldiers, and if great care had not been used to temper the minds of many of them, great inconveniences might have ensued; but nevertheless the King lost hereby the counsel and conduct of one of his best Officers, who by all the actions of his Life before and after gave such evident marks of his Loyalty, that even his enemies were ashamed and sorry for their apprehensions of him: General Goring was at the instant of his remove put into his Command, and the King began to use all possible means to distress the Enemy by almost encompassing them with his Forces, he himself and Prince Maurice Quartered at Boconnock, Greenvil fastned himself at Lanbetherock three miles West of the King, and possessed himself of Leprin-Bridge a mile above Lisfithiel, to which place the tide flowed up from Foy, so that it was not fordable but at one pass between that and the Sea; the King's Army incamped between Boconnock and a Heath that parted his Quarters and the Enemy, and placed Guards on all places on the River leading from his Quarters at Lisfithiel to Foy, possessing a House of the Lord Mokun's over against the Town, and a Fort that commanded the mouth of the Haven; so that Essex had no place for relief by water but at a small Creek Mimbilly, and St. Blasse his Bay, but neither safe for ships, but they retained a large space of ground Westward, whereupon Goring was sent with most of the Horse, and Sir Thomas Bassett with 1500 Foot to those parts to stop all provisions coming in at St. Blasse, by which means Essex and his Army were reduced to such straits, that Sir William Belfour with five and twenty hundred of their Horse broke away before day in the morning on the 31 of August, between the Quarters of his Majesty and Prince Maurice, as they lay Encamped, and got to Saltaish, and the same night Essex himself and the Lord Roberts deserted the Army, and got away in a Boat to Plymouth.

The next day Skippon with the Foot endeavoured to march to Foy, but the King having notice of their motion marched soon after them, and that day took five of their Ordnance, falling into their Rear within two miles of Lisfithiel, the next morning they made a stand, and with their remaining Horse regained some fields from whence they had been forced before, whereupon the King sent Captain Edward Breet with the Queens Troop, who in his view forced them to retire, regained the lost ground, and got more, and returned in good order with the loss only of four of his men, and himself shot in the arm; for which good service the King immediately Knighted him. In the evening their men were so harassed, they could scarce be made to stand to their Arms, and in that their condition Lieutenant Colonel Butler came to desire a Parley of the King, which was granted, and a Treaty followed, by which on the first of December, the following Articles were accorded betwixt Prince Maurice and the Earl of Brainford on the one part, and Major General Philip Skippon and Colonel Christopher Whitcomb on the other part.

1. That all the Officers and Souldiers Horse and Foot on this side the River Foy, shall to morrow being the 1. of Septemb. at 11. of the Clock deliver up their own Quarters, all their Cannon, Train of Artillery, Carriages, Arms Offensive and Defensive, both of Horse and Foot, Powder, Bullet, Match and Ammunition unto such Officers as the General of his Majesties Artillery shall appoint, except Swords and Pistols of all Officers above Corporals.

2. That all Officers and Souldiers, both Horse and Foot of the said Army shall march out of their Quarters to Lisfithiel with Colours, Trumpets, and Drums, and that all Officers above the degree of Serjeants, shall have their Servants, not exceeding the number of fifty.

3. That they shall march from Lisfithiel to Pool and Wareham, and not touch any Garrison by the way.

4. In case they march from Pool, that they shall not bear Arms, till they come to Portsmouth and Southampton.

5. That all sick and wounded shall lie at Foy till they be cured.

6. That they shall have in their march all the money they can procure from Plymouth, and all other accommodation they can obtain from thence.

7. That there shall be no inviting of Souldiers, but such as come voluntary to his Majesties Service.

And according to these Articles, the King had delivered up to him all the Train of Artillery, consisting of 49 Brass Pieces of Ordnance (with those taken before) two hundred and odd Barrels of Gun-powder, with Match and Ball proportionable, 700 Carriages, and betwixt eight and nine thousand Arms; and many of the Common Souldiers deserted their Officers, and voluntarily offered their Service to the King; but this Victory did not lessen the King's inclination to Peace, insomuch that on the 8th of September he sent a second Message to the Parliament from Tavestock, though this, as that before, had no answer; nor was any Treaty agreed on till January following, as will be hereafter mentioned. But in stead of this Message, if he had gone with his Army towards London, in all probability he might have made an end of the War, the Army of Essex being thus broken, and that of Manchester not returned from the Northern Service.

About this time the Marquess of Montrose was very victorious for the King in Scotland, having obtained a great victory over the Covenanters upon Newbigging-Moor, and taken Perth, and within fourteen daies after this he gained another victory near unto Aberdeen, and soon after took that City, and marched from thence into the Earl of Argyles Country, which he wasted with fire and sword, and did many great services, even to admiration, considering the smallness of his

The King has good success in the West.

The Parliaments success in divers parts.

The Battle at Newberry.

The Earls of Essex and Manchester, and Sir William Waller, had drawn a great Army together, with a resolution to hinder the Kings March to Oxford, but he not believing that Essex could have so soon appeared at the head of an Army, sought or was willing not to decline engagement. Essex and Manchester on the 23th of October rendezvouz'd their Army in Aldermaston Park, and the next night came privately over the water at a Ford near Padworth, and next morning to Bucklebury-heath near Newberry, where the King then was, and about 12 of the Clock drew down their whole Army between Thacham and Shaw, and skirmished with the Kings Horse; On Saturday both Armies plied one another with their great Ordnance, but without much hurt done. Then some of Manchesters Troops and London Trained bands crossed the River Kennet between the hill and Newberry, and did some execution upon those that kept the Pass against them: But Sir Bernard Ashley coming to their rescue, forceth the other over the River. Again, in the afternoon 4000 of Essex and *Waller*s Horse and Dragoons with 500 Pikes, charged the Royal Army on the West side of Newberry, where were the Cornish foot, & the Duke of Yorks Regiment, with 5 field pieces, and Prince Maurice's Brigade of Cornish Horse, all which having not unmanfully sustained the rough charge of the Parliamentarians, were yet forced to retreat back in some disorder, and here some of the Kings field-pieces were taken. The Essexians following their success, advanced with 500 Horse, and a sufficient strength of Musquetiers betwixt Newberry and Spine upon the Kings Life-Guards, and Sir Humphrey Bennet's Brigade, whom they overpowered, and had much more endamaged, if the Lord Bernard Stewart had not come up to their assistance, and secured their Retreat on the East-side of Spine; the Parliamentarians having settled three bodies of foot in certain inclosures, advanced over a ditch with a great body of Horse to break through the Kings Guards, but first they were obliged to fight with General Coring and the E. of Cleavelands Brigade (who charged stoutly and beat back the Enemy, but pursuing disorderly were repulsed with loss.)

Upon the North-East of Newberry stood the Lord Ashley, with Colonel George Lisle, against whom the Earl of Manchesters Horse and Foot, with the Trained Bands of London came down the Hill, and worsted Colonel Lisles Guards. But Sir John Brown Lieut. Colonel of the Prince of Wales his Regiment of Horse, charged the Foot, and stopp'd them, and then received a charge of 1000 Horse, and was forced to retreat.

Manchester in the next place forces his way to charge the Reserve commanded by Colonel Thelwell, and after a smart dispute beat them out of the field and gains their Colours, and two pieces of Cannon: In this Battel on the Kings part were slain, Sir Anthony St. Leger, Lieutenant Col. Leak, Lieutenant Col. Topping, and Capt. Catlin; the Earl of Cleaveland, and some few were taken; the Earl of Brainford and Forth, Sir John Greenville, Sir Richard Campfield, Major Alford and Captain Walgrave and others were wounded, many private Souldiers slain and taken prisoners. The fight endured till eight of the Clock at night, and was ended to the advantage of the Parliamentarians; for the King perceiving that most of his Brigades were shattered, and fearing a total overthrow if the Battel should be renewed, marched away secretly to Dennington-Castle, and there left behind him his great pieces of Ordnance, and so hastened to Willingford. General Essex lodged himself in Newberry, and having in vain summoned and assaulted Dennington-Castle, he marched away on the 29th of October, committing the care of that Siege to a party which he left behind him.

The King after this fight made what haste he could to recruit and refresh his Army, that he might relieve Dennington-Castle, which was not sufficiently provided, and bring from thence the Ordnance, Ammunition & Baggage which he left there, and that he might also succor Basing-house, which was again besieged, & therefore on the 6th of Novemb he had his Rendezvouze at Bullington-Green betwixt Wallingford and Oxford, and from thence, he marched two days after to Dennington but upon his approach to the Castle, the Enemy drew off their Forces, and he put into the Garrison a supply of such things as they wanted, and then drew off the Train of Artillery, and other Carriages which he had left there: and hearing Sir William Waller was with an Army about Hungerford, he marcht thither to ingage him, but they would not venture an encounter, and from thence Sir Henry Gage was sent with a Party to relieve Basing-House, but before he came, the besiegers drew off, and left the work very easie to him. After these performances the King returned to Oxford, and disposed his Army to Winter Quarters, and there he was attended by the Earl of Denbigh, and some of the House of Commons as Commissioners from the Parliament, with Propositions for a Peace, which produced an overture for a Message to be sent from him to the Parliament by the Duke of Richmond, and the 1644. Earl of Southampton, which was agreed to, and from thence a Treaty was had at Uxbridge, which began about the first of February after, of which we shall make further mention in its place.

Earl

About the end of this Month, Sir Alexander Carew who was Governor of St. Nicholas Island at Plymouth, was tryed by a Court Martial for endeavouring to deliver up the Island to the King, and sentenced to be beheaded, which sentence was a few dayes after executed upon him on Tower-Hill, and by the same Court Martial Sir John Hotham and his Son were in like manner arraigned, found guilty, and executed for designing to quit their party, and by some service to ingratiate a return to their allegiance to the King: concerning whose misfortunes, the King amongst other reflections thereon in his excellent * Book, exprefs'd him thus;

Sir Alexander Carew beheaded.
Sir John Hotham and his Son executed.

* Elxay Bazil xth,
cap. 3. p. 46.

Sir John Hotham unrepented, unthreatned, not cursed by any language or secret imprecation of mine, only blasted with the conscience of his own wickedness, and falling from one inconstancy to another, not long after pays his own and his eldest Sons heads, as forfeitures of their disloyalty, to those men, from whom surely he might have expected another reward than thus, to divide their heads from their bodies, whose hearts with them were divided from their King.

Nor is it strange that they who employed them at first in so high a service, and so successful to them, should not find mercy enough to forgive him, who had so much promerited of them: For Apostasie unto Loyalty, some men account the most unpardonable sin.

Nor did a solitary vengeance serve the turn; the cutting off one head in a Family, is not enough to expiate the affront done to the head of the Common-weale. The eldest Son must be involved in the punishment, as he was infected with the sin of the Father, against the Father of his Countrey; Root and Branch God cuts off in one day.

In this heat, Roger L'Estrange, the Son of Sir Hamond L'Estrange of Norf. was Condemned to dye by the same Court, being taken with a Commission for the Reducing of Lyn. He was betrayed by on Leman, and Haggard, under the horridest Oath of Secrecie imaginable: He was Sentenced by a packt Committee unheard: and upon his appeal to the Lords, Reprieved in order to a Hearing, which he expected almost four years, in Newgate, and came off at last without it.

By this severe and sanguinary way of proceeding, the Parliament made themselves very terrible especially to their own party, against whom any particular Crimes could be objected; but where the offences were general, and the persons of great interest in their Army, they were more cautious in their methods; and it happened at this time, that they were much perplex'd at the ill conduct of their Armies, in suffering the King to make that progress he lately did in the relief of Dennington and Basing-House; for by his appearance there, the quarters of the Parliaments Army on that side, were at Redding, Henly, Abington and Farnham, and the Kings Troops were quarter'd at Basing, Odiam, Newbury, Blewbury and Malborough.

Dennington and Basing House relieved by the Kings Forces.

Essex began to be suspected as careless or discontented, and Colonel Norton wrote a Letter that he had received a Warrant from a Chief Commander of the Army to withdraw from Basing: And the Earl of Manchester made a long Relation in writing concerning the carriage at Dennington, wherein he made his own defence, but accused Colonel Cromwel. Upon this the House of Commons fell into consideration of the slow proceedings of their Armies, alledging that many of their Officers were deficient in not prosecuting advantages, which tended to the Prolongation of the War, and that the differences amongst their Commanders were commonly most where the command is greatest; which produced this Resolution, (viz.) That no Member of either House of Parliament shall (during this War) enjoy or execute any Office or Command Military or Civil, which hath been granted or conferred on any Member of either House, or by any authority derived from either House, and that an Ordinance be brought in to that purpose.

The House of Commons vote, that no Parliament man shall execute any command Military or Civil.

This Vote and the ordinance thereupon was very much opposed by the Peers, but Petitions from the City and severaly Counties were framed and presented to move their compliance, which in the end prevailed upon them; In the meantime, though it was now Winter, and not ordinarily a time of Action, the War went on in several places, and several new Garrisons were made by both parties, to the miserable spoyl and destruction of the Countrey. Sir Jacob Ashley possessed himself of Cirencester with three Brigades of Foot and four Regiments of Horse, and became so formidable, that he commanded Contribution to the very Gates of Gloucester; nor were the Garrisons in Worcester, Hereford, and Bristol, less active and Monmouth that had been before taken from the King, was regain'd by the Lord Herbert of Ragland, but in the midst of this good Fortune on the Kings side, a Garrison was form'd at Abington, a Town within five miles of Oxford, by order from the Two Houses of Parliament, under the command of Colonel Brown, the King and Council looking on, and suffering the Intrenchments to be made, the Works to be raised, and the Ordnance to be planted on the same. * It cannot be denied, but that Sir Henry Gage, and many of the chief Commanders which were then in and about Oxford, offered their service to the King, and earnestly desired leave to prevent that mischief which by the Intrenchments of this Town must needs fall upon them. But the Lord George Digby, not long before made Principal Secretary of State, had perswaded the King unto the contrary, upon assurance that he held intelligence with Brown, and that as soon as the Town was fortified and furnished with Victual, Arms and Ammunition, at the charges of the Houses of Parliament, it would immediately be delivered into his Majesties hand. In which design he was deluded, and exposed to some loss of Reputation: For Brown having brought his project to the highest round of the ladder (as himself expressed it) thought it high time to turn it off, and to declare himself for the two Houses against the King; printing not long after all the Letters which passed between him and the Lord Digby upon this occasion.

Monmouth regained by the Lord Herbert of Ragland.

Abington made a Garrison for the Parliament under Brown's command.

* Heylin's short view of the Life and Reign of King Charles fol. 109.

But

1644. But now when it was too late, Sir Hen. Gage was sent with a commanded party out of Oxford and Wallingford to raise a Fort at Cullam Bridge within half a mile of Abington, but the design being discovered he was prevented, and in the attempt unfortunately received a shot, whereof within two hours he died, and with him Lieutenant Col. Lower the Deputy Governor of Wallingford, and Major Green of that Garrison, with several others of great Courage and Reputation.

Arch-Bishop Laud, Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, was beheaded on Tower-hill, after he had been kept four years a Prisoner in the Tower, his Rent sequestred, and his Books, Papers, and all his Goods seiz'd; his Charge was, a constructive Treason under several heads, reducible into two particulars;

1. For endeavouring the subversion of the Laws of the Land.
2. And a like endeavour to overthrow the Protestant Religion.

His Tryal was at the Lords Bar, and Mr. William Pryn of Lincolns-Inn, his profest enemy, was made his Prosecutor, wherein nothing was omitted to aggravate his offences, though when all that could be, was said, nothing that did amount to Treason could be proved against him, but the Scots who were at that time very prevalent, would not be satisfied, unless he were put to death, to manifest thereby their zeal against the Episcopal Hierarchy, to usher in the Presbyterian Government at the approaching Treaty, so that by an Ordinance of Lords and Commons, he was adjudged guilty of High Treason, though at the passing thereof in the House of Peers, there were but seven present, (viz. * the Earls of Kent, Pembroke, Salisbury and Bullingbrook, and the Lords North, Grey, and Bruce.)

He ended his Life with such a modest confidence and so much piety, that his greatest Enemies then present, who came to behold the Execution with hearts full of joy, returned back with eyes as full of tears.

The Treaty at Oxbridge. In pursuance of several Messages from the King for a Treaty, it was assented to by the Parliament, and at Oxbridge Commissioners met on the 30th of January for the King, on one part, and for the Parliament of England and the Parliament of Scotland on the other.

The first things to be treated on, were, The matters of the Treaty.

1. Religion.
2. The Militia.
3. Ireland.

The first paper at the opening of the Treaty was concerning Religion, which was delivered from the Kings Commissioners to the others, in these words;

1. That Freedom be left to all persons of what Opinion soever in matters of Ceremony, and that all the penalties of the Laws and Customs which enjoin these penalties, be suspended.

2. That the Bishops shall exercise no Act of Jurisdiction, or Ordination, without the consent and counsel of the Presbyters, who shall be chosen by the Clergie of each Diocess, of the Learnedst and gravest Ministers of that Diocess.

3. That the Bishop keep his constant Residence in his Diocess, except when he shall be required by his Majesty to attend him on any occasion; and that if he be not hindered by the infirmity of old Age or sickness, he Preach every Sunday in some Church within his Diocess.

4. That the Ordination of Ministers shall be always in the publick and solemn manner, and very strict rules observed concerning the sufficiency and other qualifications of those men who shall be received into Holy Orders: And the Bishop shall not receive any into Holy Orders without the Approbation and consent of the Presbyters, or the Major part of them.

5. That competent Maintenance be established by Parliament to such Vicarages as belong to Bishops, Deans and Chapters, out of the Improvements according to the value of the several Parishes.

6. That no Man shall be capable of two Parsonages or Vicarages with cure of Souls.

7. That toward the settling of the publick Peace, 100000. l. shall be raised by Parliament, out of the Estates of Bishops, Deans and Chapters, in such manner as the King and Parliament shall think fit, without the Alienation of any of the said Lands.

8. That the Jurisdiction in causes Testamentary, Decimals and Matrimonials, be settled in such a manner as shall seem most convenient by the King and Parliament: And likewise that Acts to be passed for regulating of Visitations, and against immoderate Fees in Ecclesiastical Courts, and abuses by frivolous Excommunications, and all other abuses in Ecclesiastical Jurisdictions as shall be agreed upon by King and Parliament.

And if the Parliaments Commissioners will insist upon any other things which they shall think necessary for Religion, the Kings Commissioners shall very willingly apply themselves to the consideration thereof.

The Parliament Commissioners after they had perused this paper, delivered one of theirs to the Kings 1644. Kings Commissioners, which was as followeth.

That a Bill be passed for abolishing of all Arch-Bishops, Bishops, &c. according to the third Proposition.

That the Ordinances concerning the calling and sitting of the Assembly of Divines, be confirmed by Act of Parliament.

That the Directory for Publick worship already passed both Houses, and the Propositions concerning Church-Government annexed and passed both Houses, be Enacted, as a part of Reformation of Religion and Uniformity, according to the first Proposition.

That his Majesty take the Solemn League and Covenant, and that the Covenants be enjoyed to be taken according to the second Proposition.

To this was annexed the following paper.

That the ordinary way of dividing Christians into distinct Congregations, and most expedient for edification, is by the respective bounds of their dwellings.

That the Minister and the Church Officers in each Congregation, shall join in the Government of the Church, as shall be established by the Parliament.

That many particular Congregations shall be under one Presbyterian Government.

That the Church be governed by Congregational, Classical, and Synodical Assemblies, to be established by Parliament.

That Synodical Assemblies shall consist both of Provincial and National Assemblies.

These papers were debated on three dayes without any determination on any one controverted point, and on the 4th of February, The Parliament Commissioners delivered in the following propofals concerning the Militia.

We desire that the Subjects of England may be Armed, Trained and Disciplined as the Parliament shall think fit; and that the like be for Scotland, as the Parliament there shall think fit: And that his Majesty give his Royal assent to the Acts following.

1. An Act for settling the Admiralty, and all Forces at Sea, and moneys thereto for maintenance, to be as the Parliament shall think fit. The like for Scotland.

2. An Act for settling all Forces by Sea and Land in Commissioners to be named by Parliament, to be such as both Kingdoms shall confide in, with power to suppress all powers and forces contrary thereto, and to act as they shall be directed by Parliament.

And so for the Kingdom of Scotland.

That the Militia of the City of London, and the Parishes without London, and the Liberties within the weekly Bills of Mortality, be in the Lord Major, Aldermen, and Common-Council.

That the Tower of Lond. may be in the Government of the City, and the chief Officers thereof nominated, and removable by the Common-Council.

1644. That the Citizens or Forces of London may not be drawn out of the City without their own consent, and the example of drawing them out in these distracted times, may be no Precedent for the future.

These Papers were likewise debated three days, and then the Parliament Commissioners presented a paper concerning Ireland, to this effect.

That his Majesty give his Royal assent to an Act to make void the cessation of Ireland, and all Treaties of the Rebels without consent of Parliament, and to settle the Prosecution of the War of Ireland in the Parliament, to be managed by the joynt advice of both Kingdoms, and his Majesty to assist, and to do no act to discountenance or molest them therein.

The Kings Commissioners in the debate of this Proposition, did lay open the eminent and inevitable necessity which caused the King to make the Irish Cessation, which he was in honour obliged to make good; nevertheless they offered to condescend to any thing for the security of the Kings Protestant Subjects: but the Parliament Commissioners were so bound up by their instructions, that they could admit of no alteration of what they offered.

The matter of Religion was then resumed, and that was to be concluded before they proceeded to any other proposition. But so many difficulties occurred in the debate thereon, that no accord could be made; for the Parliament to endear the Scots to them, had caused every Member of each House to take the Scotch Covenant, whereby they bound themselves to the preservation of the Religion of Scotland, in Doctrine, Worship, Discipline and Government: and, To endeavour the extirpation of Episcopacy, and the Reformation of Religion in England and Ireland, according to the example of the best Reformed Churches. Whereby they could mean nothing less than to bring them to the discipline of Scotland, because they had sworn to the preservation of the Religion there. Moreover, they had sworn in this Covenant against detestable indifferency and neutrality (to keep their own words) whereby it seemed apparent, that though at first the contrivers of this Oath pretended only for liberty of Conscience, they now would allow none to any: wherefore the Kings Commissioners were at a stand; for the King took himself bound by the Oath of his Coronation, not to alter the government of the Church, and they were bound by their instructions to insist thereon, so that the Treaty became desperate upon this account, though on the Kings part it was offered, That if the Articles proposed by them, did not give satisfaction, that then so great an alteration as the total abolishment of a Government established by Law, might (for the imparlance of it, and any reformation in doctrine for the scandal of it) be suspended, till after the disbanding of all Armies, when the King should be present with the Parliament, and calling a National Synod, might receive such advice both from the one and the other, as should be necessary; and as any Reformation thus calmly made, would needs prove for the singular benefit; so whether the contrary, that is an alteration even to things though in themselves good, could by 1644. The Scotch Covenant taken by both Houses.

1644. by the principles Christian Religion, be enforced upon the King or Kingdom.

The Treaty proves ineffectual.

This would not be admitted, and the time allowed for the Treaty being but twenty day, nothing was effected therein; for the Parliament were resolved to have no peace but on their own terms, believing all the Kings proposals for peace, to proceed either from an inability to hold out the War, or from the weakness and irresolutions of his Council.

Shrewsbury taken.

After this followed the taking of Shrewsbury, a place of very great importance to the King, as the Gate which opened into Wales, situate on a rising ground, and almost encompassed about by the River Severn; that part which is not invironed by water, being wholly taken up and made good by a very strong Castle. By the loss of which Town, the Kings former intercourse with his Loyal Subjects of North-Wales was not only hindered, but a present stop was given to an association which was then upon the point of concluding between the Counties of Salop, Flint, Chester, Worcester, &c. to the great prejudice of the Kings affairs in those parts of the Kingdom.

Pomfret-Castle relieved by Sir Marmaduke Langdale, & the Lord Fairfax's Army defeated.

But to make a recompence in some measure for this great loss, about the beginning of March this year, Pomfret Castle in York-shire was relieved by Sir Marmaduke Langdale, who there defeated the Lord Fairfax's Army that lay before it, and in his going thither, he defeated a great Party of the Parliament Forces commanded by Colonel Rossiter near Melton-Moubray in Leicester-shire.

The Prince of Wales sent into the West to perfect the Association.

The King at this time thought fit to send the Prince of Wales into the West, to perfect the association which had been begun in the end of the last Summer, and in those Countreys to advance such further Forces as might not only serve for the defence of themselves, but give some reasonable increase to his Army; so that upon the fifth of March, He set forwards toward Bristol, accompanied by the Lord Culpepper and Sir Edward Hyde, as his principal Counsellors, and some of the chief Gentry of the West, who were of most authority in their several Countreys.

The King having advised with such of the Members of both Houses of Parliament, as had assembled at Oxford, from their last meeting in November after their Prorogation, to the tenth of March; He then being resolv'd for action, dismiss them to their several Countreys.

And now both sides prepare for action, in order whereunto, the Parliament had passed their Ordinance which they called self-denying, wherein all and every the Members of either House were to be discharg'd of all their Command Military or Civil, and in pursuance thereof, they elected Sir Thomas Fairfax to be General of their Army, which they now modell'd out of their other Armies, consisting of 11 Regiments of Horse, and 10 Regiments of Foot. Oliver Cromwell, though a Member of the House of Commons, was particularly excepted out of the Ordinance, and so was Skippon the Major General, and Ireton the Commissary General of the Horse; and to make way for these Officers, the Earls of Essex, Manchester, and Denby, surrendered their Commissions in the Lords House, and the Earl of Warwick also surrendered his Commission of Admiral.

1645. The Parliament pass their self-denying Ordinance. Sir Thomas Fairfax made General of their Army. Cromwell, Skippon, and Ireton, excepted out of their Ordinance. Essex, Manchester, and Denby, surrender their Commissions and Warwick his Admiralship.

April the third Sir Thomas Fairfax sets forth for Windsor, where he applies himself to the gathering together of his Army, to which place Lieutenant General Cromwell came to him, and was immediately ordered to march towards Oxford, with a Brigade of 1100 Horse and Dragoons, to intercept a Convoy of Horse, which Prince Rupert had sent from Worcester to fetch off the King from Oxford with his Train of Artillery, and some foot with intention to take the field; and at Islelip, Cromwell falls upon them, which after some dispute he routed, and took divers Prisoners, and about 200 Horse, and from thence he pursued several of them that escaped to Blechingdon House, where Colonel Windebank kept a Garrison for the King, which was surrendered to him upon the first summons, but the Colonel was soon after condemned by a Court of War at Oxford, and shot to death for parting so easily with the place. A few days after Cromwell marches to Farrington, and assaulted that Garrison, but was repulsed with the loss of near 200 men, besides many that were wounded and taken prisoners. The King perceiving that Fairfax intended to besiege Oxford, sent for Prince Rupert and General Goring to march to him thither, and these about the beginning of May came to Oxford, and fetcht off the King, who quickly increased his Army, & advanced with it towards the relief of Chester, but Goring returned to the Siege of Taunton, from whence he had been called to this service.

Prince Rupert and Gen. Goring come to Oxford & fetcht off the King.

Fairfax in commiseration of the distressed condition of Taunton, marched with his Army to the relief of it as far as Blanford, but upon second thoughts he sends Colonel Welden with near two thousand Horse and Dragoons, and 5000 Foot to Taunton, and returns to Newberry, where he receives an express to march to Oxford and lay close Siege to it: in the mean time Welden makes haste to Taunton, and the Kings Forces before the Town being informed it was the whole Army, resolved to give one furious assault, and if that took not effect, to quit the place, which was performed, and they entered the Town, and fired two Streets, but the Governour retired to the Castle, and they could not force that, wherefore they drew off, and suffered Col. Welden to enter the Town, but Goring, Greenvil, and Barkley, uniting their forces together did so press upon Welden, that they besieged him and the Town again. By this time the King had relieved Chester, and from thence marched to Leicester, and taken it by assault, wherein were many Prisoners of note, and good store of Arms and Ammunition. and from thence he went to Derentry. Fairfax having intelligence as he lay at the Siege of Oxford, of this fortunate progress of the Kings Arms, was resolved to raise his Siege, and march directly towards him, with an intent to give him Battel, and in pursuance hereof on the 5th of June his Army rendezvouzed at Great Brickhil, and from thence he marched to Gilbrough, within four miles of Northampton, and five miles of Brough-hil, which was one of the quarters of the Royallists.

Fairfax lays close Siege to Oxford.

The King relieves Chester, and takes Leicester by assault.

The King hereupon drew off from Brough-hil, minding to march Northward to the relief of Pomfret, which was again besieged, but Fairfax being eager to engage, sent Ireton with a flying party 1645. party of Horse, who fell in to Naseby Town, and took many prisoners, giving such an Alarm to the whole Army, that the King at midnight left his own Quarters, and for security hastned to Harbrough, where he raised Prince Rupert, & called a Council of War, where it was resolved to give Battel, and because Fairfax had been so forward, they would not stay for him, but seek him out, & at a place near Naseby in Northampton-shire, the two Armies met on Saturday the 14th of June.

The fight at Naseby.

The King himself commanded the Main Body, Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice the Right Wing, Sir Marmaduke Langdale the Left, the Earl of Lindsey, and the Lord Ashly the right-hand Reserve, the Lord Bard and Sir George Lisle the Left. Of the Parliaments Army, Fairfax and Skippon commanded the Main Body, Cromwel the right Wing, with whom was Rossiter, who came with his Forces but a little before the fight, and Ireton had the Left. The Reserves were brought up by Rainsborow, Hammond, and Pride. Prince Rupert charged the Parliaments left wing, commanded by Ireton, who made notable resistance, but at last was forced to give ground, Ireton himself being run through the Thigh with a Pike, and into the Face with a Halbert, his Horse shot under him & himself taken Prisoner. For a while Prince Rupert follows the Chase almost to Naseby Town, and in his return summoned the Train, who made no other answer but with their Fire-locks: but in the mean time Cromwel charged furiously on the Kings left wing, and got the better, forcing them from the Body, and prosecuting the advantage, quite broke them and their Reserve; during which the Main Bodies had charged one another with incredible fierceness, often Retreating and Rallying, falling in together with the But-ends of their Musquets, and coming to handy-blows with their Swords. But Fairfax's his Foot coming up seasonably to the Horse, and Cromwel coming in with his Victorious right Wing, they all charged together upon the Kings main Army, who maintain'd the fight, till over-born with fresh Numbers, and being out of Condition to dispute it any longer, retired out of the field toward Leicester, in the greatest disorder and confusion imaginable: leaving (as Heaven would have it) a compleat Victory to the Parliamentarians, who pursued them within two miles of Leicester, and the King finding the pursuit so hot, leaves that Town, and hastes to Litchfield. This Battel was exceeding bloody, both Armies being very courageous and numerous, not being five hundred odds, fought in a large fallow field, on the North-west-side of Naseby, about a mile broad, which space of ground was wholly taken up. On the Parliaments side were wounded and slain, above a thousand Officers and private Souldiers: Major General Skippon (who was an old experienced Souldier, and was ordered to draw up the form of the Battel) fought stoutly that day; and although he was sorely wounded in the beginning of the fight, and the General desired him to go off the field, he answered, he would not stir so long as a man would stand and accordingly stayed till the Battel was ended. Ireton (as is said before) was dangerously hurt and taken prisoner for a while, after he had done his part, but in the confusion 1645. of the fight got loose again, and saw the Victory achieved. The General and Lieutenant General performed their work with sufficient resolution (had their Cause been as good) and by their own examples infused valour into their followers, so likewise did the other Officers of whom divers were wounded.

On the other side, the King shewed himself that day a courageous General, keeping close with his Horse, and himself in person rallying them to hot encounters, the Earl of Lindsey, Lord Ashley, Colonel Rastol, and others were wounded, 20 Colonels, Knights, and Officers of note, and 600 private Souldiers slain: but much more was the damage that the King sustained, by what was taken, viz. six Colonels, 8 Lieutenant Colonels, 18 Majors, 70 Captains, and 70 Lieutenants, 200 Ensigns, and other inferiour Officers, 4500 Common Souldiers, and many women, 13 of the Kings household Servants, four of his Footmen, 12 Pieces of Ordnance, 8000 Arms, 40 Barrels of Powder, 200 Carriages, all their Baggage and Baggage, with store of rich Pillage, 3000 Horse, the Kings Standard, one of the Kings Coaches, and his Cabinet of Letters and Papers, which were after published by the Parliament (with less decency and civility than became such an Assembly) Sir Marmaduke Langdale hastened away the same night to Newark. The next day General Fairfax sent up Col. John Fines to London, with the Prisoners and Colours taken in the fight.

The King having saved himself by flight, gathered together some part of his scattered Forces, but never was able to make head against the Conquerors, losing this year one Garrison after another, till his whole strength was almost reduced to Oxford; I shall take notice only of some of the principal, namely, Leicester, Carlisle, Pomfrat-Castle, Bridgwater, Scarborough, Bristow, Hereford, and Westchester, on which so great a part of his affairs did most especially depend.

On the 16th of June, Fairfax sat down before Leicester, and summoned the Governor the Lord Hastings to deliver up the Town; which he refusing, Warrants were issued for the Country to bring in Ladders & other necessities for a storm; and Hastings continuing yet obstinate, he assailed it in several places, and at the Newark side, he made so wide a Breach, that the Governor desired a Parlee, which was granted, and thereupon a surrendring ensued upon very fair Terms. There were in the Town 14 pieces of Ordnance, thirty Colours, 2000 Arms, 500 Horse, 50 Barrels of Powder, and Ammunition proportionable, and about a week after Sir Thomas Glemham Governor of Carlisle, having been long besieged by the Parliament Forces, and despairing of succours yielded up the Town. The low condition of Col. Welden, & the Town of Taunton, caused the Committee of both Kingdoms to order Gen. Fairfax to march thither, which he readily obeyed, but upon his approach to the Town, General Goring on the tenth of July, drew off from Taunton, and retreated to Langport. The next day Fairfax being at Long-Sutton within two miles of Langport, he drew out his Forces early in the morning in Sutton field, Goring likewise drew forth at that time, and took a pass leading to Bridgwater, and lined the way to it with Musquetiers; Fairfax sent Major Bethel to force the pass, but he was repulst; then Defbrough was sent with 200 Horse, who prest so hard upon the Royallists, that they were put to a disorderly retreat into Langport, setting one end of the Town on fire, that the smoke thereof might hinder the enemies pursuit of them; but Lieutenant General Cromwel with some Troops prest through, and pursued them within two miles of Bridgwater.

In this fight Goring lost about 200 of his men, who were slain, and about 1400 taken prisoners, of which Colonel Brettrige, and Colonel Slingsby were the Chief. On Fairfax's side, Colonel Cook, Colonel Butler, and Major Bethel were wounded, and a Captain of Butlers slain, and about 100 of the Souldiers killed and wounded.

Sir J. b.
Digby died of his wounds at Bridgwater.

Sir John Digby who was Major General of the Horse to Goring, was shot in the elbow, and carried into Bridgwater, where shortly after he died of his Wound, and was very much lamented by his party, he was about forty five years of age at the time of his death, and in all his Life was scarce ever heard to swear or seem angry; he had very great courage and conduct in Martial affairs, and was competently learned also in many Sciences. Goring after he had refreshed himself for some time in Bridgwater, marched away to the North of Devonshire: Sir Thomas Fairfax presently thereupon sits down before Bridgwater, and summons the Town, but being resolutely denied by Sir Edmond Windham the Governor, he stormed the lower part thereof, which is divided from the rest by a Bridge, and gain'd it, and the next day he shot hot steel plugs into the Town, by which means, and by some intelligence he had with the Town, most of the houses that were thatcht were fired, whereby the Townsmen were so distracted that they left the Works, and flung down their Arms to endeavour to save their Houses. In the midst of this consternation, Fairfax sent a Trumpeter in to the Governor, whereby he acquainted him, that he purposed to assault the Town, but in compassion to the women and Children therein, he offered to permit as many of them as desired it, to go out of the Town; upon this there was so great a distraction in the Garrison, that the Governor was forced to yield to a Treaty; and thereupon on the 23. of July the Town was surrendered, upon condition only of fair quarter, but all except Townsmen that were in Arms to be prisoners at war, of which there were a thousand Officers and Souldiers, and in their Stores they found 44 Barrels of Powder, and 400 weight of Match, and in the Town 44 pieces of Ordnance, and 1500 Arms; and two days before, Pomfract Castle after three months Siege was delivered up to Major General Pointz, upon condition for the Officers and Souldiers to march away with their Arms, Drums beating, and Colours flying, and bullet in mouth, with 6 shot of Powder, and bullet proportionable: and on the 25th of July the Castle of Scarborough had the like fate it being then surrendered by Sir Hugh Cholmley the Governor, to Sir Matthew Boynton, who commanded the Forces before it, upon very honourable conditions, amongst which it was provided, that the Governor and all his Officers and Souldiers should have a safe Convoy to Newark, and from thence after six days notice, as many as desired should have a pass to go into Holland, or any other place abroad, and none were to be plundered or forced to take up Arms against their wills, but have Passes to go home if they desired them. They had kept this Castle so well, that at the delivery thereof, many of the Officers and Souldiers were so sick and weak, that they were brought out in sheets: there were about 35 pieces of Ordnance in the Castle, besides many Arms, but very little Victual or Ammunition.

Bristow comes next, a place conveniently seated for the Trade of Spain, the River capable of great ships, and the Port well guarded: At the taking of this City by the Kings Forces, to such strengths as before it had, there was added a Fort Royal, then conceived impregnable. Into this City Prince Rupert had put himself at the present; and was besieged not long after by General Fairfax, who came before it on the 25th of August. The Prince made several sallies, and did some execution upon the Enemy, but not without considerable loss to his own party, amongst which Sir Bernard Ashley, and Sir Richard Crane died of wounds they received in one of them.

Fairfax had intelligence that the works in many places were very weak and imperfect, and withall he heard that the King did purpose to joyn with Goring to raise the Siege, but first expected that they should weary themselves so long before the Town, till he should be able to draw together a force sufficient for such an enterprize: upon consideration whereof a Council of War was called, and Resolution taken to storm the City, which was done in this order; Colonel Fortescue with four Regiments on Somersetshire side, Colonel Montague with the like number on both sides of Lawford-Gate, and Colonel Rainsborough on this side the River Froom, from the Sally-port to the Fryers-port, and other Regiments were disposed in several stations, to second the assailants and enter the Lines; Fortescue fail'd in his attempt, but Montague and Rainsborough effected their business, and Rainsborough possess himself of Fryers-port, and all the other Forts, except the great Fort, were taken; the way being thus made by the Foot, the Horse entered the Town, and the Princes Horse hastned to get themselves into the Fort-Royal, but the Parliamentarians from the Fryers-port did so command the Gate and Entrance into the great Fort, that none could go in or out, so that the next day a Parley was had, and Articles concluded on for the surrender thereof; and in the place they had above 200 pieces of Ordnance, 8000 Arms, 200 Barrels of Powder, 80 Tun of Beer, and great store of other Provisions. In the storm on the Kings side Major Price, Major Williams, and ten other Officers were slain, and many Souldiers, and Colonel Taylor wounded. On the Parliaments side, Lieutenant Colonel Purefoy, and Captain Hill, and Major Cromwel with 30 more Officers were killed; and Major Bethel, Major Gethings, with some others of less note were wounded. The Prince on the 11th of September marched out of the City with eight Lords in his Company, 500 Horse, and 1400 Foot, the Foot marched with their Muskets & other Arms, but when they came within 20 miles

Fairfax marches into the West to the Prince of Wales.

10 miles of Oxford, they were to lay them down.

Bristol being thus reduced, Fairfax marched into the West, towards the Prince of Wales (who was now in the middle parts of Devonshire) intending to take in Exeter, but there were so many blocks in his way, that it was a long time after before he gained that City, as will be hereafter related.

The quick surrendering of Bristol did much trouble the King, for he thought that City, (so well fortified and furnished with Victual, Arms, and Ammunition) would rather have given a turn to his affairs, by the ruin of the Parliament Army against it, than otherways; but the line being so very large, they had hardly men enough to man the works, especially being kept by frequent alarms upon continual duty, so that in the end, partly out of weariness, and partly out of discouragement to see the Parliament carry all before them, the Prince was necessitated to deliver it up, for the People would stand by him no longer. Soon after this disaster, Col. Legg was removed from his Government of Oxford, and Sir Thomas Glenham appointed in his stead.

Scots raise their siege from Hereford. Montrose's Victory in Kilsyth field near Glasgow. Hereford surprised by Col. Birch and Morgan.

Hereford next followed the same fortune of Bristol, which having been besieged by the Scots from the 13th of July to the first of September, (at which time they were forced to draw off, upon news that their help was required in their own Kingdom, where Montrose was very prevalent, having defeated an Army employed against him in a Battle fought in Kilsyth field near Glasgow:) the Town was suddenly surprized by Colonel Birch and Colonel Morgan (the last then Governor of Gloucester) on the 18th of Decemb. The King a little before this time had got a small Army together in Wales, and seeing Bristol lost, was very desirous to free Chester (a City of very great importance in those parts of the Kingdom) from the Siege then before it by Sir Will. Brereton, Col. Jones, and others; to effect which he march'd with his Army consisting of about 5000 men, and most Horse to relieve the Town; but in his march towards it, he was fought by General Poyntz at Roughton-Moor within 2 mile of Chester, where being out-power'd with numbers, his Army was worsted, & amongst others, the L. Bernard Stuart (Brother to the Duke of Richmond then newly made Earl of Lichfield) was slain; he was a young Nobleman of great hopes, and therefore was his loss very much lamented by the King; upon this discomfiture, the King drew his broken Army towards the North-east, and commanded the Lord Digby and Sir Marmaduke Langdale to march for Scotland, and to joyn with the Marquess of Montrose, who was very successful there, and only wanted Horse to enable him to reduce that whole Kingdom to the King's Obedience. These in obedience to their order march'd Northward, and at a Village called Sherborne, they surprized seven hundred of the Parliament Foot, with their arms and baggage, but staying there for carriages, some of General Poyntz his Forces commanded by Colonel Copley, Colonel Lilborne, and Colonel Allured, fell upon them, and routed them, killing and taking about a hundred Officers, three hundred common Souldiers, six hundred Horse, with their furniture, and the Lord Digby's Coach and Horse, and therein his Cabinet of Letters, but he, with his remains of his shatter'd Brigade, making towards Scotland, was a second time met upon Carlisle Sands, and utterly defeated, he himself escaping to the Isle of Man, from whence he got a passage into Ireland: The King was got to Newark when this misfortune hapned to the Lord Digby, but so great was the discontent he found there, that he was put to much trouble thereby; Sir Richard Willis was a little before removed from the Government of the Town, and the Lord Bellasis made Governor thereof in his place, which alteration caused great heats among several Noble Persons, as they stood severally affected to either party; in so much that indecencies of Language and behaviour, passed even in the King's presence; and the feud, in all probability, had proceeded further, if his Majesty had not interposed with his Royal Authority to compose it. But all this was not yet sufficient to extinguish the Animosities which were contracted upon this dispute; although for the present they were so far pacified, and allayed, as not openly to break out into any Notorious Act of violence or mischief. This matter hath been reported several ways, and all with so great uncertainty, that I have rather chosen to deliver the truth in Generals, than to run the hazard of a mistake in a more particular Relation. In the close of this affair, the two Princes, Gerard, the Lord Hawley, and Sir Richard Willis, with some others of their friends, retired to Norton-House fourteen miles from Newark, from whence they sent to the Parliament for a pass to transport them out of the Kingdom, and obtained it.

The King comes to Newark.

Sir Richard Willis removed, and the Lord Bellasis made Governor of Newark.

The two Princes, Gerard, Lord Hawley, and Willis depart the Kingdom.

These traverses were accompanied with unwelcome intelligence from most places; for about this time, the King received the ill news of the taking from him of Basing-House by storm, (the defendants not having a sufficient number to man their works) and therein the Marquess of Winchester (who had long and gallantly defended his house) taken prisoner, with about two hundred others, and about a hundred were slain in the defence of the place; and as one misfortune is commonly followed by another, he had notice about the same time of the loss of Shelford-House taken by storm, wherein the Governor Colonel Stanhop, a Son of the Earl of Chesterfield, and near two hundred more, were kill'd after the House was entred.

Basing-House taken by storm and in it the Marquess of Winchester.

Shelford-House taken by storm, and Colonel Stanhop, with many others slain.

Newark at this time became so in-secure, that the King thought it inconvenient to continue longer therein, & therefore with a guard of three hundred Horse, he got safe to Oxford on the third of November, and thither the Princes Rupert and Maurice came to him from Worcester after a serious reflection upon themselves for their miscarriages towards him, and were perfectly reconciled to his favour.

The King leaves Newark, and comes safe to Oxford, whither the two Princes came to him and regain his favour.

The King's Forces in most parts became very much lessened, and though by the endeavours of the Queen, and some of his Ministers abroad, foreign aid was promised him against the next Summer, yet the King in affection to his people, was rather inclined to try all other ways than accept of those succors, and to that purpose from the 15th of December to the 23d of March following, he sent nine or ten Messages to the Parlia-

Parliament with offers of Peace, and for the better accomplishment thereof, he proposed to have a personal treaty with them, but they would not consent to any other terms of accommodation, than to have all their demands drawn up into Bills to be presented to him for his assent; yet in the mean time the King omitted not to use all ways in his power to relieve his Garrisons, and the Prince of Wales in the West was very active, but the spirits of men became so much depressed by the vigorous Progress of the Parliaments Troops, that nothing succeeded.

The siege of Plymouth was raised by Fairfax, and two dayes after Dartmouth was surrendered to him by Sir Hugh Pollard the Governour thereof, and from thence he marched to Exeter, and summon'd it, and there he left Sir Hardres Waller to block up the City, whilst himself with the rest of his Forces went to find out the Prince his Army then commanded by the Lord Hopton, he himself being gone into Cornwall to raise the Trained-Bands, and what other Souldiers he could to strengthen his Troops; whilst these things were acting in the West, the King at Oxford was again intent upon the relief of Chester, and for that service several Forces were by Sir William Vaughan drawn out of the Garrisons of Hereford Ludlow, Worcester, and Bridgenorth, who with seven hundred Horse, and seven hundred Foot, advanced to its relief; but the enemy drawing out a party of a thousand four hundred Horse, and a thousand Foot encountered, and utterly routed him, so that after this attempt, all hopes of relief failing, on the same day the City was delivered up to Sir William Brereton upon these conditions, viz. That the Lord Byron and all Noblemen, Commanders, and Officers and Souldiers, should depart the Town in all their apparel whatsoever; The Lord Byron with Horse and Arms, and ten men alike accomplished to attend him; his Lady, and Servants, with Coaches, in each four Horses, with such other Ladies and Gentlewomen as he thought fit, and with his Books, Evidences and Writings in his possession: but all of them with not above forty pounds in money, and twenty pound in plate; the rest of the Noblemen with their Ladies answerable to their honour with not above thirty pounds in money, and so every one in their degrees to the common Souldiers, who were to march away with 20 s. each. Nor were the Conditions for the Citizens less reasonable, which were the easier condescended to by Sir William Brereton, though he knew their distrefs, because of the desire he had not to ruine the City, the chief of his County, and of which he hoped to be Governour.

And on the same day Belvoir Castle was by Sir Gervase Lucas surrendered to General Poynts upon Conditions, and the Governour and his Lady, with the Officers and Souldiers, were with a Convoy conducted to Litchfield. At Torrington in Devonshire, Fairfax found the Lord Hopton with his Army; which he resolved to ingage; Hopton having the lesser number, drew up his men into several closes, and Fairfax pressed upon him very hard, but a great part of the time was spent in Skirmishes by several parties, till both retired; at length the forlorne-hopes of both Armies engaged; that of the Parliaments, with its Reserve, was at first beaten back to the main body of their Army, but that advancing, the Fight began about eight a clock at night, nigh the Town, to which the Royallists retreated, and there they maintained the charge so resolutely, that had not Fairfax's Souldiers been heartened with fresh supplies, they had given it utterly over; but the other overpowered by their fresh numbers, gave back, whereby the Enemy gained the Town; which being entered into, the Magazine in the great Church was fired by a train, and destroyed Fairfax more men than he had lost in the Battel; for there was no less than eighty Barrels of Powder: upon the firing of the Magazine, Sir John Digby took advantage of the Enemies amazement, and gave them a resolute Charge, in which he did some execution, and so fell off, and marched with the rest of the Forces into Cornwall; whither Fairfax followed with so much speed, that he compell'd the Royallists in disorder to quit Launceston, whereupon the Prince of Wales marched away towards Pendennis Castle, accompanied with the Lord Capel, the Lord Culpepper, and Sir Edward Hyde, and took shipping there on the first of March, and arrived safely at Scilly; the Lord Hopton soon after finding it in vain to make resistance with his broken Army, being summoned by Fairfax to disband, consented to it upon very honourable conditions; but having experienc'd how ill Articles had been observed, and being likewise sensible of the ill effects of the Kings gracious Proposals for Peace; He chose rather than to go to Oxford (whither by Articles he might have been conveyed by fifty of his own, and fifty of the Parliaments Horse) to transport himself to France.

After the disbanding of these Forces, all the Kings Garrisons and Forts in Cornwall yielded, except Pendennis Castle, and St. Michales Mount, and General Fairfax return'd to the siege of Exeter.

All these mischances thus hapning on the neck of one another, all the Kings hopes and expectation rested upon the coming of Sir Jacob Astley, (created Lord Astley of Redding two years since:) Who having kept together some Remainders of the Kings Forces since the Fight near Chester, and increasing them with the accession of some fresh supplies, marched towards the King, and was to have been met upon the way by Sir John Campsfield, with the Oxford Horse. But either through the want of Intelligence, or the necessity of fate, or some occasional delays, it was so long before Campsfield was upon his march, that the news came of the Lord Astleys being vanquish'd by Colonel Morgan at a place called Donnington near Stow on the Wold, on the 21th. of March: In which fight himself was taken prisoner, and with him all the Kings hopes were lost of preserving Oxford, till he could better his condition.

The King having often sent to the Parliament (as hath been said) to invite them to a Treaty of Peace, offering to come to Westminster in Person, had on the thirtieth of March a message from the Parliament, wherein they told him, That it would be unsafe for him or them to return to Westminster, untill he had assented to the Propositions which they were framing, &c. And to prevent his coming to London without their know-leged and consent, they voted, That if the King should come, or attempt to come within the Lines of Communication; that then the Committee of the Militia of London should have Power, and were thereby enjoined to apprehend and secure such as should come with him, to prevent resort unto him, and to secure his Person.

Exeter was at this time so much distressed, and without possibility of relief, that the City was on the 13th of April surrendered to Fairfax upon very good conditions; Sir John Berkley the Governour was to march out with his Souldiers both Cornish and others, in the height of Honour, with Drums beating, Colours flying, Bullet in mouth, Matches lighted, &c. The first into their Country, and the others to Oxford.
The Princess Henrietta youngest daughter to the King, (who ever since her Birth had continued in this City under the care of the Lady Dal-keith) was sent up to London, there to be disposed of by the Parliament, till soon after she was by her Governour conveyed privily to her Mother in France. To the fortune of Exeter, Barnstable Town and Fort, St. Michaels Mount, Dunston Castle, Woodstock, and many other Garrisons soon after submitted; so that Fairfax his victorious Army having cleared the West, was now resolved to march up to a close beleaguering of Oxford (which had some time before been extremely strained by the continual Alarms of Fleetwood and Rainsborough) which made the King begin to think of some way for his safety; and at last on the 27th of April the King disguised, departed out of Oxford accompanied only with Mr. Hudson a Minister, and Mr. John Ashburnham, and few or none else were acquainted with his design, so that though many knew that he was gone, yet various were the opinions whither; some said to Wales, others to Montross in Scotland, but the most general opinion was, that he was come up and lay in London concealed; to discover which the Parliament passed an Order, That whatsoever person should harbour or conceal, or know of the harbouring or concealing of the Kings Person, and should not immediately reveal it to the Speakers of both Houses, shall be proceeded against as a Traitor to the Common-wealth, forfeit his whole Estate, and dye without mercy. But contrary to all mens expectations, he is at length heard of at the Scots Camp before Newark; many wondered how he durst trust his Person with them; but the Parliament having notice of it, immediately ordered that the Commissioners, and the General of the Scottish Army, should be desired, That his Majesties Person might be disposed of as the Two Houses should desire and direct, and that he be thence disposed of,
and sent to Warwick Castle, and that John Ashburnham and the rest that came with him into the Scots Quarters, should be sent for as Delinquents by the Scrivants at Arms, and that the Commissioners of the Parliament residing before Newark should make a Narrative of the K. coming thither and present it to the House; But these Votes were scarce past, when came a Letter from the General and Commissioners of the Scottish Army to the Committee of both Kingdoms, to be communicated to the Parliament, acquainting them, That the earnest desire they had to keep a right understanding between the two Kingdoms, moved them to acquaint them with that strange providence wherewith they were surprized, together with their carriage and desires thereupon; That the King came yesterday into their Army in so private a way, that after they had made some search for him upon the surmises of some Persons who pretended to know his face, yet they could not find him in sundry Houses; That they believed their Lordships would think it was matter of much astonishment to them, seeing they did not expect him to come into any place under their Power; They conceived it not fit to inquire into the Causes, but to endeavour that his being here might be improved for procuring the work of Uniformity, for settling Religion, and attaining of Peace according to the League and Covenant, and Treaty, by the advice of the Parliaments of both Kingdoms, and their Commissioners authorized for that effect; That trusting to their integrity, they were persuaded that none would so far misconstrue them, as that they intended to make use of this seeming advantage, for promoting any other ends than were expressed in the Covenant, and had hitherto been pursued by them with no less Conscience than care; That for further satisfaction they did ingenuously declare,

That there had been no Treaty nor Capitulation betwixt his Majesty and them, nor any in their names; but that they left their wayes and means of Peace to the Parliaments of both Kingdoms, and so far as concerned them, as they had a witness in Heaven, they were confident to make it appear,
That there was nothing more in their desires than in all their resolutions and proceedings to adhere to the Covenant and Treaty; That their greatest thoughts should be taken up in studying, and their utmost abilities employed in acting those things which most advanced the publick good and common happiness of both Kingdoms, wherein by the help of God they should labour to use so much tenderness and care, that they hope it shall soon appear, their actions were the result of honest and single intentions; That they could not in a matter of so deep consequence and common interest, but seek their Lordships advice; for which effect they had also written to the Committee of Affairs in Scotland, with intentions to move joyned consents and resolutions, that after a seed time of Afflictions, we might reap the sweet fruits of Truth and Peace.
This was the account given by Leven the General, and the Commissioners in the Army to the Committee of both Kingdoms at Westminster. In the mean time the Garrison of Newark (which had been for a long time valiantly defended by the Lord Bellasis both against the Scots and English Forces, and had made many fortunate Sallies upon the Besiegers) was upon the 4th of May, the day before the King came into the Scotch Camp, entred upon a Treaty, and on the 9th was agreed to be surrendered upon condition,
That the Garrison, with all the Ordnance, Arms, and Ammunition, should be delivered up to the Commissioners for the Parliament of England; That the Lord Bellasis Governour, with all Officers, Gentlemen, and Clergy, to march away with their Horses and Swords unto any Garrison of the Kings not besieged, or to their own Houses; the Souldiers to have staves in their hands, and their own goods, and all of

1646. them to have three Months time to make their peace with the Parliament; or that failing, to be allowed Passes to go beyond Sea. About this time also was Banbury Castle surrendered, and not long after Carnarvon Town and Castle were delivered up upon Articles by the Lord Byron; and the Scots having conveyed the King from Southwel to Newcastle, for the more sure possession of him, He on the 10th of June by their advice, published a direction to Sir Thomas Glemham, Sir Thomas Tilsely, Col. Washington, and Col. Blague, Governors of Oxford, Worcester, Litchfield, and Wallingford, and to all other Commanders of any Towns, Castles or Forts within the Kingdom of England, and Dominion of Wales, giving them an account of his Resolutions to comply with the designs of his Parliament in every thing that might be for the good of his Subjects, and leave no means unattempted for the removing of differences betwixt them; and the more to evidence the reality of his intentions therein, he required them upon Honourable Conditions to quit the Towns and Forts intrusted to them, and to disband all the Forces under their several Commands; which some of them however demurr'd upon, in regard of his Majesties restraint: But before notice hereof came to Oxford, the Governor and Lords there had come to a Treaty, to begin at Heddington the 17th of May, between Sir John Mounson, Sir John Heydon, Sir Tho. Gardner, Sir George Binion, Sir Richard Willis, Sir Stephen Hawkins, Col. Gosnell, Col. Tillier, Dr. Zouch, Tho. Chichely, John Dutton, Geoffrey Palmer, and Robert Mead, Esquires, for the besieged; and Lieutenant General Hammond, Commissary General Ireton, Col. Lambert, Col. Rich, Scout-Master-General Watson, Major Desbrough, Major Harrison, Mr. Herbert, and Mr. Waller, for the Parliament. And after a tedious Treaty continued to the 25th of June, without any Cessation of Arms, it was delivered upon Conditions sufficiently Honourable, had they been as honourably performed; The whole number of the Garrison was supposed to amount to 7000 Souldiers and Scholars in pay, who all marched out; but many of the Nobility and Gentry had leave to tarry for Passes; the Chief of whom were the Duke of York, the Princes Rupert and Maurice, the Earls of Dorset, Hertford and Southampton, the Lords Cottington, Dunsmore, Secretary Nicholas, and others. The Duke of York was conveyed to London, and at St. James's committed with the rest of the Royal Children to the Tuition and Care of the Earl of Northumberland and his Lady. The two Princes Rupert and Maurice had Passes granted them to go beyond Sea; but before their departure, by the Parliaments leave, they had a Visit made to them by their Brother the Prince Elector.

Two daies after the surrendry, all the Seals of Estate were sent up from the General to the two Houses at Westminster, to wit, the Great Seal of England, carried by the Lord Keeper Littleton to the King in the year 1642. The Privy-Seal, Signer, King's-Bench, Exchequer, Court of Wards, Admiralty, and Navy-Seals, together with the Sword; the Seals were immediately voted to be broken in pieces, which was accordingly performed by a Smith in the House of Lords, the Commons standing by, and the broken Silver given in reward to the two Speakers, but the Sword was laid up safe in the Wardrobe. All other Garrisons were soon after surrendered according to the King's Order; Ragland Castle was one of the last held out in England or Wales, which the Old Marquess of Worcester, a man of Fourscore and four years of age, delivered up on very good Conditions, when the King had neither Field Army, nor scarce a Garrison besides it in England.

The King's Children were not long kept together under that Restraint the Parliament put upon them, the Princess Henrietta being in a short time after conveyed into France by the Lady Dalkeith, and the Duke of York after, as will be related hereafter.

The Scots desirous to haste home in safety with that spoil and plunder which they had gotten in their marching and re-marching betwixt Tweed and Hereford, were impatient at the caution of the King's Governors (as aforesaid,) and therefore prest his Majesty to reiterate his Orders; but that which they most earnestly importuned, was, That the Marquess of Montrose should lay down his Commission, who having twice beaten the Marquess of Argyle out of the Field, followed him home, and wasted his Country with Fire and Sword: And having vanquish'd Bailly, one of the best Souldiers of the Faction (commanding over a well formed Army) in a set Battel fought between them; and followed his blow so well, that he made himself Master of the City and Castle of Edinburgh, releasing divers of his Friends who had been seized and imprisoned there when he first took Arms, was at last (for want of Supplies) totally overthrown by Lesley, with 6000 men out of England. And yet about this time he was beginning to make head again, and in a hopeful way of proceeding, till he received his Majesties Command to Disband; which he immediately did, and took Shipping, and put himself into a voluntary Exile.

Whilst the King was at Southwel he had written to the Parliament for a Treaty, which after many Debates, was so far complied with, as to send Propositions to him by the Earls of Pembroke and Suffolk, Mr. Godwin, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Hippsley, and Mr. Robinson, but they were so high both in relation to the Rights and Prerogatives of the Crown, and tending to the change of Religion established, that he could not consent to them; but to give them some satisfaction therein, On the first of August the following Message was sent to them.

C. R.

The Propositions tendered to his Majesty by the Commissioners, &c. (to which the Houses of Parliament have taken twice so many months for deliberation, as they have assigned daies for His Majesties Answer) do import so great alterations of Government both in Church and State, as it is very difficult to return a particular and positive Answer, before a full debate, wherein those Propositions, and the necessary explanations, true sense and reasons thereof be rightly weighed and understood, and that his Majesty upon the full view of the whole Propositions, may know what is left, as well as what is taken away or changed. In all which he finds (upon discourse with the said Commissioners) that they are so bound up from any capacity, either to give reasons for the demands they bring, or to give ear to such desires as His Majesty 1645. is to propound, as it is impossible for him to give such a present Judgement of, and Answer to these Propositions whereby he can Answer to God, that a safe and well-grounded Peace will ensue (which is evident to all the World can never be, unless the just Power of the Crown, as well as the freedom and propriety of the Subject, with the just liberty and priviledges of the Parliament, be likewise settled) to which end His Majesty desires and proposes to come to London, or any of his Houses thereabouts upon the publick Faith, and security of the Two Houses of Parliament, and the Scots Commissioners, that he shall be there with freedom, honour and safety, where by his Personal Presence he may not only raise a mutual confidence between him and his People, but also have those doubts cleared, and those difficulties explained unto him, which he now conceives to be destructive to his Just Legal Power, if he should give a full consent to these Propositions as they now stand. As likewise that he may make known to them such his reasonable demands, as he is most assured will be very much conducive to that Peace which all good men desire and pray for, by the settling of Religion, the just priviledges of Parliament, with the freedom and propriety of the Subject. And His Majesty assures them, that as he can never condescend unto what is absolutely destructive unto that just power, which by the Laws of God and the Land he is born unto, so he will cheerfully grant and give his assent unto all such Bills on the desire of his Two Houses, or reasonable Demands from Scotland, which shall be really for the good and peace of his people, not having regard to his own particulars, (much less any bodies else) in respect of the happiness of those Kingdoms: Wherefore His Majesty conjures them as Christians, as Subjects, and as Men who desire to leave a good Name behind them, that they will so receive and make use of this Answer, that all issues of blood may be stopped, and these unhappy distractions peaceably settled; and upon assurance of an Agreement, His Majesty will immediately send for the Prince his Son, absolutely expecting his perfect obedience to return to this Kingdom.

His second Speech at a Conference
Oct. 6.
1646.

Answer to the Vote of Sept. 24.

This Message did not prevail, and there pass many Debates about disposing of His Majesty's Person. If any such course shall be taken, (saies Lowdon) or any demand made for rendering of his Person, which cannot stand with his Honour and Safety; or which cannot consist with our Duty, Allegiance, and Covenant, nor with the honour of that Army to whom (in time of his extreame danger) he had his recourse for safety; it cannot be expected that we can be capable of so base an Act. And again, If it be contrary (say the Scotch Commissioners) to the Law, and Common Practice of Nations, to deliver up the meanest Subject fled to them, though it be for the greatest Crimes; how much more would the World abroad condemn our Army for a base, dishonourable Act, if they should deliver up their Head and Sovereign, (having cast himself into their hands) to be disposed of at the Arbitrement of another Nation.

But alas! these difficulties only stuck till the Summ was agreed upon, and then they delivered him up, not only foreknowing, but foretelling the Consequences of that Action. If your Majesty (which God forbid) shall refuse (saies the Chancellor) to assent to the Propositions, you will lose all your Friends; lose the City; and all the Country; and all England will join against you as one man: and (when all hope of Reconciliation is past) it is to be fear'd they will proccss, and depose you, and set up another Government. The Propositions that then stood in Competition with the King's Freedom, Life, and Dignity, and the honour of the Scottish Covenanters, were to this following effect:

First, For His Majesty to Justifie and Confirm the Proceedings of Parliament.

2. To settle the Militia of England and Ireland in the hands of the Parliament for Twenty years, giving them power to raise Men and Moneys, &c.

3. To swear and sign the Covenant, and Command the taking of it throughout the Three Kingdoms; abolishing Episcopacy, and settling Religion as both Houses shall agree.

4. That all Honours since 1642. be made null and void, and that no Peers be admitted for the future to sit and Vote in Parliament, but by consent of the Two Houses.

5. That all great Places, and Offices of Honour in England and Ireland be disposed of by consent of Parliament.

Upon His Majesties Refusal to sign these Propositions, the Scots declared, That there would be a joint course taken by both Kingdoms concerning the disposal of his Person; (And a little after) with respect had to the safety and preservation of His Royal Person, in the preservation and defence of the true Religion, and Liberties of the Kingdoms, according to the Covenant. Explaining themselves afterwards, upon a Debate at Edinburgh, That the Clause in the Covenant for Defence of the King's Person, is to be understood, in defence and safety of the Kingdoms; by which construction it appears, that they knew what would become of the King before they parted with him.

Declaration of the Kingdom of Scotland,
Jan. 16.

But before the Scots entered upon this Treaty about the Person of the King, they had agreed with the Parliament upon terms for their marching out of England, by which agreement they were to have Two hundred thousand pounds paid in present upon their delivery of Barwick, Carlisle and Newcastle to the Parliament of England, and two hundred thousand more secured to them upon the Publick Faith of the Kingdom.

The first payment of this money was made at Newcastle according to the compact, and thereupon they delivered the King to the Earls of Pembroke and Denbigh, the Lord Montague, Sir James Harrington, Sir John Holland, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Cook, Mr. Crew, and Major General Brown, who were Commissioners appointed by the Parliament to receive him, and with these on the 8th of February, the King set forward towards his House at Holdenby in Northamptonshire, where he arrived on the 16th of the same month; The Scots two daies before the King's departure marched from Newcastle, which was possesed by a Garrison of English, and a few daies after, they also put Barwick and Carlisle into the Parliaments hands, and marched quietly home to Scotland.

The King at Holdenby was kept so close, that none of his domestick Servants that had attended him since he left London, nor any of his Chaplains were suffered to have access unto him; nor so much as a Common Prayer-Book allow'd him for 1646. for his private use. And the Parliament having now the King in their possession, and all his Armies and Garrisons subdued by their Forces, they began to be much divided amongst themselves, under the names of Presbyterians and Independents.

Presbyterians described. The first whereof who were the major part in both Houses, were those who in compliance with the Scots thought themselves obliged by the Covenant to set up the Presbyterian Discipline of Geneva, as it was exercised in Scotland under the Government of Congregational, Classical, Provincial and National Assemblies (to whom the City of London very much adhered) but the others disliked that sort of Government as too rigorous, imperious and conclusive, holding that Churches should not be subordinate as Parochial to Provincial, and Provincial to National, but co-ordinate, without superiority; and from hence they were called Independents: whereof the first eminent appearance was in the Assembly of Divines, which met in the year 1643. at Westminster to consult about matters of Religion; for the major part of these being Presbyterians, were in consideration of a Directory and Model of that Government to be proposed to the Parliament, when five of their Members, viz. Thomas Goodwin, Philip Nye, Sidrach Simpson, Jeremiah Burroughs, and William Bridge, made some opposition, and desired Toleration to be indulged to them, that they might not be concluded by the Votes of the Assembly; but the rest of the Members opposed their Toleration, and some moved their ejection out of the Assembly, except in convenient time they would comply therewith, whereupon the Dissenters appealed from the Assembly, and presented an Apologetical Narrative to the Parliament, wherein they petitioned for some favour to them, whose Consciences could not join with the Assembly in all particulars; concluding, That they pursued no other interest or design but a subsistence in their own land, as not knowing where else with safety, health, and livelihood to set their feet on earth.

Upon this Petition they found such favour, that they were secured from further trouble; and from this beginning they grew to so great an increase, that they had the best preferments left in the Church, and opened and shut the door of preferment to others.

Lieutenant General Cromwel and Commissary General Ireton, and the greatest part of the Army, consisting now of men of several Sects of Religion, did much favour these Independents, who to ingratiate themselves with them (though in their Confession of Faith and Doctrine, they wholly agreed with the Presbyterian) held out a Liberty of Conscience to all other Sects in the profession of their Faith and exercise of their Religion.

1647. This inclination of the Army to the Independents made the Presbyterians, who were the major part of the Parliament, very watchful over their actions, and observing that the Army at their Courts of War laid hold on all pretences of scandals and crimes to disband and cashier Presbyterians, that Independents might be put in their places, resolved to disband all of them except five thousand Horse, a thousand Dragoons, and five Companies of fire-locks, for which they wanted not a good pretence, that the people might be eased thereby of a great part of the Taxes imposed upon them for their maintenance, and that some of them might be sent into Ireland, where there was a want of English Souldiers. And for this purpose they borrowed two hundred thousand pounds of the City of London. The head-Quarters of the Army was at St. Edmunds-bury in Suffolk, when these matters were debated in Parliament; but by the intelligence they kept at Westminster nothing thereof was concealed from them, and by the Independent party in the House (as it was commonly said) they were so practised on, that they were resolved not to disband; yet which something of this was suggested in the House of Commons, Cromwel with his hand upon his breast, said, In the presence of God before whom he stood, that he knew the Army would disband and lay down their Arms at their doors whensoever they should command them. Upon this assertion, Orders of both Houses for disbanding were sent to the Army with instructions for determining the Accomps of the Souldiers, but instead of obedience to these Orders, a Council of Officers met at St. Edmunds-bury to consider thereof, began to debate of the matter with much dissatisfaction, and two Souldiers out of each of sixteen Regiments of Horse and Foot, as Agitators or Agents of their respective Regiments, were allowed to meet also in a kind of Council on the same Business, and both of these Assemblies agreed upon the same things in substance, namely, against disbanding; and in a Petition to the General, they desired the Army might be speedily drawn to a Rendezvouze, and that he would use his utmost to endeavour that it be not disbanded till publique Grievances should be redressed, and all such persons called to account who had been intenders, contrivers, or promoters of their destructions (for so they termed those of the Parliament that voted them to be disbanded.) These requests of the Officers and Souldiers produced a General Rendezvouze of the Army at Newmarket on the fourth of June, and the Agitators the day before privately sent Cornet Joyce with a party of Souldiers to seize on the King (as will be mentioned hereafter) and at this Rendezvouze they associated themselves together as a kind of distinct body from the rest of the Kingdom, and subscribed a solemn Ingagement of their resolution, wherein they to this purpose expressed themselves, (viz.)

We the Officers and Souldiers of the Army subscribing hereunto, do hereby declare, agree, and promise, to, and with each other, that we shall not willingly disband nor divide, nor suffer our selves to be disbanded or divided, until we have security, that we as private men, as other the free born people of England, shall not remain subject to the like oppressions and injuries as have been attempted, and shall have such satisfaction and security as shall be agreed upon by a Council to consist of those General Officers of the Army, who have concurred with the Army in this resolution (for many moderate men upon these discontents left them) with two Commission Officers and two Souldiers for each Regiment, of such likewise as subscribed to this Agreement. But whilst these contrivances were acted at the head-Quarters, there was a large Petition framed in the County of Essex against the Army:

Agitators of the Army chosen.

The Armes Ingagement.

The Army resolve to disband the Presbyterians.

1647. Army: upon this Cromwel goes to Walden where the head-Quarters of the Army then was, on pretence of quieting the distempers thereof, but nothing was effected; and in the Month of May, they presented a Petition to their General, wherein they desired to be satisfied, not only for their pay as Souldiers, but that a Provision might be made for their Indemnity, and several other things relating to Publick settlement: of which Petition great complaint was made by the Presbyterians; yet they rested not here, but were very active in framing another to be presented to the Parliament. But the Parliament shewed their high dislike of that Petition, and their approbation and esteem of their good service who first discovered it: but declared, if the Subscribers would forbear to proceed any further therein, they should be retained in the Parliaments good opinion, and that those who shall continue in the present distempers, shall be proceeded against as enemies to the State.

The King brought from Holdenby to the Army by Cornet Joyce.

These and some other alterations wrought at last so far, that on the 4th of June a party of Souldiers commanded by Cornet Joyce, came somewhat late to Holdenby, and desired to speak with the King, which being granted, he told him, he was come by command of the Army to remove him from that place; and so the next day after Dinner he carried him towards the Army. But on the 6th of June the General sent a Letter to the Parliament, pretending that he knew nothing of the Party that attended the King, professing that his remove was without his consent, or his Officers about him, but the Party that did it, told him that the reason thereof was from an apprehension of some strength gathered to take him away, thereby to make a new War, the plot and plotters whereof they were able to prove when called thereunto: when this was known, it was ordered by both Houses of Parliament,

1. That the King should reside at Richmond.
2. That he should be attended by the same persons that he was at Holdenby.
3. That Rositer's Regiment should guard him.

The Armes Representation to the Parliament.

But the Army in stead of complying herewith, sent a Representation to the Parliament, wherein they proposed,

That the two Houses might be speedily purged of such as ought not to sit there.

That such who abused the Parliament and Army, and endangered the Kingdom, might be speedily disabled from doing the like or worse.

That some determinate period of time might be set to this and future Parliaments, according to the Act for Triennial Parliaments.

That provision might be for succeeding Parliaments not to be adjournable or dissolvable by any power, but by their own consent during their respective period, and then to determine themselves.

That the freedom of the people to present grievances by Petition to Parliament may be vindicated.

That the exorbitant power of Country Committees may be taken away.

That the Kingdom may be satisfied in the Parliaments accompts for their vast summs received, and also in divers other things wherein the Common-wealth have been long abused.

That after such Delinquents as have been of the King's Party have compounded for their Delinquencies and paid their Compositions, an Act of Oblivion may be passed.

And immediately after this Representation, there was brought to the Parliament from the General and his Council of Officers, an Impeachment against eleven Members of the House of Commons, (viz.) Denzel Holles, Esq., Sir William Lewis, Sir William Waller, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir John Clotworthy, Sir John Maynard, Major General Massey, Mr. Glyn Recorder of London, Anthony Nicols, Esq., Colonel Edward Harley, and Colonel Water Long, for things done for the most part in the House, whereof one of the chief was, That by their power in the House, they caused the Ordinance for disbanding the Army to pass. The impeached Members declared themselves ready to answer any crime that could be objected against them, but the Officers of the Army requested that they might be forthwith suspended from any longer sitting and acting as Members: but this was denied as a thing judged at this time too high, and too much against the privilege of Parliament; but when the Army iterated their desire, those accused Members by leave of the House made a voluntary secession for six Months. Concerning that Order of Parliament, That the King should go to Richmond, the General desired to be excused, intreating them not to command that till things were more quiet, and that they would appoint no residence for the King nearer to London, than they would allow the Quarters of the Army to be: after which the King was conveyed to Royston, thence to Hatfield, not long after to Causam while the Army Quartered at Reading, from whence when the General with his Army marched to Bedford, the King went to the Earl of Bedford's House near Ouborn, and during all this time he was received with all possible demonstrations of love and duty, and some of his Chaplains were licensed to repair to him, and read the Book of Common-Prayer, as in former times, and the way was open to all those of his own party who desired to see him.

Eleven Members impeached by the Army.

The City of London's Militia as it was settled by Ordinance of the 4th of May, was in the managing of Presbyterians, who were very active and industrious in compleating their Companies both of the Trained Bands and Auxiliaries, which was rumoured by the Independents as a very dangerous Conspiracie against the Army, and the General in a Letter to the Parliament of the 10th of June, requested, That the Militia of the City might be put into the hands of persons better affected to the Army: Upon which Letter, the Commons upon the 22^d of July Voted the repealing the said Ordinance of the 24th of May, and a new Ordinance for reviving the old Militia was presently passed.

The unexpected news of this changing their Militia caused the City to meet in Common-Council, where because the repealing the former Ordinance was upon no other ground than the Armies desires, they resolved to Petition the House of Commons against it, which they did on the 26th of July by the Sheriffs and some of the Common-Council; but so it happened, that about a thousand Apprentices came down two or three hours hours after with another Petition, therein complaining, That to order the Cities Militia was the Cities Birth-right, belonging to them by Charters confirmed by Parliament, for defence whereof they had adventured their lives as far as the Army, and desired the Militia might be put again into the same hands in which it was put, with the Parliament and Cities consent by Ordinance of the 4th of May. Upon reading of which Petition, the Lords revoked the Ordinance of the 23^d of July, and renewed that of the 4th of May, by a new Ordinance of the 26th of July, which they presently sent down to the Commons for their consents, where some of the Apprentices in a childish heat were over-clamorous to have the Ordinance passed, refusing to let some Members pass out of the House, so that at last it passed in the affirmative about three in the afternoon, and most of the Apprentices departed; but after this some disorderly persons when the House was rising, took the Speaker and thrust him again into his Chair, detaining both him and the rest of the Members, until they enforced from them a Vote, That the King should come to London.

After this disorder the two Houses adjourned for four daies, and many private Cabals were held what to do, and those that favoured the Army went thither, so that on the fourth day both the Speakers being absent, new Speakers were chosen, the Lord Hunsdon for the Peers, and Mr. Henry Pelham, a Barrister, for the Commons, by whom it was that day voted,

1. That the King should come to London.
2. That the Militia of London should be authorised to raise forces for defence of the City.
3. That power should be given to the same Militia to chuse a General for those Forces.

It was likewise Ordered, That the aforesaid eleven Members impeached by the Army should return to their seats in Parliament. The Citizens armed with these Orders, presently proceeded to the raising of Forces, which were to be under the Command of Sir William Waller, Major General Massey, and Colonel Poyntz, who were each of them busie in lifting of Souldiers; but Waller who was a person of good experience and foresight, seeing great numbers of Reformed Officers and Souldiers lately disbanded flocking to them, advised that they should immediately seize on all the serviceable Horses in and about London, to the number of six thousand, and bring them in Tuttle-fields, where Saddles, Bridles, and Arms might be provided ready, and they would then have quickly Souldiers to mount them, and in four and twenty hours time they might have a Body of Horse to join with the City Regiments, strong enough to oppose the Army if they should attempt any thing against the Parliament and the City: and of this the Army were in great fear, but some of their friends in the Common Council did so distract their consultations, that it appeared impossible for them suddenly to raise any forces to withstand the Army, who by this time upon intelligence hereof made their approaches towards London, whereupon the Aldermen and Common Council were so terrified, that they sent to the General for a pacification, which by the consent of the Members of Parliament then with him, was granted to them upon these conditions:

1. That they should desert the Parliament now sitting, and the eleven impeached Members.
2. That they should recall their Declaration lately divulged.
3. They should relinquish their present Militia.
4. They should deliver up to the General all their Forts, and the Tower of London.
5. They should disband all the forces they had raised: And do all things else which were necessary to the Publick tranquillity: all which things none of them daring to deny, were presently ratified.

In the mean time the Lords and Commons who had left London, consulting with the General and chief Commanders of the Army, made an Order, That all Acts and Decrees that had passed on the 26th of July and since, should be accounted null and void, and that they did adhere to the Declaration of the General and Council of the Army. It was likewise decreed, that the General with his Army should march to London: and on the sixth day of August he with his Army came to Westminster, and with him the Speakers of both Houses, together with the rest of the Lords and Commons, whom he restored all to their former Seats. Both the Speakers in the name of the whole Parliament, gave solemn thanks to the General, and made him Commander of all the Forces in England and Wales, and Constable of the Tower of London: and a Months pay was likewise given as a gratuity to the Army. The next day General Fairfax, Lieutenant General Cromwel, Major General Skippon, and the rest of the Commanders with the whole Army marched through London from the Western part thereof to the Tower, and at the Tower the General made Colonel Tichburn, an Alderman of the Independent faction, to be Lieutenant of the Tower; and to humble the City, the Militia's thereof were by Order of Parliament divided, and authority given to Westminster, Southwark, and the Hamlets about the Tower, to exercise and command their own Militia's.

The Members of Parliament in this manner restored, and the Militia of London settled to the Armies good liking, the General marched out of London, and Quartered his Army in the Towns and Villages adjacent, only leaving some Regiments about Whitehall and the Mews to guard the Parliament, his head-Quarters being at Putney; and the King about the middle of August was brought to the most stately of all his Palaces, Hampton-Court.

But now the Members that were brought in by the Army, thought it necessary for the strengthening of their factions to proceed against all such of both Houses of Parliament, and others that were in any measure active in the late troubles, and therefore Serjeant Glyn was oured of his Office of Recorder of London, and one Steele a Barrister of Gray's-Inn admitted in his place, and Hollis, Waller, Clotworthy, Long, Massey, and Nicols were summoned to attend the House on the 16th of October; and the Earls of Lincoln, Suffolk,

The Affairs of Ireland.

Suffolk, and Middlesex, with the Lords Willoughby of Parham, Barkley, Hunsdon, and Maynard, were impeached of Treason, and committed to the Black-rod, and Sir John Maynard of the House of Commons, and Sir John Gray Lord Mayor of London, with four Aldermen, Adams, Langham, Culham, and Bunch, were also impeached and committed to the Tower, where we shall leave them for some time, and look to the affairs of Ireland during these occurrences.

The Irish when the cessation of Arms was concluded with them at Singison in the year 1643. seemed very desirous of a peace, but by their ill observation of the articles of cessation, their reality therein was much suspected; for they were so far from ceasing from acts of hostility during that short term of a year as they had agreed to, that they often pillaged and plundered the English, imprisoning or murdering their persons, and particularly at the Castle of Wicklow, which they surprized, and put all the men, women and children therein to the sword; yet after this Treaty, they had the confidence to send Commissioners to the King to supplicate, that before the expiration of the cessation, a peace might be concluded with them; but he referred them back to his Lieutenant Ormond, and he considering the necessity of the Kings affairs, and his present inability to prosecute that War, would willingly have reduced things to a pacification; but the Irish having correspondence with the Spanish and French upon the interest of the Romish Religion, spun out all Treaties with tedious delays, in hopes of supplies of men and money to be sent to them, so that in two years nothing was effected therein; and moreover at the same time when they were in treaty with the Lord Lieutenant, they were likewise agitating under-hand, an agreement elsewhere, pretending the Kings Commission to Authorise the proceeding: which his Majesty utterly disowned, with expressions of much indignation, that his name should be made use of to so odious a purpose, as the advancement of the Popish Religion, and the discouragement of the English Clergy in that Kingdom. While these things were transacting, matters went still worse and worse with the English, so that in confusion, all the strong places in the Province of Lemster, except Drogedah and Dublin were possessed by the Irish. One of the principal Actors in this affair was seized and taken into custody by Order of the Lord Lieutenant, who struggled as far as in him lay, to prevent further inconveniencies: but about the time that the King went to the Scots Army near Newark, he was forced to conclude a Peace with them, and upon conditions very advantageous to the Natives; but nevertheless, all of them would not submit to it: For the Popes Nuntio had drawn a great party of the most zealous of their Religion to protest against it, as a peace wherein there was not sufficient security for the free exercise of the Roman Catholick Religion. Ormond thought to profit himself of that division, and made himself ready to joyn with those that adhered to the peace to suppress the others, not doubting upon his success herein, to be master of such a force as might make the Kings rearms in England easier to him: But in the midst of all these hopes, when he was ready with a party to march to Kilkenny to joyn with his new friends, he was inform'd of a design against his person, which was related to him with such circumstances, that he was confident of the truth thereof, and if he had not retreated to Dublin, he and his party had been lost; In this extremity he thought it better to put Dublin and the Forts yet in English hands, in the Parliament of England's power, than suffer them to be possess'd by the Irish, and brought under a foreign jurisdiction, in order whereunto, he sent to two Captains of the Parliament Ships then riding near Dublin, and imparted to them his desires of complying with the Parliament, if the King would give his assent thereunto, and obtain'd of them ammunition and powder for his present supply; and in further prosecution of that overture, having the Kings commands for so doing, he capitulated with the Parliament Commissioners, and yielded up Dublin, and what remained under his Government to their authority; who immediately sent thither Colonel Jones with 1450 Horse and Foot, who on the 17th. of June took possession of Dublin, and from that time such supplies were sent to re-inforce the English, that every week produced news of Victories over the Irish.

Dublin put

Whilst the King remained at Hampton Court he seemed not at all a restrained man, but as a Prince living in the splendor of a Court, so freely to his presence were all sorts of people admitted to kiss his hands, and do all obeisances whatsoever; nor did the people from London only and the adjacent Towns resort to the King, but his Chaplains and such of his Servants who by order of Parliament had been forbidden, as Mr. Ashburnham, and Sir John Barkley, now by permission of the Army had safe recourse to him: The Marquess of Ormond likewise attended him there with an account of the Irish affairs, and was with much kindness received by him, and about the beginning of October, the Duke of Richmond, the Marquess of Hartford, the Earls of Southampton and Dorset, and the Lord Seymour, repaired to him; but the Parliament were displeased at this liberty, whereupon those Lords being told of it after two days stay at Hampton-Court returned to their Houses: On the seventh of September Propositions agreed upon by both Houses of Parliament (the Commissioners of the Kingdom of Scotland concurring also) were sent to the King at Hampton-Court, to which they requested his Answer in six dayes; The Commissioners appointed for this business by the Parliament of England were, the Earl of Pembroke, the Lord Mountague, Sir James Harrington, Sir John Cook, Sir John Holland, and Major General Brown; and for the Kingdom of Scotland, the Earl of Lawderdale, and Sir Charles Erskins. Two dayes after their arrival the King gave the Commissioners a Message in writing to the two Houses of Parliament, in answer to the Propositions, which was to this effect, (viz.)

That having perused the Propositions now brought to him, he found them the same in effect which were offer'd to him at Newcastle, to some of which as he could not consent without violation of his conscience and honour, so neither can he agree to other now; conceiving them in many respects more disagreeable to the present

1647. condition of affairs, than when they were formerly presented to him, and having seen the proposals of the Army to the Commissioners from the two Houses, residing with them, to which as he conceives, they are no strangers, so he believes they will think with him, that they much more conduce to the satisfaction of all interests, and may be a fitter foundation for lasting peace than the propositions at this time tendered to him, and therefore he propounds that Commissioners may be sent from the Parliament and the Army for a personal treaty upon them, and such others as he shall make, that a firm peace may be settled.

This answer was not very pleasing to the Parliament, and it was by many thought, though the Armies proposals had the consent of the General and his Council of Officers, yet the agitators who influenc'd the body of the Souldiery, were not assenting to them, nevertheless, the Scotch took great offence at them, and affairs were thereby much perplexed more than before; but for the better understanding of these affairs we shall relate such of the Armies proposals as were of most consequence, and most acceptable to the King.

The Armies Proposals to the King.

1. That an Act be passed to take away all coercive Power, Authority, and Jurisdiction of Bishops, and all other Ecclesiastical Officers whatsoever, extending to any civil Penalties upon any, and to repeal all Laws whereby the Civil Magistracy hath been, or is bound upon any Ecclesiastical censure to proceed (ex officio) unto any civil penalties against any persons so censured.

2. That there be a repeal of all Acts or Clauses in any Act, enjoying the use of the Common Prayer, and imposing any penalties for neglect thereof, as also of all Acts or Clauses in any Act imposing any penalties for not coming to Church, or for meeting elsewhere, for prayer, or other religious duties, exercises or ordinances, and some other provision to be made for discovering of Papists, and Popish Recusants; and for disabling of them and all Jesuits and Priests from disturbing the State.

3. That the taking of the Covenant be not enforced upon any, nor any penalties imposed upon the refusers, whereby men might be constrained to take it against their judgement or consciences; but all orders or ordinances tending to that purpose to be repealed.

4. The things here before being provided, for settling and securing the Rights, Liberties, Peace and Safety of the Kingdom, his Majesties Person, his Queen, and Royal Issue may be restored to a condition of safety, honour and freedom in this Nation, without diminution to their personal Rights, or further limitation to the Exercise of the Regal Power than according to the particulars before going.

5. That a lesser number out of the persons excepted in the two first qualifications of the Parliaments late Propositions to the King, not exceeding five for the English (being nominated particular by the Parliament, who together with the persons in the Irish Rebellion in the third qualification) may be reserved to the further Judgement of the Parliament, as they shall find cause. All other excepted persons to be remitted from the exceptions, and admitted to composition.

6. That the rates of all future compositions may be lessened and limited not to exceed the several propositions hereafter expressed respectively: That is to say, 1. For all persons formerly excepted not above a third part. 2. For the late Members of Parliament under the first branch of the fourth qualification in the propositions, a fourth part. 3. For other Members of Parliament in the second and third branches of the same qualification, a sixth part. 4. For the persons nominated in the said fourth qualification, and those included in the tenth qualification, an eighth part; and that Real debts either upon Record, or proved by Witnesses, be considered, and debated in the valuation of their Estates in all the cases aforesaid.

7. That those who shall hereafter come to compound, may not have the Covenant put upon them, as a condition without which they may not compound; but in case they shall not willingly take it, they may pass their composition without it.

8. That the Persons and Estates of all English not worth two hundred pounds in Lands or Goods, be at liberty and discharged, and that the Kings menial Servants, that never took up Arms but only attended his Person, according to their Offices, may be freed from composition, or to pay (at most) but the proportion of one years Revenue or a twentieth part.

9. That in order to the making and perfecting of compositions for delinquency at the rates aforesaid, the Rents, Revenues, and other dues and profits of all sequestred Estates whatsoever (except the Estates of such persons who shall be continued under exception as before) be from henceforth suspended and detained in the hands of the respective Tenants and Occupiers, and others from whence they are due, for the space of six months following.

10. That the faith of the Army, or other Forces of the Parliament given in Articles upon surrenders to any of the Kings party, may be fully made good, and where any breach thereof shall appear to have been made, full reparation and satisfaction may be given to the parties injured, and the person offending being found out, may be compell'd thereunto.

11. That there may be a General Act of Oblivion to extend unto all (except the persons to be continued in exception as before) to absolve from all trespasses, misdemeanors, &c. done in prosecution of the War, and from all trouble

1647. trouble or prejudice, for or concerning the same, and to restore them to all priviledges belonging to other Subjects.

The resentment of the Scots at these Proposals, which was touched at before, was chiefly manifested in a Remonstrance about this time made by the Commissioners of the General Assembly met at Edenburgh the 13th of October, to their Committee of Estates; wherein amongst other things they declared;

The Scots Remonstrance.

That his Majesty waving the Propositions of both Kingdoms, and pressing the Proposals of the Army, to be the subject of a Treaty, doth much increase the danger of Religion, seeing those Proposals, as they omit and abandon the former desires so both Kingdoms in point of Religion, so they cannot accord (as the words stand) the continuance of Prelacie, the toleration of Heresie and Sects, and the taking away the Ordinance in joyning the taking of the Covenant.

And a little further they thus express themselves;

These dangers of religion we have insisted on as being most proper for us to speak to, but not as if we were insensible of the great danger of the Kings Person, and of Monarchical Government, for preserving of which, according to our Covenant, our prayer and best endeavours shall not be wanting: and now the danger of Religion is so great, and the grounds of our Fears and apprehensions so regnant, we earnestly beseech and humbly obtest your Lordships in the bowels of Jesus Christ, and by the Vows of God which are upon you, that as your Lordships desire God and your own Consciences and posterity, may not afterwards charge upon you the Ruine of Religion, King, and Kingdoms, so your Lordships may be very tender and conscionable that no such design be entertained or get place amongst you, as tendeth to the disabling of this Church and Kingdom from an effectual prosecuting and promoting the ends of the Covenant, or to the strengthening and enabling the enemies thereof by affording them the opportunity which they wait for to disturb the peace and destroy the present Reformation: these and no better effects can be looked for, if the Army in this Kingdom, which hath been so blessed of God, and so faithful to you, shall be disbanded before this cause of God, which so much concerneth his Glory, the reformation and defence of Religion, the peace and safety of the Kingdom, the honour and happiness of the King, be settled upon a firm foundation.

The Scots Commissioners Letter to the Parliament.

The Earl of Lauderdale attended the King at Hampton-Court, and gave him full information of all these matters, and so far represented to him the uncertainty of his condition in reference to the Army, which became now by the practises of some busie men very ungovernable, that he began to incline rather to the Scots; and the Commissioners of Scotland residing at London sent Letters to the Parliament dated November the 5th in which they pressed very much that the King might come to London and treat personally with the Parliament about the things controverted; urging for reasons thereof, because the King had been taken from Holdenby against his will, and without the consent of the Parliament, by the 1647. violence of the Souldiers, and still remained under the power of an Army, not in that freedom which was thought fit for a King, treating about a business of so great moment; but if it might not be thought convenient for his coming to London, that he may continue at Hampton-Court so he be not under the power of the Army, but in such a condition that the Commissioners of both Parliaments might have a free recourse to him.

The Agitators were much alarmed at this interposition of the Scots, and their keeping up their Army in Scotland, and from hence they became more violent than before in their practises against the King, which they expressed in several proposals to the General Council of Officers: and about this time in one of their debates at a General Council at Putney it was proposed,

Whether it were safe either for the Army or the people to suffer any power to be given to the King: and in the discussion of this, it was said openly in the Council,

That they had gone about to wash a Black-moore white whether he would or not, and to set up a Power which God would destroy; that the power of Kings was a burthensome stone that would destroy whosoever should fall upon it:

Monstrous passage against the King at a meeting of the Officers at Putney.

That the reason of their distractions in Councils was from a compliance to save that Man of Blood (meaning the King) and those principles of Tyranny which God from Heaven by his many successes had manifestly declared against.

Cromwel and Ireton (who yet wished well to the King) did what they could to oppose these proceedings, but the stream was too strong against them; and the King having from time to time notice of these agitations, thought it not imprudent to provide (ere it should be too late) for his own safety, and by advice of Sir John Berkely, Colonel Legg, and Mr. Ashburnham (whom he then much trusted) he resolved to attempt to get to Fersey; and for the effecting thereof, a Ship was provided somewhere about Southampton for his transportation; but before he took this resolution, he thought fit to retract an Engagement made by Mr. Ashburnham on his behalf not to depart from the Army without their consent, which we shall relate in Mr. Ashburnham's own words:

*When the differences of the Army grew great, and an active and powerful party thereof daily menacing violence to his Majesty's person, his Majesty commanded me to retract the Engagement which I had formerly given, alledging, that Colonel Whalley affirmed to him, that the Officers of the Army had so little power to preserve him, as that they were scarce able to keep themselves from affronts; whereupon having found Colonel Whalley walking by the river side near Hampton-Court I told him that I came to withdraw that word which I had given him for his Majesty's not leaving the Army without their consent; the Colonel said, why then the King doth so too: and I told him you are to understand it so. He added, It was fairly done, and he would take notice of it accordingly.*

Ashburnham's Letter from Carrbrook to the Speaker dated November 29. 1647 Printed for R. Royton.

This being done, and the Ship and Horses and other convenience for the Kings escape in preparation, he resolved to take the first opportunity he could to get his liberty, but hearing of some passages at the meeting of the Officers at Putney on the 11th of November, tending to the destruction of his person : (where Colonel Harrison made a long narration concerning some things that lay upon his Spirit, in relation to the King, Lords, &c. saying, That the King was a man of Blood, and therefore the Engagements to him were taken off, and that they were to prosecute him : And that on the same day the Agitators of nine Regiments and the Generals Life-Guard, had prepared a Letter of the same strain by way of narrative to all the Souldiers of the Army to draw them to a general Rendezvouze to declare against any settlement with the King) he resolved that evening to remove himself, and accordingly about eight a Clock at night he got away, having Horses laid ready to receive him on the other side of the River; and about nine a Clock, whilst the Commissioners of Parliament and Colonel Whalley (who commanded the Guard) expected when he should come out of his Chamber to Supper, and wondred at his long stay, at last some of them going in, and not finding the King, they found his Cloak left there, and a Letter written with his own hand to the Commissioners, to be by them communicated to both Houses of Parliament; Cromwel about midnight dispatched a Letter to the Speaker of the House of Commons with notice of the Kings departure : In the Kings letter to the Parliament, after he had discoursed somewhat about Captivity, and the sweetness of Liberty, he protested (as before God) That he had not taken this design of withdrawing himself to disturb the publique peace, or any Treaty tending to the establishment thereof, but only to preserve his own safety, against which he understood there was a treasonable Conspiracie. But towards the end of the Letter he useth these words: Now as I cannot deny but that my personal security is the urgent cause of this my retirement, so I take God to witness, that the publique peace, is no less before mine eyes : and I can find no better way to express this my profession, (I know not what a wiser man may do) than by desiring and urging that all chief interests may be heard, to the end each may have just satisfaction; as for example, the Army (for the rest though necessary, yet I suppose are not difficult to consent) ought (in my judgment) to enjoy the liberty of their Consciences, and have an act of Oblivion or Indemnity, (which should extend to the rest of all my Subjects) and that all their Arrears should be speedily and duly paid, which I will undertake to do, so I may be heard, and that I be not hindred from using such lawful and honest means as I shall chuse : To conclude, let me be heard with freedom, honour and safety, and I shall instantly break through this Cloud of retirement, and shew myself to be Pater Patriæ.

CHARLES Rex.

The Parliament were at first surprized with this unexpected news of the Kings departure, and they dispatched Messengers to all Sea-Ports to prevent his going out of the Kingdom, and upon a rumour that he was concealed in London, they ordered, That if any man should closely detain the Kings Person, and not reveal it to the Parliament, he should be punished with the loss of his estate and life; But in the midst of this confusion, a Letter came to the Lords from Colonel Hammond Governour of the Isle of Wight, dated at Cowes the 13th of November, wherein he acquainted them, That being that morning on his way from Carisbrook Castle to Newport, Mr. Ashburnham and Sir John Berkely overtook him, and after a short discourse told him, the King was near, and that he would be with him that night; and was come from Hampton-Court, upon information, that there were some who intended to destroy him, and that he could not with safety continue any longer there, and finding his case thus, he chose rather to put himself into his hands being a member of the Army (which he said he would not have left, could he have had security to his Person) than to go to any other place; and therefore weighing the great concernment that the Person of the King was of, he resolved to use his utmost endeavours to preserve his person from any such horrid attempts, and to bring him to a place of safety : hereupon he went over the water and found the King near the water side, and by his own desire he brought him to the Isle of Wight.

The Parliament were well pleased to hear of the Kings being at Cowes, and ordered thereupon on the 16th of November,

1. That he should continue there and in the Castle.
2. That none that have borne arms against the Parliament but Inhabitants that have compounded, shall remain in that Island.
3. That no Delinquent or Foreiner should be admitted to come to him without leave of the Parliaments of England and Scotland, and that Propositions should be speedily sent to him.
4. That five thousand pounds shall be advanced for his accommodation : And,
5. That it should be considered who should attend his Person.

In the little space of time betwixt the Kings departure from Hampton-Court, and his arrival at Cows-Castle in the Isle of Wight many great distempers appeared in the Army, which had been growing some while before, on this occasion. The Agitators having some jealousy, that Cromwel and Ireton and the rest of the General Officers designed to establish the King (and being acted and guided by divers persons not of the Army that were for a total subversion of Monarchical Government) possessed the Souldiers with much prejudice against them, as that they had fallen from their Principles, and were in their proceedings false and treacherous both to the Army and Kingdom, and by several insinuations of this kind which they dispersed in printed papers they had made great factions and parties in the Army, and much divided the Souldiers from the Officers, and both Officers and Souldiers amongst themselves: these disorders and discontents were much increased by the repair of the Agitators to the head Quarters, where they assembled as a kind of Representative Council, and debated divers matters of great concernment : But the General doubting the event of these practices, and being willing to quiet the discontents then growing amongst the Souldiers, in the first place, dismissed the Agitators to their several Regiments, and sent also most of the Officers then at the Head-Quarters to their respective and particular charges, to endeavour to satisfy and compose those discontents and divisions; and about a fortnight after he contracted the quarters of the Army, intending to draw them to several Rendezvous; the first whereof was to be in a place called Cork-bush Field betwixt Hartford and Ware on the 15th day of November; But as soon as the Agitators had notice of these orders, they and their associates laboured to hinder the Execution thereof, and to draw divers Regiments from the Quarters and Rendezvous, to which they were ordered, to the first Rendezvous, near Ware; whereupon the General the day before called a Council of War at Hartford, and there agreed upon a Remonstrance, and Engagement, which was to be read at the Rendezvous at the head of every Regiment, and subscribed by the Officers and Souldiers; But the next day when the Army was drawn together, many of the Souldiers of five whole Regiments mutinied against their Officers, and wore certain marks of distinction to be known by from the rest, nor was this done in so tumultuous a manner as usually mutinies are made, but with some kind of order, and had proved very dangerous, if Cromwell and Ireton and some of the rest of the Officers had not been very active in seizing on some of the principal Mutineers, in the doing whereof, one or two were shot to death before the Troops were reduced to order and good obedience; but though the present distemper was thus ended, great animosities remained, most of the Mutineers and the Officers that favoured them, were tried at Court Martials, and cashiered, or otherwise punished, but Cromwell and Ireton, and their factions, were after this (to keep their credit with the Army) to alter their Counsels, which brought great misery to the Kingdom, as will be shewn hereafter.

Divisions happen in the Army.

Whilst the Parliament were deliberating about Propositions to be sent to the Isle of Wight to the King; a Letter came to them from him dated the 18th of November, super-scribed, To the Speaker of the Lords House, to be communicated also to the House of Commons, which was read in both Houses. In which he delivered his sense and opinion concerning many things contained in the former propositions to him, especially concerning the abolition of Episcopacy, which he said, He could not consent to either as a Christian or a King, because he looked upon it as Apostolical, and had sworn at his Coronation to maintain it; but yet he was willing that Presbyterie should be authorized for three years, and in the mean time, a free debate had between the Divines assembled at Westminster, and twenty that he should appoint for the future settlement of Church Government; he was also willing that the Parliament should dispose of the Militia, and have the choice of his Privy Counsellors during his Reign, provided they would have it by Grant in Letters Patents from him, and that it might return to his Successors: He gave touches also concerning the Payment of the arrears of the Souldiers, and the other matters, of all which he said, he hoped that he should satisfy the Parliament with his reasons, if he might personally treat with them. Therefore he desired earnestly to be admitted with honour, freedom and safety to treat personal- ly at London. The Commissioners of Scotland likewise with great vehemency press'd, That the desire of the King might be granted: inasmuch, that after a long debate, on November 26, it was concluded, that four previous propositions being drawn up into the form of Acts, should be sent to the King in the Isle of Wight to sign; which when he had signed, he should be admitted to a personal Treaty at London.

1. An Act for raising, settling, and maintaining Forces by Sea and Land within the Kingdom of England and Ireland, and Dominion of Wales, &c.

Four Acts sent to the King to be signed.

2. An Act, for recalling of all Declarations, Oaths, and Proclamations against the Parliament, or those who have adhered to them.

3. An Act, That those Peers who were made after the Great Seal was carried from the Parliament, may be made incapable of sitting in the House of Peers.

4. That Power may be given to the Two Houses to adjourn themselves as they think fit.

The first of these Acts was concerning the Militia, which devested the King, his Heirs and Successors of the power thereof for ever; for though it seem'd to be but for twenty years, yet it saith, That neither the King nor his Heirs or Successors, nor any other shall exercise any power over the Militia by Land or Sea, but such as shall act by Authority and Approbation of the Lords and Commons: It gives also an unlimited power to the two Houses to raise what Forces, & what number for Land and Sea, and of what persons (without exceptions) they please, and to imploy them as they shall judge fit, and to raise what Money they please for maintaining them. The rules of the other Acts do sufficiently discover the nature of them, and therefore we shall not enlarge upon them: The Commissioners of Scotland would in no wise give their consent that these four Acts should be imposed on the King before he treated at London; and in a large declaration they protested against it, notwithstanding which, they were sent by the Earl of Denbigh, the Lord Montague, Mr. Lisle, Mr. Goodwin, Mr. Bunkly, and Mr. Kemp, Commissioners from both Houses of Parliament, and on the 24th of December they were presented to the King at Carisbrook Castle; but he willing to satisfy all interests, and finding the Scots openly to protest against them, refused to give his assent to any Acts till the whole peace should be concluded; and the Commissioners returned to London with his denial. This refusal of his Majesties, together with some other unhappy Circumstances, gave Cromwell a suspicion that the King had some thought of Deserting the Army, and casting himself upon the Presbyterian Interest; Whereupon the Army march'd to Windsor, where the head quarters for some time remained, and the chief Officers had many consultations about the present transactions betwixt the King and the Parliament; for Cromwell and Ireton finding the Interest of the Scots was likely to be Cromwell's Speech in the House.

Thus much is related in a print, and to manifest this practice, Cromwell and Ireton being present in the House of Commons when the Kings Answer was read, Ireton said; That the King had denied safety and protection to his people by denying the four Bills; That subjection to him was but in lieu of his protection to his people, this being denied they might well deny any more subjection to him, and settle the Kingdom without him: That it was now expected after so long Patience, they should shew their resolutions, and not desert those valiant men who had engaged for them beyond all possibility of retreat, and would never forsake the Parliament, unless they forsook them first; and in the conclusion he press'd for a Question to be put, That no more addresses or applications should be made to the King. This discourse was received with much admiration of many that had observ'd the late motions of the Army, and read their declarations, who knew how contrary this his speech was from what he had often before asserted on behalf of the King, and that most of those declarations were penn'd by him, in one of which were these words: *We do clearly profess, we do not see how there can be any Peace to the Kingdom firm or lasting, without a due consideration of, and provision for the Rights, Quiet, and Immunity of his Majesties Royal Family, and his late Partakers; And in many others there were the like expressions, besides what was contained in the Armies proposals before recited; but now, Those that chose by Arms to compass their ends upon the King, began too late to discover, That the Government by an Army would introduce at last (as in the Roman State it did) the Army to be Masters of Government. This debate of non-addresses was very long in agitation, for it continued from nine in the morning till seven at night, and when the House was ready for a Question, Cromwell spake to this purpose;

That it was now expected the Parliament should govern and defend the Kingdom by their own power and resolutions, and not teach the People any longer to expect safety and government from an obstinate man, whose heart God had hardened; That those men who had defended the Parliament from so many dangers with the expence of their blood, would defend them herein with fidelity and courage against all opposition. Teach them not by neglecting your own and the Kingdoms safety (in which their own is involved) to think themselves betrayed, and left hereafter to the rage and malice of an irreconcilable enemy, whom they have subdued for your sake: and therefore are likely to find his future government of them insupportable, and fuller of Revenge than Justice, lest despair teach them to seek their safety by some other means than adhering to you, who will not stick to your selves, and how destructive such a resolution in them will be to you all, I tremble to think, and leave you to judge: And to enforce this Speech, at the later end thereof, in kind of menacing manner, he laid his hand upon his sword; and in the end, a Declaration and Votes were passed, which were after much debate assented to by the Lords, in these words.

The Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament, after many Addresses to his Majesty for the preventing and ending this unnatural War, raised by him against the Parliament and Kingdom, have lately sent four Bills to his Majesty, which did contain only matter of safety and security to the Parliament and Kingdom, referring the composition of other differences to a personal Treaty with his Majesty, and having received an absolute Negative, do hold themselves obliged to use their utmost endeavours, speedily to settle the present Government in such a way, as may bring the greatest security to this Kingdom, in the enjoyment of the Laws and Liberties thereof. And in Order thereunto, and that the Houses may receive no delay nor interruptions in so great and necessary a work, they have taken these Resolutions, and passed these Votes following, viz.

The Lords and Commons do declare, That they will make no further Addresses or Applications to the King.

The Parliament vote that no more addresses should be made to the King.

Resolved &c. By the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament, That no Application or Addresses be made to the King by any person whatsoever without the leave of both Houses.

Resolved &c. By the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament, That the person or persons that shall make breach of this Order, shall incur the penalty of High Treason.

Resolved, &c. That the Lords and Commons do declare, That they will receive no more any Message from the King; and do enjoin, That no person whatsoever do presume to receive or bring any Message from the King to both or either of the Houses of Parliament, or any other person.

Within few days after these Votes of Parliament were published, and in compliance with them, a Declaration of the General, and General Council of the Army was made, and presented to the Parliament, in the close whereof it was thus expressed:

We

Army.

We do freely declare for ourselves and the Army, That we are resolved, through the Grace of God, firmly to adhere with, and stand by the Parliament in the things Voted, concerning the King, and in what shall be further necessary for prosecution thereof, and for settling and securing of the Parliament and Kingdom, without the King, and against him or any other that shall hereafter partake with him.

The Parliament also made a publique Declaration about the beginning of February, with many invective arguments in it against the King, laying open all those errors of his Government together, which they had with virulence & malice formerly published in parcels; but the more sober part of the people knew too well by what arts the Councils which produced these actions were framed, to be perswaded by them, and so great were the discontents in the City of London and the suburbs thereof, that part of the Army was quartered about Westminster, the Mews and other places of the City for fear of Insurrections; & the month before these high transactions, 7 Lords and 13 of the House of Commons were chosen out of both Houses, to sit as a Committee in Derby-House (where the Committee of both Kingdoms of England and Scotland had sitted before) who were empowered to suppress tumults and insurrections, and to that purpose to raise forces as they saw occasion; the names of these were, the Earls of Northumberland, Kent, Warwick, and Manchester, and the Lords Say, Wharton and Roberts; and of the Commons, Sir Henry Vane Senior, Sir Henry Vane Junior, Sir William Armin, Sir Arthur Hazlerig, Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Sir John Evelyn, Lieutenant General Cromwel, Nathanael Fiennes, William Pierpoint, and Oliver St. Johns Esquires, Mr. Crew, Mr. Brown and Mr. Wallop, these were pretty equally made up of Presbyterians and Independents; but the latter seemed to be most prevalent by the influence of the Army, but they were less violent in their actions, than otherwise they would, that they might not too much exasperate the Scots, for their Commissioners had about this time, repeating the four Votes against the King, propounded to know, Whether the Houses by their Votes, That no person whatsoever do presume to make, or receive any application or address to, or from the King, would debar the Scots to make or receive any addresses to, or from him, and so put an incapacity upon him to perform Acts of Government towards them: this Message caused great debate, but at last it was consented to, That the Scotch Commissioners might make addresses to the King: But these carriages in the House of Commons made the Army and their Independent friends consult how to suppress or terrifie the Presbyterians, who in that House notwithstanding all the Military means, were yet the major part, though least active; and to effect this, about the beginning of March the Lords sent a Message to the Commons (which had been six months before rejected) to desire their concurrence to an Engagement of those Members that fled to the Army, To live and die with the Army, which after eight hours debate was carried by nine voices in the affirmative, when there were near two hundred present, after many Presbyterians, who were awed by the threats of some of the Armies Creatures, had left the House because it was late, not daring to Vote in the Negative: and it was insinuated, that if they had not approved of the Engagement, a new charge would be exhibited by the Army to the Lords against the principal opposers; which prevailed upon the weakness of many, though the wiser sort believed not they durst attempt any such thing; for many arguments at this time were published against those proceedings, very well received by the people, some of which went so high, as not to allow the Lords any Judicature over the Commons: but others agreed, That the House of Peers was a Court of Judicature, but not without the K's. special Authority granted to them either by his Writ, or by his Commission; and the Lords by the four Votes before mentioned having denied all further address or application to the King, had cut off from themselves that fountain from which they derived all their power. During these practices, to encrease and strengthen the Independent party, the discontents of the people were much augmented in all places, against the Parliament and the Army for their severity against the K.; for upon his denial to assent to the four Bills or Acts lately sent to him the Governor removed most of his Servants from him, and restrained him to the Circuit of the Castle within the Walls, and though he did it at first without the Authority of the Parliament, yet they afterwards approved of the action. Those in the Island being nearest to the view of this usage, were very much offended with it, and one Captain Burleigh lately an officer in the Kings Army and an Inhabitant there, beat up a Drum in Newport to draw some Souldiers together to rescue the King, but being too hasty in the attempt, his endeavours were frustrated, and he himself was taken prisoner, and those that took part with him suppressed: he was after some time sent in custody to Winchester, where by a special Commission of Oyer and Terminer directed to Sergeant Wild of Worcester-shire the then Chief Baron and others; he was tried and condemned of High Treason, and on the 10th of February injuriously executed for the same.

The King in this condition set forth a declaration to all his Subjects, which enlarged their compassion towards him, and in that towards the end he thus expresseth himself (viz.)

By what means or occasions I am come to this relapse in my affairs, I am utterly to seek, especially when I consider that I have sacrificed to my two Houses of Parliament (for the peace of my Kingdom) all, but what is much more dear to me than my life, my Conscience and Honour; desiring nothing more than to perform it in the most proper and natural way, A personal Treaty; but that which makes me most at a loss is, the remembering my signal compliance with the Army and their Interests, and of what importance my compliance was to them, and their often repeated profession and engagements for my just rights in general, at New-Market, and Saint Albans, and their particular explanations of these generals by their voted and revoted Proposals, which I had reason to understand should be the utmost extremity would

I have shewed the way (being both willing and desirous to perform my part in it) which is a just compliance with all chief interests: Is it plenty and happiness? they are the inseparable effects of Peace: Is it security? I, who wish all men would forget and forgive like me, have offered the Militia for my time: Is it liberty of Conscience? He who wants it, is most ready to give it: Is it the right Administration of Justice? Offices of Trust are committed to the choice of my two Houses of Parliament: Is it the Arrears of the Army? upon a settlement they will certainly be paid with much ease, but before there will be found much difficulty, if not impossibility in it.

Thus, all the World cannot but see my real and unwearied endeavours for Peace, the which, (by the grace of God) I shall neither repent me of, nor never be slackned in, notwithstanding my past, present, or future sufferings. But if I may not be heard, let every one judge, who it is that obstructs the good I would or might do; What is it that men are afraid to hear from me? It cannot be reason, (at least none will declare themselves so unreasonable as to confesse it) and it can less be impertinent or unreasonable discourses; for thereby peradventure I might more justifie this my Restraint, than the causes themselves can do; so that of all wonders, this yet is the greatest to me: But it may be easily gathered hence, how these men intend to govern, who have used me thus. And if it be my hard fate to fall together with the liberty of this Kingdom, I shall not blush for my self; but much lament the future miseries of my people, the which I shall still pray God to avert, whatever becomes of me.

During the time of these restraints, he betook himself to meditation, and then composed that most excellent Book, entituled, Εἰς τὴν Βασιλικὴν, or The Portraiture of his Sacred Majesty in His Solitudes and Sufferings.

The Parliament send Visitors to Oxford.

Oxford visited by the new Chancellor.

About the moneth of June last, the Parliament sent visitors to the University of Oxford, but their authority was not submitted to by the Members thereof, who alledged, that they could not acknowledge any visitors but the King, or his immediate substitute, without manifold perjuries: but about the 27th of April this year, The Earl of Pembroke being lately before by Vote or Ordinance of the two Houses, made Chancellor of the University, resorted thither with some others that were with him made Visitors, & being armed with the authority of a vote of the Lords and Commons to expell all such Masters, Fellows, and Officers of Colledges, as refused to submit to their power, the next day after his arrival, he went to Christ-Church Colledge, and there by force removed the Dean, and all the Canons and Students that did not comply with him, and take the Covenant, and put others in their places, and in the like manner he proceeded in the Colledges of All-Souls, St. Mary Magdalen, and New-Colledge, and in all other Colledges and Halls, by displacing those that did not submit, and putting others in their places.

This Summer the King, though a Prisoner, was as formidable as ever since the beginning of his troubles, and many of the more moderate of his Subjects of both Kingdoms, which before had joyned in Arms against him, began to look upon his estate with consideration, and they and others attempted by force to try their fortunes on his behalf: And first, an Insurrection was made in London, where some Apprentices in More-fields set upon a part of the Trained-Bands who were there keeping Guard, and over-powered them, by which success their numbers hourly increased, and they divided themselves into two or three Bodies, one whereof (which was the most considerable) having born before them an Ensign which they took from the Trained-Bands, march'd towards White-Hall, but being without any Arms but Sticks, a Troop of Horse from the Mews charg'd and disperfed them; yet at night they joyned again, and surprized Newgate and Ludgate, and shut up the Gates thereof, and seized a Drake-piece from the Lord Mayors House, which they planted within Ludgate, being animated hereunto by some of the Army, to make their Conquest of them more remarkable: The morning following, they laboured to get Arms, and brake open some Salemens Houses of Ammunition, and mastered the Magazine at Leaden-Hall, crying out in a tumultuous manner, For God and King Charles; but the next day General Fairfax entered Aldersgate with two Regiments, and marched to Leaden-Hall-street, and there charged this undisciplin'd multitude; who after a short Skirmish, were utterly disperfed, with little or no loss to the Assailants.

An Insurrection of the London Apprentices.

In South-Wales, about this time, Colonel Poyer Governour of Pembroke Castle, refused to yield up his Charge (though commanded thereunto) but the better to countenance his intention, his first pretences were to have the Arrears of him and his Souldiers paid to him, but this produced some expostulatory Letters betwixt him and the Parliament, and in the mean time he fortified the Castle, and stored it with provision for a defence, and Major General Laughorn, for the same reason, refused to disband his men, and so both resolved to run the same fortune. Laughorn surprized Tenby Castle with the Parliament Commissioners therein; and for the support of their Souldiers they raised contribution from the neighbouring parts and declared for the King, to whom one Colonel Powel, a valiant Souldier of that Countrey, joyned. Colonel Horton was sent by Fairfax Commander in chief against them, with thirty Companies of Horse, & Foot who sent out Adjutant General Fleming to charge them, who when he came near went to gain a Pass from Poyer, which he found quitted to his hands, and going on improvidently, he fell into an Ambuscade which Poyer had laid, whereby his men were disor-1648. disordered, and he with some few of them compell'd to shelter in a neighbouring Church, but perceiving himself unable to hold it out, he died (as it is thought) by his own Sword, and the rest were taken Prisoners: This success was attended with the surprize of Chepstow Castle, which was taken by Sir Tho. Keymish for the King in the Governors absence. And now Fairfax thought a greater Force was required than those with Horton to reduce South-Wales, & therefore Cromwel himself was ordered to march with a strong power into that Country; but when the news of his advance came to Laughorn, he thought it best to fight Horton before his coming, and the other as willingly marched to meet him, and near St. Ewgows on the eighth of May, the two Armies came in sight of one another, Laughorn had many more than the other, but not well armed nor disciplined, and for that he did not so soon expect Horton the conquest was the easier; for as soon as his men were charged, after a little resistance, Horton's men obtained a Victory in which they killed & took 1500 Officers, & 3000 Common Soldiers, Laughorn himself and Powel escaped by flight. Lieutenant General Cromwel entred Wales shortly after this, and stormed Tenby Castle, which yielded upon mercy, and Chepstow Castle was retaken by Colonel Ewar. and from thence he marched to besiege Pembroke Castle: Sir John Owen whilest Cromwel besieged Pembroke Castle, got together some Forces in North-Wales for the King, which the Sheriff would have suppressed, but being too weak was defeated and taken Prisoner by him; but shortly after, the same fortune befell Owen himself, by the Forces of Major General Mitton. Pembroke Town and Castle held out courageously for a long time, but at length were so distressed, that they willingly would have surrendered, if they could have had any other Conditions, than to yield upon discretion; & to force them thereunto, Cromwel gave a furious assault to the place, which the besieged resolutely endured: But upon News that Duke Hamilton was preparing to march into England with an Army of Scots, he became inclinable to give them better terms, & thereupon the Town and Castle was delivered up to him July 13th on these terms (viz.) Powell, Laughorn, Poyer, and three other principal Actors to submit to the Parliaments mercy: the other Commanders, Knights and Gentlemen, to depart the Kingdom within six weeks, for two years, the rest to return to their respective dwellings, and the Townsmen to enjoy their freedom and Liberties: Those that submitted to mercy, were afterwards tried as Traytors, notwithstanding the Princes Letter in their behalf to General Fairfax; But this cruel favour was extended towards them, that they should cast lots for their lives, and so only Poyer suffered.

April 23. The Duke of York, disguised in Womens Apparel, made his Escape from St. James's by Water, and landed at Dort in Holland, by help of one Mr. Bamfeild, sent over purposely on that design by the Queen.

Whilft some by Arms were endeavouring to free their Countrey, others attempted by Petitions in a mild way to obtain that by favour, which would not without great hazard and effusion of blood be procured by force: The County of Es- sex was the first that began, who supplicated the Parliament, That the Army might be paid and disbanded, and the King admitted to a personal Treaty. Surrey followed, and desired the like but in higher Terms, and being numerous, a quarrel was made with the Souldiers of Westminster who came to keep guard against them, words were first the weapons used, but from thence they came to blows, and some hurt was done on both sides, but night parted the Fray: The City of London succeeded next, and petitioned to the same effect, and also requested, that those Prisoners who stood committed for their former difference when the Parliament went to the Army, might be released, as shortly after they were; and upon the Cities constant profession to adhere to the Parliament, their Militia was restored, and Major General Skippon was appointed Major General thereof, and of all the Forces within the late Lines of Communication; the Lieutenant of the Tower put in by the Army, was also discharged, & Mr. West a Citizen, surrogated in his place; and because alarms of insurrections came from all parts, the General was easily intreated to draw off all the Forces he had from White-Hall and the Mues, and any other parts of London, or the late Lines of Communication, upon the Cities promise to order a Guard for the Parliament, which they readily performed, and settled six hundred pounds yearly on their Major General for his entertainment.

The Kentish men finding those of Surrey so ill treated when they came in a peaceable manner to Petition the Parliament, resolved to make their demand with Swords in their hands, and to that purpose a numerous body of them were drawn together, against whom the Lord Fairfax (for so he was now by his Fathers death) marched with six thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse, the Kentish were ten thousand, but unhappily, they parted their Forces, and sent away a Brigade to besiege Dover Castle, upon strong assurances from London, that the City would oppose the passage of the Army, if they should attempt it. Which notwithstanding, the Army advanc'd, and Major Husbands gained a passie at Northfield, and took some Prisoners; Fairfax followed, marching in a full body, expecting the Kentish (who hovered in sight of him) would have engaged, but they were not prepared for it, and so without any resistance, he came near Maidstone, in which the Kentish men were drawn up into a Body, and had planted some great Guns, and barricadoed the avenues of the Town.

Fairfax having his Army by this time encreased to ten thousand, on the second of June at seven a clock at night storm'd the Town twice, and was both times repulsed, but the third time he got entrance, yet then the fight was more perilous than before, whilst the Assailants had to do not only with those who manned the Streets, but were also galled with continual shot from the Houses, getting all by inches, nor could they master the Town till after six hours fight, and much loss on their own side: But of the Kentish, two hundred were slain, and above one thousand and three hundred taken Prisoners, with four hundred Horse, & eight pieces of Ordnance, & good Booty; & presently upon this, Rocheſter was also quit-

Neither were these endeavours for the King only confined to the Land, but a considerable party of the Navy Royal, encouraged by Captain Batten, formerly Vice-Admiral to the Earl of Warwick, was put into the power of the Prince of Wales, to be used for the Kings service; and with these the Prince with his Brother, Prince Rupert, and the Earl of Brainford, the Lords Hampton, Wilmot, Willoughby, and Culpeper, with others of Quality came into Tarmouth-road, he had on board about Two thousand Souldiers, and these he would have landed, but hearing of Colonel Scroops coming against him with a party of Horse and Foot more in number, he sailed from thence to the Downs in Kent, seizing what Merchant Ships and Goods he could meet withall; Deal Castle was at this time besieged, for relief whereof the Prince would needs attempt something, and therefore he set five hundred men ashore, who at first charged handsomly, but being over-numbred, were beaten, and several of them were slain and taken, but the rest got on board again. Soon after this, Sandwich, Deal, and Weymore Castles were yielded up, and the whole County of Kent fully subdued. Whilst the Prince anchored in the Downs, the States of Scotland invited him to them, and engaged the Publick Faith of that Kingdom for his well-being in Honour, Freedom, and Safety with them, or with their Army then in England, and to remove from them, or their Army, when, or whither he pleased. But he having written to the House of Lords for promoting the Treaty with the King, and in vain summoned the Earl of Warwick (Admiral for the Parliament) to submit to him as highest Captain-General under the King, and beginning to stand in need of Provision, went with his Fleet into Holland.

The Earl of Holland takes up Arms for the King. But the Earl of Holland being commissioned from the Prince, Heads a fresh Insurrection, just as it were in view of the Parliament at Kingston upon Thames, his chief Associates were the Duke of Buckingham, and his Brother the Lord Francis Villers, and the Earl of Peterborough. July 2. 1648 they rendezvouzed near Kingston, and had Five hundred Horse, and some Foot upon the Heath there, and from thence they marched to Darking, and would have possessed Rygate, but were prevented; for Colonel Rich and Major Gibbons marched towards them, and thereupon they retreated towards Kingston, and being closely pursued, they sent away their Foot before to secure their Retreat to the Town, and made a stand between Emel and Nonfuch Park, where the Pursuers overtook and engaged them; the fight was short and smart, wherein the Lord Francis Villiers (refusing Quarter) was slain, with a Son of Sir Kenelm Digby, and others, and the rest put to flight, and many prisoners of note were taken, the Earl of Holland got into Kingston, but staid not long there, but fled with all speed to Saint Needs in Huntingdonshire, where he was totally subdued, and taken by Colonel Scroop, and sent Prisoner to Warwick Castle, and Dalbier was there killed, but the Duke of Buckingham retired towards Lincolnshire, and escaped beyond Seas; Colchester yet held out courageously, making frequent Sallies upon the Besiegers with indifferent success, and good hopes of relief from the North; for the Parliament of Scotland had sat ever since the second of March, and were much disgusted at the English proceedings in reference to the King, which was not a little encreased by the report of their Commissioners now returned, so that notwithstanding that the Parliament of England made them fair offers concerning the payment of the money due upon account of their Auxiliary Armies both in England and Scotland, and on the four and twentieth day of July passed an Ordinance to establish the Presbyterian Government in England and Ireland, (viz.) under Classcal, Provincial, and Parochial Assemblies: yet all would not serve, for they had framed a Committee of Danger, to consult of their Affairs in relation to England; the major part whereof being of Hamilton's Faction, Voted a War. And the Scots published a Declaration, wherein they proposed:

That the King may come to London, or some of his houses near, and that with safety.
That reparation be made for his carrying away, or satisfaction by punishing them that did it.
That the Army under the Lord Fairfax be disbanded.
That Presbytery be settled, and Sectaries punished.
That all Members of the House be restored.

These actings drew many of the Kings party from the Northern parts to Edinburgh, and Wogan a Captain in the English Army marched to them with his Troop, and fifty Foot, and two Companies of Foot landed out of Ireland at Chester, and marched thither also: moreover Berwick was surprized by some Royallists, and Sir Thomas Glemham and Sir Philip Musgrave raised Forces for the King in Westmerland and Cumberland, with which they seized on Carlisle, and with them joyned Sir Marmaduke Langdale, with some Horse, being Commissioned to be General of the English Forces for the King, with which now encreased to three thousand, he coasted about the Northern Counties.

July the thirteenth, a Scotch Army under Duke Hamilton

An Ordinance for establishing the Presbyterian Government in England

Berwick & Carlisle surprized. Sir Marmaduke Langdale made Gen. of the English Forces for the King.

1648 Hamilton entred England, the Van was brought up by the Duke himself, the main Body by Major General Middleton, and the Reer by the Earl of Calender, these joyned with Langdale, and fell upon Major General Lambert near Appleby, and forced him to retire into the Town, from thence he retreated to Kirkby-Steven, and after to Bowes, leaving some of his Forces behind him, to defend the Castle, which was besieged and taken August 7. by Sir Philip Musgrave; Colonel Boynton Governor of Scarborough Castle declared for the King, and Pomfret Castle was taken by Major Morris; in Tinmouth Castle Lieutenant Colonel Henry Lilbourn declared for the King; but the Castle was suddenly retaken by Sir Arthur Hazlerig.

The Scots enter England under Duke Hamilton, and joyn with Langdale.

The Scots staid some time at Kendal in Westmerland, and Major General Lambert's Army increased daily with additional Forces, and Lieutenant General Cromwell having quieted Wales, marched to joyn with him, and in his way took Pomfret Town, but not the Castle; Hamilton left Kendal and marched into Lancashire, intending for London, which the English Army resolved to hinder, and therefore marched to Preston, where Hamilton and Langdale lay with their Forces, reported to be Twenty thousand strong, Cromwell and Lambert now joyned were reckoned to have Five thousand Horse and Dragoons, and Seven thousand Foot. August the 17th both Armies faced one another, Major Smithson commanded the Forlorn of the English, who charged furiously on the Scots Van, and routed them, and alarmed the whole Army, and so the Battels joyned on a Moor two miles East of Preston, and the fight was very hot for two hours, and then the Scots gave ground, which encouraged the English to pursue them, and that so fiercely, that they were forced to divide, one part being a Body of Three thousand Horse, moved toward Lancaster, and was followed and dispersed by Colonel Twisleton and Colonel Thornlow, (who took multitudes of them prisoners;) and the other part Horse and Foot marched over the River Rible, whom the Main of the English Army followed, and at Rible-Bridge the Scots made a stand, defending the Pass stoutly for two hours, even to the Push of Pike, but were then constrained to retire. The next morning the Scots drew up on a Hill on the side of Preston, whence being forced by the English, they fled in great disorder to Wiggon, which they plundered, and the next morning after marched towards

The Scots Army defeated by Lieutenant General Cromwell.

Warrington (the English pursuing all the way) near Warrington the Scots taking advantage of a Pass, made another halt, but were again beaten with the loss of a Thousand men, and were pursued to the very Bridge, where the Foot in number 4000. being deserted by the Horse, laid down their Arms and submitted to mercy; Hamilton got away with Three thousand Horse to Nantwich, where the Countrey being up in Arms, seized upon most of them; Lieutenant General Cromwell marched towards Cumberland, to meet Monroe, who was marching with a Reserve of Scots, giving order to all the Parliament Commanders in these Counties to follow the flying Scots, by some of whom Major General Middleton, who commanded Four hundred Horse, was defeated and taken prisoner, and the rest dispersed: Hamilton himself was met with at Utoxeter, and made to submit to mercy by the Lord Gray of Groby, 1648 who sent him prisoner to Ashby de la Zouch; in this days Fight, the English took more prisoners than their whole Army amounted to. The Scots Ensigns, Cornets, and Colours taken were afterward hung up in Westminster-Hall; Sir Marmaduke Langdale was apprehended in an Inn: Cromwell improved his success, and came to Durham, to look out Monroe, supposed to be about Six thousand strong; but the stricter Presbyterian party in Scotland having now recovered the Sword, ordered him to return, which he obeyed more for fear of the English, than obedience to them, and joining with the Earl of Lanerink, both together they made Eight thousand Horse and Foot; to oppose whom, the Anti-Hamiltonians provided an Army, whereof the Earl of Argyle was Commander in Chief, and David Leslie Lieutenant General; but being too weak to fight them, Cromwell entred Scotland by their invitation, and to smooth his way, he published the following Declaration:

Hamilton taken prisoner by the Lord Grey of Groby.

Cromwell enters Scotland.

Whereas we are marching with the Forces of the Parliament of England into the Kingdom of Scotland, in pursuance of the remaining part of the Enemy who lately invaded the Kingdom of England, and for the recovery of the Garrisons of Berwick and Carlisle: These are to declare, That if any Officer or Souldier under my command shall take or demand any moneys, or shall take any Horses, Goods, or Victuals without Order, or shall abuse the people in any sort, he shall be tried and punished with Death by a Court Martial.

His Declaration.

To him Argyle, Lowden, Leven, and other of the Scotch Nobility repaired, and contracted with him for subduing of the publick Enemy: and so much feared was he in Scotland, that the following Agreement was consented to by them.

First, That the Army under Argyle, and the other under Lanerick and Monroe, with all the Forces in any of the Garrisons in Scotland, be disbanded, and Barwick and Carlisle be delivered to the English.

Secondly, That the settlement of Religion at home, and promoting Reformation abroad, be ordered by the determination of the General Assembly, & all Civil differences be referred to a Parliament speedily to be called.

Thirdly, That no party that were in the last Engagements against England, be of the new Parliament, or of the General Assembly.

And so he returned into England after he had been invited to Edinburgh to Feasts and Banquets, and highly carested by the States of Scotland with all expressions of Honour. And in Yorkshire as he marched homewards, he was desired to reduce Scarborough and Pomfret Castles, which was then promised, but not till some time after effected; Colchester had endured a tedious Siege, and was now brought to such a scarcity of Provision, that the besieged had not horse-flesh enough to serve them one day (that being the Food which they had fed on almost a fortnight, and not purchased without much blood spilt in divers Sallies for dead Horses,) and now perceiving all hopes of succour utterly frustrated, they were necessitated to yield upon these Conditions following:

The Common Souldiers to depart with Life, and the Officers to remain at the Generals disposal, and he 1648 to exempt from mercy whom he pleased; the remainder to be remitted to the Parliaments mercy, and the Town to raise fourteen thousand pounds to preserve it from plunder.

The prisoners of Quality were the Earl of Norwich, Capel, and Loughborough, eleven Knights, twelve Colonels, eight Lieutenant Colonels, nine Majors, thirty Captains, and sixty five Gentlemen, the private Souldiers were about three thousand; three of the Knights were condemned to die by a Court-Marshal (viz.) Sir Charles Lucas, Sir George Lisle, and Sir Bernard Gascoin a Florentine; but the last was reprieved because a Stranger, and the other two shot to death, the first having (as the General said in his Letter to the Parliament) falsified his word with him; the second directed the shooting of poysoned Bullets, against the Laws of Arms.

And so General Fairfax, after much loss of time and men, and difficult service for a quarter of a year, took possession of the Town of Colchester, August the 27th. after which he marched up and down the Counties of Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and Hartford to settle peace, and visit the Garrisons, and then returned to St. Albans, his Headquarters. And thus we have briefly described the Military Actions of this year; and whilst the Army was busied in fighting, the Parliament were taken up with Petitions from the several Counties for a Treaty with the King; the City of London among the rest had preferred one, and withall desired, as in one before, the release of their imprisoned Citizens, which were the Aldermen Langham and Bunch, and Sergeant Glyn their Recorder, to which the Houses readily consented, and likewise repealed their Orders against the Earls of Suffolk and Middlesex, and the Lords Berkley, Hunsden, Maynard, Willoughby of Parham, and the eleven Members, for they became very well inclined to Peace with the King, now they were freed from the insolency of the Army by their distance from them, and a Treaty was resolved on, and the Earl of Middlesex, Sir John Hipsley, and Mr. Bulkley were sent to the King, to let him know this their Resolution; who returned with his ready compliance thereunto; upon which the Parliament Voted,

The Vote of Non-Addresses recalled. That the Votes of Non-Addresses should be recalled. That such persons as he should send for, as necessary to him in the Treaty, be admitted. That he be in the same state of freedom as at Hampton Court, with such Servants as he desired. That five Lords and ten Commons be chosen Commissioners to Treat with the King, and the place to be Newport in the Isle of Wight. And that the King be admitted to invite the Scots thercunto to Treat only concerning that Kingdom.

Which Votes were sent down to the King, who was to Treat personally with these Commissioners, (viz.) the Earls of Northumberland, Salisbury, Pembroke and Middlesex, and the Lord Say, for the House of Lords; and the Lord Wainman, Mr. Pierpoint, Sir Henry Vane the younger, Sir Harbottle Grimston, Sir John Potts, Mr. Brown, Mr. Crew, and Mr. Bulkley for the House of Commons, and with these were joyned Mr. Hollis and Mr. Glyn.

Munday September the eighteenth the Treaty began: The propositions were in number eleven.

1648 The first was for calling in all the Kings Declarations, which he assented to, with this Proviso, That neither of this Concession, nor any other of his advantage should be taken, unless the whole were concluded.

The second Proposition was, concerning the settlement of the Church, in reference to which he condescended to settle the Directory, and to pass an Act to confirm the Assembly, and to establish the Presbyterian Government for three years, reserving liberty to himself and his party to use the old Form: But would not agree to the utter abolishing of the Episcopal Hierarchy, nor the selling of their Lands.

The third Proposition was, for settling the Militia in the hands of the Parliament for twenty years solely; to which he assented.

Likewise to the fourth, for making void the Cessation of Ireland, and remitting the Government of it both Civil and Military to the Two Houses at Westminster.

And to the fifth and sixth, for nulling all Honours and Titles since the carrying away of the Great Seal, and for payment of publick Debts.

The seventh Proposition concerning Delinquents, to whom the Parliament proposed great severity; the King moderated thus, he was contented that they should be fined, and prohibited access to Council or Court without the Parliaments consent, that they should be deprived for three years of their right of Sitting in Parliament, and brought to Trial (if the Two Houses should think fit) to suffer according to the merit, whereof they should be legally convicted: But he would by no means bear of branding them with Treason, nor taking away their lives or possessions from any, but such as after a legal Tryal should be found guilty of breaking the established Laws of the Land.

The eighth, for empowering the Parliament to confer all Officers of the Kingdom, and the chief Magistrates for twenty years, he agreed to: And to

The ninth, for confirming the new Great Seal, with all Grants and Commissions sealed by it. And to

The tenth, for ratifying all Priviledges, Grants and Charters, and Immunities to the City of London, with power to dispose of the Tower, and their own Militia to be confirmed to them: and the Citizens to be exempted from Military service out of the Liberties of the City, unless at the Parliaments appointment.

The last was for total exterminating of the Court of Wards, which was also consented to, so as an hundred thousand pounds might be yearly paid to the King by way of compensation for it.

The Earl of Ormond had gotten back into Ireland, and raised Forces there in opposition to the Parliament by the Kings Commission, but the King assured the Commissioners, That if the Treaty should take effect, the Irish affairs should be managed at the discretion of the Houses only.

The King having thus far complied with the Parliament, they likewise at his desire Voted:

1648

That he be in Honour, Freedom and Safety, according to the Laws.

Secondly, That he have his Revenue as before, excepting the deductions for such Forts and Garrisons as were of old accustomed to be maintained.

Thirdly, That he have compensation of the Court of Wards.

Fourthly, That an Act of Oblivion be past with such exceptions and limitations as should be agreed on by both Houses,

The Officers of the Army have many meetings about a new frame of Government.

Some thought now, that the King and Parliament would have united, but it was too late for those that might have saved the King before, if they would, to pretend to help him now, when it was out of their power. But whilst the King was treating for Peace at the Isle of Wight with the Commissioners of Parliament, the Officers of the Army were contriving at Windsor the destruction of both, and many private meetings were had both there and at London, by the Levellers, and some of their Independant Friends about a Frame of Government to be represented to them, the result whereof was,

That some persons should be chosen by the Army to represent the whole Body, and that the well-affected in every County (for so they distinguished their Party) should chuse one person to represent them: and those to meet at the Head-Quarters.

That these persons ought not to exercise any Legislative power, but only to draw up the Foundations of a just Government, and to propound them to the well-affected people in every County to be agreed to; which Agreement should be above Law, and therefore the bounds, limits, and extent of the peoples Legislative Deputies in Parliament, contained in the Agreement should be drawn up into a formal contract, to be mutually signed by the well-affected people, and their said Deputies upon the days of their Elections respectively.

To prevent confusion, the Parliament may not be by force immediately dissolved, but the day of its dissolution be inserted in the Agreement, by virtue whereof it should be dissolved.

That this way of Settlement should be mentioned in a Remonstrance from the Army.

When these Proposals were transmitted to the Army, the matter thereof was very well approved of by the chief Officers; but Colonel Harrison told the Agents imployed to them:

Colonel Harrison's Speech to the Agents

That they could not stay so long from going to London, as to perfect an Agreement for such a Settlement, and without their speedy going (said he) we are unavoidably destroyed; we fully understand that the Treaty betwixt the King and the Parliament is almost concluded upon, at the conclusion whereof we shall be commanded by King and Parliament to disband, the which if we do, we are unavoidably destroyed for what we have done already; and if we do not disband, they will by Act of Parliament proclaim us Traytors, and declare us to be the only hinderers of settling peace in the Nation, and then we shall never be able to fight with both Interests of the King and the Parliament. So that he and the Officers with him declared, the first thing the Army was to do, was, to cut off the Kings head, and force and thoroughly purge (if not dissolve) the Parliament. The Agents did not disapprove of this horrid resolution, but pressed against the doing it without first giving security to the Nation (to use their own words) for the future settlement of their Liberties and Freedoms, especially in frequent, free, and successive Representatives. The dire effects of these Councils will follow in the sequel of this History: in prosecution whereof, the Army sent up a Petition to the Parliament to try their tempers:

For a scrutiny to be taken for discovery of the Con-trivers and Actors in the late bloody Wars, and that speedy Justice should be done upon them. That the same fault may have the same Justice and punishment in the person of the King or Lord, as in the person of the poorest Commoner: that such as speak or act in the Kings behalf (till he be acquitted of shedding innocent blood) be proceeded against as Traytors. When this would not do, they framed their Remonstrance in bolder terms, which they sent to the Parliament by six Officers inclosed in a Letter from the General, dated the 10th of November.

The Army petition for Justice against the King.

Requiring, That the King be brought to Justice as the capital cause of all the evils of the Civil war.

Their Remonstrance to the same effect.

Secondly, That a peremptory day be set for the summoning the Prince of Wales, and Duke of York, and if they refused to come, to declare them incapable of Government or succession, and to stand exiled as Traytors; and if they rendered themselves, yet to be proceeded against for satisfaction, and that the Revenues of the Crown be sequestered.

Thirdly, That publick Justice be done against the Actors in the late Wars.

And lastly, They concluded, desiring their Arrears, with the old pretence of easing the Countrey of free Quarter; and request that a period may be put to this Parliament, and a care taken to elect new Representatives, and that no King should be admitted for the future, but upon election of and upon trust for the people, to be limited by the Representatives, &c.

In the mean time, General Fairfax commanded Colonel Hammond by his Letters to deliver up Col. Ever, his charge of the Kings Person to Colonel Ever, by put in whom the King was conveyed out of the Isle of Wight to Hurst-Castle the 30th of November. But the Parliament declared their ill resentment of this action, and voted, That the seizing upon the person of the King, and carrying him prisoner unto Hurst-Castle, was without the advice and consent of the Houses.

And thus the Treaty was violently broken off, yet the Lords Voted the Kings Concessions a sufficient ground for Peace, and forthwith adjourned, and the major part of the Commons Voted the same. But the Army being now come up to London, and quartered at White-hall, S. James's, the Mews, and several Villages near, they resolved to hinder these proceedings, and therefore discharged the Trained Bands from being a Guard to the Parliament, and ordered Colonel Prides and Riches Regiment to supply their places, by whom above forty Members coming to the House, were seized and committed to Guards in several Inns in Westminster, and the parts adjoining; and not satisfied with this, they accused Major General Brown, and ninety odd Members for inviting in the Scots the last Summer, and therefore required they might be excluded the House: At these proceedings the Commons

Divers Members of Parliament excluded by the Army.

1648 Commons (being displeased) adjourned for four or five days, in which space the Army was busied in compleating their Model of Government, where-in it was amongst other things proposed :

That the present Parliament should be dissolved the last of April next: And that the Representatives of the whole Nation should consist of three hundred persons, half which number should suffice to make an Act of Law, and that in the Intervals of Parliament a Council of State should govern.

And this Declaration, together with half a score of Modifications, they styled, The Agreement of the People; which was afterwards presented to the House of Commons by Sir Hardress Waller, and sixteen Officers, when the House new moulded by the Army, met again, (for besides those that they forced out, a great number absented themselves) and to testify their submission to the Army, they restored the Votes of Non-Addressees, and repealed those which approved of the Kings Concessions; and Voted, That no Message be received from the King upon pain of Treason; That the General should take care of his person: and that the Council of War should draw up a Charge of Treason against him; which manifested that impious intention to destroy him, which before they had determined: But before this open and avowed acting, some secret practices were designed upon his Life, as appeared in the Letters and Informations of one Dawcet and Osburn against Captain Rolph, who commanded a company of the Guards about the King, whom Osburn particularly accused to have projected his death by poyson or pistol, and not without the privity of Colonel Hammond, and some Chiefs of the Army that incited him thereunto: and though great endeavours were used to obstruct any proceedings in the business, yet the clamour of people was so great, that they were forced to commit him to prison, and subject him to Tryal; but by the stickling of some of the prevailing party in his behalf, the Indictment against him was found Ignoramus by the Grand Jury of Hampshire, at Southampton or Winchester, by the advice of Maynard of Council with him, because there was but one Witness to each Fact, as in cases of Treason there ought to have been two.

Decemb. 10th. the King was brought from Hurst-Castle with a strong Guard to Winchester, next day to Farnham, and the next day to Windsor: In the mean time the Two Houses differed among themselves; the Commons asserted, That it is Treason for the King to levie War against the Commonwealth, and drew up an Ordinance for his Trial as a Traytor; and the Lords denied that the King can commit any Treason against the Commonwealth, and therefore rejected the Ordinance of the Commons, and declared, That no Act of the Commons is binding without their consent; and adjourned for a fortnight; upon which the Commons Voted, That all Members and others appointed to act in any Ordinance with Peers, are impowred and enjoyned to sit, act, and execute, notwithstanding the Peers joyned not therein; and so earnest were both the Commons and the Army about the Kings Trial, that the Queen desiring to see her Husband before his Arraignment, could not obtain a Pass for her secure coming and returning.

January 6th. the Ordinance for the Kings Trial was turned into an Act of the Commons alone, and ingrossed, and Proclamation was made two days after in Westminster-hall, Cheapside, and the old Exchange, for Witnesses to come in against him, and Commissioners were appointed about it; and now a suborned Faction in the City petitioned the House for Justice against the King. And Hillary Term beginning January the twenty third, was adjourned till fourteen days after, to give place to the proceedings against him.

January 19th the King was brought from Windsor to St. James's House, and all things were prepared for his fatal Tragedy, in which the Commons proceeded, notwithstanding the dissent of the House of Lords, and the Remonstrance of the Parliament of Scotland, now convened against it:

The Act of Parliament which directed the Trial of the King, appointed a new Tribunal, called the High Court of Justice, who were impowred to convene, hear, judge and execute Charles Stewart King of England. His Title in Writs they abrogated, and ordered the Great Seal of England to be broken, and a new Seal to be made with the Cross for England, and the Harp for Ireland thereon, and these words, The Great Seal of England, and on the Reverse, the picture of the House of Commons sitting, with these words, In the first year of Freedom by Gods blessing restored, 1648.

Thus this Great, though the unfortunate Prince, Monarch of Three mighty Kingdoms, was now, through the inscrutable Providence of the Omnipotent disposer of all things, subjected to the miserable condition of a calamitous prisoner to his own Subjects, by whom he was tried, condemned, and lastly beheaded, under a form of Justice. Some of the more immediate and inconsiderable Actors in this horrid Murther, passed the hands of the Executioner, as you will see hereafter: but the more remote and eminent Regicides, who only can be said to have kill'd the King, have escaped their Judgement in this World, being to receive their Doom in the World to come.

Of his Taxations.

nion, but a poor Exchequer, which was the occasion that his Taxations were more frequent than before in his Fathers Reign.

In his first year, the Parliament at their first Session granted him two Subsidies from Protestants, and four from Popish Recusants, and from the Clergy three; and till the Parliament took order therein, he continued the Levies as in his Fathers time of Tonnage, Poundage, and other fums by way of Impost upon Merchandise Imported and Exported.

In his second year he engaged in a War with France, and for the relief of Roche, he raised neer two hundred thousand pounds by Loan.

In his third year, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, they gave him five Subsidies:

In his sixth year, he revived an ancient * Custome or Usage, by which all that were qualified by the Law for Knighthood, were to take upon them that Order, or to make Fine for respite of the same, whereby an hundred thousand pounds was brought into the Exchequer.

In his ninth year, by the advice of his Attorney-General, and other his Council learned in the Laws,

1648 The King is brought to Saint James's. A High Court of Justice erected for the Trial of the King. A new Great Seal made.

1648 Laws, several Writs were issued under the great Seal of England; for the charging of the Ports, Towns, Cities, Boroughs and Counties of this Realm respectively, to provide and furnish Ships for the defence of the King and the Kingdom, whereby great sums were raised. And in a Parliament holden in Ireland, the Deputy obtained some Subsidies for the payment of the Army of that Realm, and the encrease of his Majesties Revenue there.

In his sixteenth year, the Earl of Strafford obtained of the Irish Parliament the grant of four Subsidies: and the Convocation of Bishops in England, gave him an ample Benevolence of four Shillings in the pound for six years to be assessed on all the Clergy in England, towards the carrying on of a War with Scotland then begun.

And in the same year, the Parliament of England then assembled, granted to him four entire Subsidies for relief of his Army then raised against the Scots, and for relief of the Northern parts of the Kingdom, then much burthened by an Army of the Scots quartering in those parts, who imposed great Taxes on the Inhabitants where they lay for their maintenance.

In his seventeenth year, the same Parliament granted two Subsidies for the further relief of his Majesties Army, and the Northern parts of the Kingdom; and likewise a Subsidie of Tonnage and Poundage, and other sums of Money payable upon Merchandise exported and imported, from the twenty fifth of May to the fifteenth of July following; and when that Act was expiring, they granted another for the same duties from the fifteenth of July to the tenth of August following; and by five other subsequent Acts, the Parliament granted the like Subsidie and Imposition upon Merchandise to the third of May, 1642. And the said seventeenth year, several sums of money were by Act of Parliament charged upon persons according to their Ranks, Dignities, Offices, Callings, Estates and Quality, by way of Pole, for the speedy disbanding two Armies then in the bowels of the Kingdom.

This year also a Contribution and Loan was granted for the relief of Ireland, where a bloody Rebellion had broken forth the year before.

And in his eighteenth year, an Act passed for raising and levying of moneys for the necessary defence and great affairs of the Kingdoms of England and Ireland, and for the payment of Debts undertaken by the Parliament.

These were all the Taxations either by Loan or otherwise raised by Royal Authority during the Kings Reign. But the War which the Parliament raised without his Authority and against it, was supported and maintained by great and vast sums of money illegally levied on the Subjects by Contribution, Assessments and Excise, which cannot be properly here inserted; and we wish the memory of such unjust proceedings, may be for ever effaced.

Of the Laws made in his Reign.

HAVING under the head of Taxations set down such Acts of Parliament as granted money to the King, we shall herein make no further mention of them in the enumeration of the other Laws enacted during his Reign.

In the Parliament holden in his first year, an Act was made for punishing abuses on Sundayes; And,

An Act to enable the King to make Leases of Lands parcel of his Dutchy of Cornwal; And,

An Act for easy obtaining Licenses of Alienation, and in the pleadings in the Exchequer or elsewhere; And,

An Act for restraining of ill behaviour in Inns and Ale-houses.

In his third year,

The Petition of Right was enacted, and the several Statutes following, (viz.) An Act for reformation of divers abuses committed on the Lords day, commonly called Sunday.

An Act to restrain the passing or sending any to be popishly bred beyond the Seas

An Act for the better suppressing unlicensed Ale-house-keepers.

An Act for continuance and repeal of divers Statutes.

An Act for establishing of the Estates of the Tenants of Bromfield and Yale in the County of Denbigh, and for the Tenures, Rents and Services thereon reserved, according to a late composition made for the same.

In the 16th 17th. and 18th. years of his Reign, the Laws hereafter mentioned were made, whereof such of them as are since repealed, we note with Rep. and such as being but temporary Laws, and are since expired, we note Exp.

An Act for preventing of inconveniencies happening by the long intermissions of Parliament, Exp.

An Act whereby the Lord Admiral and others by his Authority may raise and impress Mariners, Sailers and others for the present guarding of the Seas, and necessary defence of the Realm, Exp.

An Act concerning the Limitations, and abbreviation of Michaelmas Term.

An Act declaring, That this Parliament shall not be dissolved, prorogued, or adjourned; but by Act of Parliament, Exp.

Affairs of the Church in His time.

THE King was a zealous Protestant according to the profession of the Church of England ; for the peace and defence whereof, he laboured much all the time of his Reign, though the malice and ignorance of the Enemies thereof much obstructed his pious endeavours.

In his first Year, some differences were revived about the Tenents of Arminius, which began in the latter end of his Fathers Reign, and were heightened by the Commons House of Parliament then newly assembled, the Members whereof generally favoured the oppugners of those points ; and the controversie was the more remarkable, because it divided the Bishops themselves ; but those of that Order that were reputed Arminians, did not own themselves to be such, but maintained, That what they held, was ever the Doctrine of the Church of England contained in the seventeenth Article thereof, and the like was asserted by those that opposed those Tenents, so that both made claim to that Article, and about the Exposition thereof, and the consequences from thence derived, the peace of the Church was not a little disquieted: to put some stop to this growing evil, a Conference was this year kept in York House, betwixt Dr. Buckbridge Bishop of Rochester, and Dr. White Dean of Carlisle on the one side, and Doctor Morton Bishop of Coventry, and Doctor Preston on the other, about these points, and chiefly about the possibility of one elected to fall from Grace ; and the success of this and of another in the same kind answered neither the intention nor expectations of such as procured them ; but the King taking notice of these Arminian Controversies, by his Declaration a while after published, forbade any in preaching or writing to meddle with those high points, as tending more to destruction than edification of the people.

In his fourth Year, at the confirmation of Mr. Richard Mountague to be Bishop of Chichester, which was in Bow-Church, according to the usual custom in such cases, all persons were summoned to appear, to shew cause why the Elect there present should not be confirmed ; whereupon one William Jones a Stationer of London excepted against Mr. Mountague as unfitting for the Episcopal Office, because lately questioned by the Parliament for a Book he had writ, wherein they said were many dangerous opinions of Arminianism and Popery, yet upon examination thereof, some sharp and invective expressions were the greatest offences in it ; but exceptions were taken at the Exceptions of Jones,

Jones, though the reason thereof appears not otherwise than what is alledged in the Record by Dr. Rives (substitute at that time for the Vicar-General) Quod nullo modo legitime comperuit, nec aliquid in hac parte juxta Juris exigentiam diceret, exciperet, vel apponeret, so that the Bishop was confirmed, and immediately after he sued out a Pardon under the Great Seal of England for all Errors before committed, either in Speaking, Writing, or Printing, whereof he might hereafter be questioned.

The contest between the Jesuits & Secular Priests.

In the same year one Richard Smith a Secular Popish Priest, titular Bishop of Calcedon, in partibus Infidelium, acted and exercised Episcopal Jurisdiction in Lancashire, with his Mitre and Crotier, conferring Orders on divers Priests, and in granting and administering confirmation, which much disturbed the Peace of the Church of England, and made disorders amongst their own party; for Nicholas Smith a Jesuite wrote bitterly against him, urging, that a Bishop over the English Catholics was useless in Times of Persecution (as he called it) there being but two peculiar performances of a Bishop, (viz.) Ordination and Confirmation; for the former it might be supplied by foreign Bishops, since the English Papists were most bred abroad; and for the latter he offered out of Thomas Aquinas and other Divines, that by Commission from the Pope, a Priest, though no Bishop, might confirm; he added likewise, that a Bishop was burthensome to the English Church, considering that the present pressures of those of that Religion needed now no unnecessary expences.

These and the like Objections were answered by Doctor Killison Rector of the English Colledge at Dorway, and many other Secular Priests, which occasioned great animosities betwixt the Regular and Seculars; but the King to shew his dislike of the Bishops presumptions, by his Proclamation, promised an hundred pounds to be paid to any that should apprehend him, besides all the profits that accrued to the Crown, from the person who entertained him, which frightened him into France, as was mentioned before in the History.

Bishop Davenant questioned, and Thorn and Ford expelled the University for offending against the Kings Declaration.

In his sixth Year Davenant Bishop of Salisbury was questioned for breach of the Kings Declaration, by falling on some points in his Sermon before the King touching the Arminian Controversies which were forbidden therein; but by his modest and discreet Answers, he was acquitted; though in the same year Thorn and Ford two Masters of Arts of Oxford, were expelled the University for being judged offenders against the same Declaration.

The Controversie about the Sabbath revived.

In his ninth Year the Sabbatarian Controversie was revived by one Theophilus Bradbone a Minister of Suffolk, which first began in the year 1595. occasioned by a Book put forth that year by one Dr. Bound; for before that time (as in Geneva at this day) no civil Recreations were denied to any of the people at such times as they were not exercised in their publick Devotions at Church; in Bounds Book these following Opinions were maintained.

The sum of Doctor Bounds Book concerning the Sabbath.

1. That the Commandment of sanctifying every seventh day, as in the Mosaical Decalogue, is moral and perpetual.

2. That whereas all other things in the Jewish Church were taken away (Priesthood, Sacrifices and Sacraments) this Sabbath was so changed, that it still remaineth.

3. That there is great reason why we Christians should take our selves as straightly bound to rest upon the Lords Day, as the Jews were upon their Sabbath, it being one of the moral Commandments, for before all were of equal Authority.

4. The rest upon this day must be a notable and singular rest, a most careful, exact, and precise rest, after another manner than men are accustomed.

5. Scholars on that day are not to study the Liberal Arts, nor Lawyers to consult the Case, nor peruse mens Evidences.

6. Sergeants Apparitors, and Sumners to be restrained from executing their Offices.

7. Justices not to examine causes for the conservation of the Peace.

8. That ringing of more Bells than one that day is not to be justified.

9. No solemn Feasts, nor Wedding-dinners to be made on that day (with permission notwithstanding of the same to Lords, Knights, & Gentlemen of Quality.)

10. All honest Recreations and pleasures lawful on other days (as shooting, fencing, bowling,) on this day to be forborn.

11. No man to speak or talk of pleasures, or any other worldly matter.

The Doctrine was at first very well received, because of the Piety of such persons as maintained it in their publick Writings; but a while after it was opposed, as galling mens necks with a Jewish yoke against the liberty of Christians; and further, it was urged, that Christ as Lord of the Sabbath had removed the rigour thereof, and allowed men lawful Recreations.

That this Doctrine puts an unequal lustre on the Sunday, on set purpose to eclipse all other Holy days, to the derogation of the Authority of the Church, and that this strict observance was set up out of faction to be a Character of difference to brand all for Libertines who did not entertain it, so that Archbishop Whitgift called in all such Books as were written on this Subject. But Bradbone who revived this Matter at this time was questioned for it by the High Commission Court, whose well tempered severity so prevailed upon him, that submitting himself to a private Conference, and perceiving the unsoundness of his own principles, he became a convert, conforming himself quietly to the Church of England ever after.

Bradbone retracts his opinion of the Sabbath.

Just in this conjuncture of time the King being troubled with Petitions on both sides by the strict and the more moderate observers of the Lords Day, thought good to follow his Fathers Royal Example upon the like occasion in Lancashire, where in his progress in the Fourteenth year of his Reign, taking notice that some Preachers perswaded the people to so rigorous observance of the Sabbath, that it was unlawful therein to dress meat, to sweep their houses, kindle the fire, or the like, and that the Popish Priests took advantage thereby to pervert many to Popery, perswading them that the Protestant Religion was so rigorous, that no lawful liberty was allowed therein, the year after he set forth a Declaration to this effect:

That for his good peoples lawful Recreations, His pleasure was, that after the end of Divine Service, they should not be disturbed, letted, or discouraged from any lawful actions, such as Dancing either of men men or women, or for men leaping, vaulting, or any such harmless Recreations: nor from having May-Games, Whitsun-Ales, or Maurice-Dances, and setting up of May-Poles, or other sports therewith used, so as the same be had in due and convenient time, without impediment, or let of Divine Service, and that Women should have leave to carry Rushes to the Church for decorating of it, according to their old custom: withall prohibiting all unlawful Games to be used on the Sundays only, as Bear-baiting, Bull-baiting, Interludes, and Bowling (at all times in the meaner sort of people prohibited.)

In his tenth year, by the procurement of Land Bishop of London, all such Improvements in Ireland restored to the Church, and at a Convention in that Kingdom, concurrent with a Parliament then in being, the 39 Articles of the Church of England were there received for all to subscribe thereunto.

In his thirteenth year, the same Bishop of London, being some time before translated to the See of Canterbury, and himself a strict observer of the Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, did in his Metropolitan Visitation more vigorously than before press conformity thereunto, which occasioned many differences in the Church about Divine Worship, (viz.) about the Holiness of Churches, bowing at the Name of Jesus, and the manner of Adoration in Gods House, which last was by the Conformists practised to be towards the Communion Table, as the most remarkable place of God's presence, others would not admit of the name of Table, but have it Altar; and then a great Controversie was raised about the placing of it, some would have it constantly fixed with the sides East and West, ends North and South, and a gradual advance next the East Wall of the Chancel, citing a Canon, and the practice of the Kings Chappel for the same; whilst others pressed Queen Elizabeth's Injunctions, (allowing it at other times to stand in the Chancel) but to be set in the Body of the Church when the Sacrament is celebrated thereon: Many were the Books writ pro and con of these matters, to the great Rent and Division of the Church; and such heat about this Altar, and other differences on both sides was kindled, that had almost sacrificed their mutual charity thereon: Amongst the Writers in the Controversie of this time, there were three that writ most bitterly against Bishops, and the established Discipline of the Church, Mr. Henry Burton a Minister, Dr. John Bastwick a Doctor of Physick, and Mr. Will. Prynne a Barrister of Lincolns-Inne, who were severely censured for their Offences, as hath been before mentioned in the History of the Kings Reign.

In the same year, or the year after, the Book of Service or new Liturgy was sent into Scotland to be used in that Kingdom, the circumstances whereof, and the miseries thereby occasioned, are likewise related in the foregoing History.

In his fourteenth year, on the thirteenth of April a Parliament assembled at Westminster, and with the Parliament a Convocation began, but the Parliament being after a Month dissolved, the King nevertheless continued the Convocation under the Title of a Synod, which was authorized under the Great Seal of England. The Acts of this Synod were scarce any time in use, so that we shall here only insert the Titles of the 17 Canons that passed therein.

1. Concerning the Regal Power.

2. For better keeping of the day of His Majesties most happy Inauguration.

3. For suppressing of the growth of Popery.

4. Against Socinianism.

5. Against Sectaries.

6. An Oath enjoined for the preventing of all Innovations in Doctrine and Government.

7. A Declaration concerning some Rites and Ceremonies.

8. Of Preaching for Conformity.

9. One Book of Articles of Inquiry to be used at all Parochial Visitations.

10. Concerning the conversation of the Clergy.

11. Chancellors Patents.

12. Chancellors alone not to censure any of the Clergy in sundry Cases.

13. Excommunication and Absolution not to be pronounced but by a Priest.

14. Concerning the Commutations and disposing of them.

15. Touching concurrent Jurisdiction.

16. Concerning Licenses to Marry.

17. Against vexatious Citations.

As to the Oath concluded in the Synod, which was a Subject of so much discourse at that time, and after in the succeeding Parliament, that the Members of the Synod and the whole Episcopal Clergy suffered much thereby, it is here set forth at large according to the true tenor thereof.

I A.B. do swear, That I do approve the Doctrine and Discipline or Government established in the Church of England, as containing all things necessary to salvation: And that I will not endeavour by my self, or any other, directly or indirectly to bring in any Popish Doctrine contrary to that which is so established: nor will I ever give my consent to alter the Government of this Church, by Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, and Archdeacons, &c. as it stands now established, and as by right it ought to stand, nor yet ever to subject it to the usurpations and superstitions of the See of Rome. And all these I do plainly and sincerely acknowledge and swear, according to the plain and common sense and understanding of the same words, without any equivocation or mental evasion, or secret reservation whatsoever. And this I do heartily, willingly, and truly, upon the Faith of a Christian. So help me God in Jesus Christ.

As soon as these Canons were published, various were mens censures upon them, and many objections were raised against them, because they were generally condemned as illegally passed, to the prejudice of the Fundamental Liberty of the Subject, though their fitting was justified by the opinions of the ablest of the Kings Learned Council in the Laws; but against the Oath many exceptions were made, some of which we shall insert.

1. Because the (Oath) did leave the Oath so loose, that neither the makers nor the takers thereof understood the same.

Secondly, These words were disliked (viz.) (We will never give consent to alter this Church-Government,) as if the same were intended to abridge the Liberty of King and State in future Parliaments and Convocations. Goodman, Bishop of Gloucester, the day before the ending of the Synod, repaired to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and acquainted him, that he could not with his Conscience subscribe these new Canons, and thereupon he was by the King committed to the Gate-house, and it appeared afterward that he scrupled some passages about the Corporeal Presence.

In Scotland the Distempers were so great about the Service-Book sent thither, that the King raised an Army to reduce them to obedience: And from this beginning many and great Calamities ensued in the Church and State, in the few remaining years of this Kings Reign.

The Liturgie, and shortly after Episcopacy it self, were both abrogated by those that usurped the Government of the Kingdom, and (which is the more to be lamented) many Ministers of the Gospel in England, who were reputed Learned and Pious Men, and had conformed to the established Doctrine and Discipline of the Church, to the scandal of Religion, joyned with those that opposed the Kings just Authority, and the Laws, and by their Preachings and Writings excited the people to an unlawful and unnatural War, on pretence of Reformation of Religion, forgetting, That not Guns and Swords, but Prayers and Tears ought to be the Arms of the Church; and then came in that flood of Errors that does yet too too much obscure the beauty thereof; for hitherto, though some differences arose in Discipline, yet so far was there unity amongst us, that the Ministers in the common grounds of Religion and of the Ministry were all one, and all preached one Faith and substance of Doctrine; but we shall no further enlarge on these things, which will make matter for an entire History of it self to describe.

Pembroke Colledge in Oxford was erected, and built in the place where formerly Broadgates-Hall stood, at the Charge of Thomas Tisdale of Glympton in the County of Oxford, who gave five thousand pound thereunto; and Richard Wightwick Rector of East Isle in Berkshire gave to it Lands of the yearly value of an hundred pounds; and hereupon King James in the latter end of his Reign gave his License for the building the Colledge, and granted to it a Charter of Mortmain of seven hundred pounds a year; but the Colledge was not built till the first year of this Kings Reign, and he gave to it the perpetual Patronage of the Church of St. Aldates near adjoining. Sir Foulk Grevil, Lord Brook, founded a History Professorship in the University of Cambridge, and gave an hundred pound a year thereunto for ever; and Sir Thoms Adams a competently Learned and worthy Citizen, and sometime Lord Mayor of London, erected and endowed an Arabick Professorship in the same University.

The Queen Henrietta Maria, Wife to this King, of her great goodness and love to Learning, procured of the King her Husband the perpetual Patronage of several good Parsonages in Hampshire, to be granted to Queens Colledge in Oxford; and the King out of his care to have the Inhabitants of Jersey and Guernsey well educated, gave some Fellowships in Jesus Colledge and Pembroke Colledge in Oxford, to the Natives of those Islands.

The King was very solicitous to repair the ancient Cathedral Church of St. Paul in London, which was much decayed with Age, and advised with Archbishop Laud, and some others of his Council, how to effect so Pious and so Noble a purpose, which was after some time resolved on, and he himself at his own Charge repaired some part thereof, and by his inducement Sir Paul Pindar, a wealthy and worthy Citizen, and many others, contributed largely thereunto, so that the Work went on very fast, and had not the Civil Wars made an interruption to it, in few years St. Paul's Church would have been made the most magnificent Structure of Europe.

Mr. John Eggor erected and endowed a Free-School in the Parish of Alton in Hampshire, which was confirmed by Act of Parliament.

The King also, by his Letters Patents, gave power to the Town of Plymouth to erect a new Church there. The Citizens of Edenborough in Scotland also built a new Church in that City called the Fronekirk, and covered it with Plates of Copper; and one Heriat a Citizen of that City, founded an Hospital there, which is one of the most beautiful Buildings in that Kingdom. There were many Free-Schools besides those here mentioned, and many Alms-houses erected in several parts of England, and some Hospitals; but we have not now so particular information thereof, as to make mention of them in this place, but by what has been here expressed, we may see the pious and charitable effects of the just security and peace of the first fifteen years of the Kings Government, which is all the time he reigned freely, and without opposition.

Of his Wife and Children.

HE married Mary the Daughter of Henry the Fourth King of France, whose Marriage was solemnized in the year 1625. being the first year of his Reign: He had Issue by her, four Sons, and as many Daughters; the eldest Son born before the time, was baptized Charles, and lived not above two hours: His second Son born May the twenty ninth, 1630. was also named Charles, and afterwards created Prince of Wales. And in the year 1660. Restor'd (after many years seclusion in Foreign Countreys) with the universal Congratulation of his Subjects to his Fathers Throne, happily blest with the Regal Vertues of so illustrious a Monarch: His third Son was born Octob. the 13th. 1633. and was baptized James, and created Duke of York, a Prince of invincible Courage, and Heroick Valour, as his Actions in France and Flanders, yet fresh in memory, have given sufficient Testimony: His fourth and last Son was born the twentieth of July, 1640. and Christened Henry, afterwards created Duke of Gloucester; He since his Brothers happy Restauration, deceased on the 13th. of September, 1660.

thereby bereaving the World of those fair hopes which had been generally conceived of his Noble and Princely Endowments. His eldest Daughter Mary, was born November the 4th. 1631. and afterwards married to William of Nassau, Prince of Orange, by whom he had one Son named William, Heir and Successor to his Father in his Dignities; she quickly followed her Brother the Duke of Gloucester, viz. the 24th. of December, 1660. her loss being very much bewailed, especially by any who had relation to her Service, as being a Princess of universal Goodness, Charity, and Bounty. His second Daughter Elizabeth was born the 28th. of December, 1635. She died at Carisbrook in the Isle of Wight, September the 8th. 1650. of meer Grief (as it is not without reason believ'd) for her Fathers unfortunate Death: And his third Daughter Anne, was born the seventeenth of March, 1636. who also died very young: His fourth and last Daughter, was born June the 16th. 1644. at Exeter, from whence she was brought up to St. James's, but afterwards conveyed into France by her Governness the Lady Dalkjeth; She was married to the Duke of Anjou, Brother to Lewis the Fourteenth, the present King of France; a Princess she was of incomparable Beauty, and Gallantry of Spirit.

Of his Death and Burial.

HIS Death was strange and unparallel'd; we read of many Kings who came to violent ends, but never any that was so formally and solemnly murdered; by a publick Trial and Execution, which was done in the manner following.

On Saturday, January the 20th. 1648. the wicked High Court of Justice sate in Westminster-Hall, whereof John Bradshaw of Grays-Inne was President, he had a Mace and Sword carried before him, and twenty habited like Gentlemen for his Guard, under the Command of one Colonel Fox, (formerly a Brasier or Tinker.) When the pretended Court was sate, and O Yes made, and silence commanded; the Act of the Commons for erecting the said Court was read, in these words,

The Trial of His Majesty. Bradshaw President of the High Court of Justice.

Whereas it is notorious, That Charles Stuart the now King of England, not content with the many incroachments which his Predecessors had made upon the People in their Rights and Freedom, hath had a wicked design to subvert the ancient and fundamental Laws and Liberties of this Nation, and in their place to introduce an Arbitrary and Tyrannical Government, and that besides all evil ways to bring his design to pass, he hath prosecuted it with Fire and Sword, and levied and maintained a Civil War in the Land against the Parliament and Kingdom, whereby this Countrey hath been miserably wasted, the Publick Treasure exhausted, Trade decayed, thousands of people murdered, and infinite of other mischiefs committed, for all which high Offences the said Charles Stuart might long since have been brought to exemplary and condign punishment: Whereas also the Parliament well hoping that the restraint and imprisonment of his Person, after it had pleased God to deliver him into their hands, would have quieted the Distempers of the Kingdom, did forbear to proceed judicially against him, but found by sad experience that such remissness served only to encourage him and his Complices in the continuance of their

Mr. King, Cryer of the Court.

The Court being thus sate and called over, the King was brought to the Bar by Colonel Hacker, with Halburdeers, the Mace of the Court conducting him to his Chair within the Bar where he sate, and then the President Bradshaw said to the King, Charles Stuart King of England, The Commons of England assembled in Parliament being sensible of the great Calamities brought upon this Nation, and of the innocent blood shed (which are referred to You as the Author of it) according to that Duty which they owe to God, the Nation, and Themselves, and according to that Power and fundamental Trust reposed in them by the People, have constituted this High Court of Justice, before which you are now brought, and you are to hear your Charge, upon which the Court will proceed.

Solicitor Cook. My Lord, In behalf of the Commons of England, and of all the people thereof, I do accuse Charles Stuart here present of High Treason, and Misdemeanours, and I do in the name of the Commons of England desire the Charge may be read unto him.

The King. Hold a little.

President. Sir, the Court commands the Charge to be read, afterward you may be heard.

The Charge was read as followeth:

The Charge read.

That the said Charles Stuart, being admitted King of England, and therein trusted with a limited power to Govern by, and according to the Laws of the Land, and not otherwise, and by his Trust, Oath, and Office, being obliged to use the Power committed to him, for the good and benefit of the People, and for the preservation of their Rights and Liberties, yet nevertheless out of a wicked design to erect and uphold in himself an unlimited and tyrannical Power, to rule according to his Will, and to overthrow the Rights and Liberties of the People; and to take away and make void the foundations thereof, and of all redress and remedy of mis-government, which by the Fundamental Constitutions of this Kingdom were reserved on the peoples behalf, in the right and power of frequent and successive Parliaments or National Meetings in Council, He, the said Charles Stuart, for accomplishment of such Designs, and for the protecting of himself and his adherents, in his and their wicked practices, to the same end hath Traiterously and maliciously levied War against the present Parliament, and the people therein Represented.

Particularly, upon or about the Thirtieth day of June, in the year of our Lord, One thousand six hundred forty and two, at Beverly in the County of York; and upon or about the thirtieth day of July, in the year aforesaid, in the County of the City of York; and upon, or about the Twenty fourth day of August in the same year, at the County of the Town of Nottingham, (when, and where he set up his Standard of War;)

and also on, or about the Twenty third day of October, in the same year at Edgehill, and Keinton-field, in the County of Warwick; and upon, or about the Thirtieth day of November in the same year, at Brainford in the County of Middlesex; and upon, or about the Thirtieth day of August, in the year of our Lord One thousand six hundred forty and three, at Caversham-bridge near Redding in the County of Berks; and upon, or about the Thirtieth day of October in the year last mentioned, at, or near the City of Gloucester; and upon, or about the Thirtieth day of November, in the year last mentioned, at Newberry in the County of Berks; and upon, or about the One and thirtieth day of July, in the year of our Lord, One thousand six hundred forty and four, at Cropredy-Bridge, in the County of Oxon; and upon, or about the Thirtieth day of September, in the year last mentioned, at Bodmin, and other places near adjacent, in the County of Cornwall; and upon, or about the Thirtieth day of November, in the year last mentioned, at Newberry aforesaid; and upon, or about the Eighth day of June, in the year of our Lord, One thousand six hundred forty and five, at the Town of Leicester; and also upon the Fourteenth day of the same Month, at Naseby-field in the County of Northampton. At which several times and places, or most of them, and at many other places in this Land, at several other times within the years afore mentioned: And in the year of our Lord, One thousand six hundred forty and six, He, the said Charles Stuart, hath caused and procured many thousands of the free people of the Nation to be slain, and by Divisions, Parties, and Insurrections within this Land by Invasions from foreign Parts, endeavoured and procured by him, and by many other evil ways and means; He, the said Charles Stuart, hath not only maintained and carried on the said War both by Land and Sea, during the years beforementioned, but also hath renewed, or caused to be renewed, the said War against the Parliament, and good people of this Nation, in this present year, One thousand six hundred forty and eight, in the Counties of Kent, Essex, Surrey, Suffex, Middlesex, and many other Counties and places in England and Wales, and also by Sea; and particularly, He, the said Charles Stuart, hath for that purpose given Commissions to his Son the Prince, and others, whereby, besides multitudes of other persons, many such, as were by the Parliament intrusted and employed for the safety of the Nation, being by him or his Agents corrupted, to the betraying of their Trust, and revolting from the Parliament, have had entertainment and Commission, for the continuing and renewing of War and Hostility against the said Parliament and People, as aforesaid; By which cruel and unnatural Wars, by Him, the said Charles Stuart, levied, continued, and renewed as aforesaid, much innocent Blood of the Free people of this Nation hath been spilt, many Families have been undone, the publick Treasury wasted and exhausted, Trade obstructed and miserably decayed, vast expence and damage to the Nation incurred, and many parts of the Land spoiled, some of them even to desolation.

And for further prosecution of his said evil designs, He, the said Charles Stuart, doth still continue his Commissions to the said Prince, and other Rebels and Revolters, both English and Foreigners, and to the Earl of Ormond, and to the Irish Rebels and Revolters, associated with him, from whom further Invasions upon this Land are threatened, upon the procurement, and on the behalf of the said Charles Stuart.

All which wicked designs of War, and evil practices of him the said Charles Stuart have been and are carried on, for the advancing and upholding of the personal Interest of Will and Power, and pretended Prerogative to himself and his Family, against the publick Interest, common Right, Liberty, Justice, and Peace of the People of this Nation, by, and for whom He was intrusted, as aforesaid.

By all which it appeareth, That He, the said Charles Stuart hath been, and is the Occasioner, Author, and Contriver of the said unnatural, cruel, and bloody Wars, and therein guilty of all the Treasons, Murders, Rapines, Burnings, Spoils, Desolations, Damage and Mischief to this Nation, acted or committed in the said Wars, or occasioned thereby. And the said John Cook, by protestation (saving to himself on the behalf of the people of England, the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any other Charge against the said Charles Stuart, and also of replying to the Answers which the said Charles Stuart shall make to the premisses, or any of them, or any other Charge that shall be so exhibited) doth for the said Treasons and Crimes, on the behalf of the said People of England, Impeach the said Charles Stuart, as a Tyrant, Traytor, Murderer, and a publick and implacable Enemy to the Commonwealth of England: And pray, That the said Charles Stuart King of England, may be put to Answer all and every the premisses, that such Proceedings, Examinations, Tryals, Sentences, and Judgment may be thereupon had, as shall be agreeable to Justice.

The King smiled often during the reading of the Charge, especially at these words, Tyrant, Traytor, Murderer, and publick Enemy of the Commonwealth.

President. Sir, You have now heard your Charge, You find that in the close of it, it is prayed to the Court in behalf of the Commons of England, that you Answer to your Charge, which the Court expects.

King. I would know by what power I am called hither; I was not long ago in the Isle of Wight, how I came there, is a longer Story than I think fit at this time for me to speak: But there I entred into a Treaty with both Houses of Parliament, with as much Faith as it possible to be had of any people in the World: I treated there with a number of Honourable Lords and Gentlemen, and Treated honestly and uprightly; I cannot say, but that they did very nobly with Me: We were upon a Conclusion of the Treaty: Now I would know by what lawful Authority (there are many unlawful Authorities, Thieves and Robbers on the High-way.) I was brought from thence, and carried from place to place, (and I know not what) and when I know by what lawful Authority, I shall answer. Remember I am your King, your lawful King, and what sins you bring upon your own heads, and the Judgement of God upon this Land, think well upon it, I say, before you go on from one sin to a greater, therefore let me know by what lawful Authority I am seated here, and I shall not be unwilling to Answer. In the mean time, I shall not betray my Trust: I have a Trust committed to me by God, by old and lawful Descent; I will not betray it to Answer to a new unlawful Authority.

Bradshaw, Pres. If you had been pleased to have observed what was hinted to you by the Court at your first coming hither, you would have known by what Authority: which Authority requires you in the name of the People of England, of whom you are elected King, to answer them.

King. I deny that.

Bradshaw. If you acknowledge not the Authority of the Court they must proceed.

King. I do tell them so, England was never an Elective Kingdom, but an Hereditary Kingdom, for near these thousand years: Therefore let me know, by what lawful Authority I am called hither, I do stand more for the Liberty of my People than any here that come to be my pretended Judges; and therefore let me know by what lawful Authority, and I will answer, otherwise I will not answer.

Bradshaw. Sir, How really you have managed your trust, is known; your way of Answer is to interrogate the Court, which befits not you in this Condition; you have been told of it twice or thrice.

King. Here is Lieutenant Colonel Cobbet, ask him if he did not bring me from the Isle of Wight by Force: I do not come here as submitting to the Court; I will stand as much for the privilege of the House of Commons rightly understood, as any man here whatsoever; I see no House of Lords here that may constitute a Parliament, and (the King too) should have been. Is this the bringing the King to his Parliament? Is this the bringing an end to the Treaty on the Publick Faith? Let me see a lawful Authority warranted by the Word of God, the Scriptures, or by the constitutions of the Kingdom. I will not betray my Trust, nor the Liberties of the People: I am sworn to keep the Peace by that Duty I owe to God and my Countrey, and I will do it to the last breath in my body. As it is a sin to withstand lawful Authority, so it is to submit to a Tyrannical, or any otherwise unlawful Authority.

Bradshaw. The Court expects your final Answer, and will adjourn till Monday next: We are satisfied with our Authority that are your Judges, and it is upon Gods Authority and the Kingdoms, and that Peace you speak of, will be kept in doing Justice, and that's our present work.

So the Court adjourned, and the King was conducted back; They had so contrived it, that divers schismatical Souldiers and fellows were placed round about the Court to cry Justice, Justice, when the King was remanded, thinking all the rest of the people whould have bleated to the same tune, but they (almost all) cried God blefs him, and were (some of them) well cudgelled by the Souldiers, for not reviling and exclaiming after the mode of the Army; yet the Court took no notice hereof: so far was His Majesty already fore-judged and condemned to sufferings.

Monday, January the 22th. The King was brought again to his Tryal.

Solicitor Cook. May it please your Lordship, I did at the last Court, in behalf of the Commons of England, exhibit, and give into this Court a Charge of High Treason, and other High Crimes against the Prisoner at the Bar, whereof I do accuse him in the name of the People of England, and the Charge was read unto him, and his Answer required. My Lord, He was not then pleased to give an Answer, but instead of answering, did dispute the Authority of this High Court: My humble Motion to this High Court in behalf 1648 behalf of the Kingdom of England is, That the Prisoner may be directed to make a positive Answer, either by way of Confession or Negation; which, if he shall refuse to do, That the matter of Charge may be taken pro confesso, and the Court may proceed according to Justice.

1648

Bradshaw. Sir, You may remember, at the last Court you were told the occasion of your being brought hither, and you heard a Charge read against you, &c. You heard likewise what was prayed in behalf of the People, That you should give an Answer to that Charge: You were then pleaded to make some scruples concerning the Authority of this Court, and said, you knew not by what Authority you were brought hither; you did divers times propound your Questions, and were as often Answered, That it was by Authority of the Commons of England Assembled in Parliament, that did think fit to call you to account for those High and Capital Misdemeanors, wherewith you then were charged. Since that the Court hath taken into consideration what you then said, they are fully satisfied with their own Authority, and they hold it fit you should stand satisfied therewith too: And they do require that you do give a positive and particular Answer to this Charge exhibited against you: they expect you should either confess or deny; if you do deny, it is offered in the behalf of the Kingdom to be made good against you; Their Authority they do avow to the whole World, and the whole Kingdom are to rest satisfied therein, and you are to rest satisfied in it; and therefore you are to give a positive Answer.

King. When I was here last, it's true, I made that Question, and truly, if it were only my own particular case, I would have satisfied my self with the Protestation I made here the last time, against the Legality of this Court, and that a King cannot be tried by any Superior Jurisdiction upon Earth: but it is not my case alone, it is the Freedom and the Liberties of the people of England, and (do you pretend what you will) I stand more for their Liberties than you; for if Power without Law may make Laws, and may alter the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, I do not know what Subject he is in England that can be sure of his Life, or any thing that he calls his own; Therefore, when I came hither, I did expect particular Reasons to know by what Law, what Authority you proceed against me here, and therefore I am a little to seek what to say to you in this particular, because the Affirmative is to be proved, the Negative (often) is very hard to do; I shall tell you my Reasons as short as I can: All proceedings against any man whatsoever

Here the King was by Bradshaw interrupted.

Bradshaw. Sir, I must interrupt you: what you do is not agreeable to the proceedings of any Court of Justice: You are about to enter into argument and dispute concerning the Authority of this Court, before whom you appear as a Prisoner, and are charged as an High Delinquent; you may not dispute the Authority of this Court, nor will any Court give way unto it, you are to submit to it, &c.

King. Under favour, I do plead for the Liberty of the People of England more than you do; and therefore, if I should impose a belief upon any man without Reasons given, it were unreasonable.

Bradshaw. Sir, I must interrupt you: you may not be permitted, you speak of Law and Reason, and there is both against you: Sir, the Vote of the Commons of England Assembled in Parliament, is the Reason of the Kingdom, and they are those that have given you that Law, according to which you should have Ruled and Reigned: Sir, it will be taken notice of, that you stand in contempt of the Court, and your contempt will be recorded accordingly.

King. I do not know how a King can be a Delinquent, but by all the Laws that ever I heard, all men may put in Demurrers against any Proceedings, as illegal: and I do demand that; if you deny that, you deny Reason.

Bradshaw. Sir, Neither you, nor any man are permitted to dispute that point, you are concluded; You may not demur to the Jurisdiction of the Court, if you do, I must let you know, that they over-rule your Demurrer; they sit here by the Authority of the Commons of England, and all your Predecessors, and You are responsible to them.

King. I deny that, shew me one President.

Bradshaw. Sir, You are not to interrupt while the Court is speaking to you, this point is not to be debated by you; if you offer it by way of Demurrer to the Jurisdiction of the Court, they have considered of their Jurisdiction, they do affirm their own Jurisdiction.

King. I say, Sir, by your favour, That the Commons of England were never a Court of Judicature, I would know how they came to be so.

Bradshaw. Sir, You are not to be permitted to go on in that speech, and these discourses:

Then the Clerk of the Court read as followeth;

Charles Stuart, King of England, you have been accused in the behalf of the People of England of High Treason, and other High Crimes, the Court hath determined that you ought to answer the same.

King. I will answer the same so soon as I know by what Authority you do this.

Bradshaw. If this be all you will say, then Gentlemen, you that brought the Prisoner hither, take charge of him back again.

King. I do require that I may give my Reasons why I did not Answer, and give me time for that.

Bradshaw. Sir, It is not for Prisoners to require.

King. Prisoners, Sir? I am not an ordinary Prisoner.

Bradshaw. The Court have affirmed their Jurisdiction, if you will not Answer, we shall give Order to record your fault.

King. You never heard my Reasons yet.

Bradshaw. Sir, your Reasons are not to be heard against the highest Jurisdiction.

King. Shew me that Jurisdiction where Reason is not to be heard.

Bradshaw. Sir, We shew you it here; the Commons of England: and the next time you are brought, you will know more of the pleasure of the Court, and, it may be, their final determination.

King. Shew me where ever the House of Commons was a Court of Judicature of that kind.

Bradshaw. Serjeant take away the Prisoner.

King. Well, Sir, Remember that the King is not suffered 1648 suffered to give in his Reasons for the Liberty and Freedom of all his Subjects.

Bradshaw. Sir, You are not to have Liberty to use this Language; how great a Friend you have been to the Laws and Liberties of the People, let all England and the world judge.

King. Sir, Under favour, it was the Liberty, Freedom, and Laws of the Subjects that ever I took, I defended my self with Arms, I never took up Arms against the People, but for the Laws.

Bradshaw. The command of the Court must be obeyed, no Answer will be given to the Charge.

So the King was guarded forth to Sir Robert Cottons, and the Court adjourned to the Painted Chamber, Tuesday twelve a Clock.

The third days Trial of His Majesty. Tuesday, January 23. The Court sate again, seventy three Commissioners of those before named were present.

The King brought into the Court, sits down.

Solicitor Cook. 'May it please your Lordship, my Lord President, This is now the third time that by the Grace and Favour of the Court, the Prisoner hath been brought to the Barr, before any Issue joyned in this Cause. My Lord, I did at the first Court exhibit a Charge against him, containing the Highest Treason that ever was wrought on the Theatre of England, That the King of England, trusted to keep the Law, that had taken an Oath so to do, that had tribute paid him for that end, should be guilty of a wicked design to subvert and destroy our Laws, and introduce an Arbitrary and Tyrannical Government, and in defiance of the Parliament and their Authority, set up his Standard for War against the Parliament and People: And I did humbly pray in behalf of the People of England, That he may speedily be required to make an Answer to the Charge; But, my Lord, instead of making any Answer, he did then dispute the Authority of this High Court; your Lordship was pleased to give him a further day to put in his Answer, which day being yesterday, I did humbly move, That he might be required to give a direct and positive Answer either by denying, or confessing of it; But, my Lord, he was pleased to demur to the Jurisdiction of the Court, which the Court did then over-rule, and command him to give a direct and positive Answer: My Lord, besides this great delay of Justice, I shall now humbly move your Lordship for speedy Judgement against him: I might press your Lordship upon the whole, That according to the known Rules of the Laws of the Land, if a Prisoner shall stand contumacious in contempt, and shall not put in an issuable Plea, Guilty or not Guilty of the charge given against him, whereby he may come to a fair Tryal, that by an implicit confession it may be taken pro confesso, as it hath been done to those who have deserved more Favour than the Prisoner at the Bar hath done. But besides, My Lord, I shall humbly press your Lordship upon the whole Fact, That the House of Commons, the Supreme Authority and Jurisdiction of the Kingdom, they have declared, That it is notorious, that the matter of the Charge is true, as it is in Truth, my Lord, as clear as Chrystal, and as the Sun that shines at Noon-day; which, if your Lordship and the Court be not satisfied in, I have notwithstanding in the Peoples behalf, several Witnesses to produce, and therefore I do humbly pray, (and yet I confess, it is not so much I, as the innocent Blood as hath been shed: (the cry whereof is very great) for Justice and Judgement) and therefore I do humbly pray, that speedy Judgement be pronounced against the Prisoner at the Bar.

Bradshaw. Sir, you have heard what is moved by the Council on behalf of the Kingdom against you; you were told over and over again, That it was not for you, or any other man to dispute the Jurisdiction of the Supreme and Highest Authority of England, from which there is no Appeal, and touching which there must be no dispute: yet you did persist in such carriage, as shews you have no manner of obedience, nor did you acknowledge any Authority in them, nor the High Court that constituted this High Court of Justice. Sir, I must let you know from the Court, that they are very sensible of these delays of yours, and that they ought not (being thus authorized by the Supreme Court of England) to be thus trifled withal, and that they might in Justice, and according to the Rules of Justice, take advantage by these delays, and proceed to pronounce Judgement against you; yet nevertheless they are pleased to give direction, and on their behalf, I do require you, that you make a positive Answer unto this charge that is against you, in plain terms, (for Justice knows no respect of persons) you are to give your positive and final Answer in plain English, whether you be Guilty or not Guilty of these Treasons laid to your charge.

King. When I was here yesterday, I did desire to speak for the Liberties of the People of England, I was interrupted, I desire to know yet, whether I may speak freely or not.

Bradshaw. Sir, you have had the resolution of the Court upon the like Question the last day, and you were told, that having such a Charge of so high a nature against you, your Work was, that you ought to acknowledge the Jurisdiction of the Court, and to answer to your Charge; when you have once answered, you shall be heard at large, make the best defence you can: But Sir, I must let you know from the Court (as their Commands) That you are not to be permitted to issue out into any other Discourses, till such time as you have given a positive Answer concerning the matter charged upon you.

King. For the Charge I value it not a Rush, it is the Liberty of the People of England that I stand for, for me to acknowledge a New Court that I never heard of before, I that am your KING, that should be an Example to all the People of England, to uphold Justice, to maintain the old Laws, indeed, I do not know how to do it: you spoke well the first day that I came here, (on Saturday) of the Obligations that I had laid upon me by God, to the maintenance of the Liberties of my People; the same Obligation you spake of, I do acknowledge to God, that I owe to him and to my People, to defend as much as in me lies, the ancient Laws of the Kingdom, therefore until that I may know that this is not against the Fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, I can put in no particular Answer, 1648 Answer; if you will give me time, I will shew you my Reasons, and this

Here the King was interrupted. Here being interrupted, The King said again, By your favour, you ought not to interrupt me: How I came here, I know not: there's no Law for it to make your King your Prisoner. I was in a Treaty upon the Publick Faith of the Kingdom, made to me by the Two Houses of Parliament, that was the Representative of the Kingdom, and I had almost made an end of the Treaty when I was hurried away, and brought hither, and therefore

And here again. Bradshaw. Sir, you must know the pleasure of the Court.

King. By your favour, Sir.

Bradshaw. Nay Sir, by your favour, you may not be permitted to fall into those Discourses; You appear as a Delinquent, You have not acknowledged the Authority of the Court, the Court craves it not of you, but once more they command you to give your positive Answer.

Clerk. Do your Duty.

King. Duty Sir!

The Clerk then reads;

"Charles Stuart, King of England, you are accused in behalf of the Commons of England, of divers High Crimes and Treasons, which Charge hath been read unto you; The Court now requires you to give your positive and final Answer by way of Confession or Deniall of the Charge.

King. Sir, I say again to you, so that I may give satisfaction to the People of England of the clearness of my Proceedings, not by way of Answer, not in this way, but to satisfy them that I have done nothing against that Trust that hath been committed to me, I would do it; but to acknowledge a New Court against their Priviledges, to alter the Fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, Sir, you must excuse me.

Bradshaw. Sir, This is the third time that you have publickly disavowed this Court, and put an affront upon it, how far you have preserved the Priviledges of the People, your actions have spoken; but truly Sir, mens intentions ought to be known by their actions, you have written your meaning in bloody Characters throughout the whole Kingdom: But Sir, you understand the pleasure of the Court. Clerk, Record the default; and Gentlemen, you that took charge of the Prisoner, take him back again. So the King went forth with his Guards, and the Court adjourned to the Painted Chamber, the Cryer (as at other times) crying, God bless the Kingdom of England.

The 4th. and last days Tryal of His Majesty. Saturday, 27th of January, 1648. The Court sat again in Westminster-hall, the President was in his Scarlet Robes, after him 67 Commissioners answered to their Names; the King came in, in his wonted posture with his Hat on, a company of Souldiers and seditious Persons were placed about the Court to cry for Justice, Judgement, and Execution; the people not daring to cry, God bless Him, for fear of being again beaten by the Souldiers.

Bradshaw. Gentlemen, It is well known to all or most of you here present, that the Prisoner at the Bar hath been several times convented and brought before this Court to make Answer to a Charge of High Treason, and other Crimes exhibited against him in the name of the People of England, to which Charge being required to Answer, He hath been so far from obeying the Commands of the Court, by submitting to their Justice, as he began to take upon him Reasoning, and debated unto the Authority of the Court, and to the Higheft Court that appointed them to Try and Judge him; but being over-ruled in that, and required to make his Answer, he still continued cantumacious, and refused to submit to Answer. Hereupon the Court (that they may not be wanting to themselves, nor the Trust reposed in them, nor that any mans wilfulness prevent Justice) they have considered of the Charge and of the Contumacy, and of that Confession which in Law doth arise on that Contumacy. They have likewise considered the notoriety of the Fact charged upon this Prisoner, and upon the whole Matter, they are resolved, and have agreed upon a Sentence to be pronounced against him; but in respect he doth desire to be heard before the Sentence be read and pronounced, the Court hath resolved to hear him: Yet Sir, thus much I must tell you beforehand (which you have been minded of at other Courts) that if that which you have to say, be to offer any debate concerning the Jurisdiction, you are not to be heard in it, you have offered it formerly, and you have struck at the Root, that is, the Power and Supreme Authority of the Commons of England, which this Court will not admit a debate of, and which indeed is an irrational thing in them to do, being a Court that acts upon Authority derived from them. But Sir, if you have any thing to say in defence of your self concerning the Matter charged, the Court hath given me in command to hear you.

King. Since I see that you will not hear any thing of debate, concerning that which I confess I thought most material for the peace of the Kingdom, and for the Liberty of the Subject, I shall wave it, but only I must tell you, that this many a day all things have been taken away from me, but that that I call dearer to me than my Life, which is my Conscience and mine Honour: And if I had respect to my Life more than the Peace of the Kingdom, and the Liberty of the Subject, certainly I should have made a particular defence for my Life, for by that, at leastwise, I might have delayed an ugly Sentence, which I believe will pass upon me; therefore certainly Sir, as a man that hath some understanding, some knowledge of the world (if that true zeal to my Countrey had not overborn the care that I have for my own preservation) I should have gone another way to work than that I have done. Now Sir, I conceive that a hasty Sentence once passed may sooner be repented of, than recalled; and truly, the selfe same desire that I have for the peace of the Kingdom, and the Liberty of the Subject, more than my own particular ends, makes me now at last desire, that I having something to say that concerns both, I desire before Sentence be given, that I may be heard in the Painted Chamber before the Lords and Commons, this delay cannot be prejudicial to you; whatsoever I say, if that I say be no Reason, those that hear me must be Judges, I cannot be Judge of that that I have to say. If it be Reason, and really for the welfare of the Kingdom, and the Liberty of the Subject, I am sure it is very well worth the hearing; there 1648 therefore I do conjure you, as you love that which you pretend (I hope it's real) the Liberty of the Subject, and peace of the Kingdom, that you will grant me this hearing before any sentence passeth; but if I cannot get this Liberty, I do protest that your fair shews of Liberty and Peace are pure shews, and that you will not hear your King,

The President said, This was a declining the Jurisdiction of the Court, and delay: yet the Court withdrew for half an hour, advised upon it, and sat again.

Bradshaw said to the King, That the Court had considered what he had moved, and also their own Authority.

The return from the Court, said he, is this, That they have been too much delayed by you already, and they are Judges appointed by the Highest Authority, and Judges are no more to delay, than they are to deny Justice, and notwithstanding what you have offered, they are resolved to proceed to Sentence, and to Judgement, that is their unanimous resolution.

The King pressed again and again, that he might be heard by the Lords and Commons in the Painted Chamber, with great earnestness, and was as often denied by Bradshaw: at last the King desired that this Motion of his might be entred.

Bradshaw began in a long Speech to declare the Grounds of the Sentence, much aggravating the Kings offences, and misapplying both Law and History to his present purpose.

When Bradshaw had done speaking, Broughton the Clerk read the Sentence drawn up in Parchment to this effect.

The Sentence against his Majesty.

'That whereas the Commons of England in Parliament had appointed them an High Court of Justice for the Tryal of Charles Stuart King of England, before whom he had been three times convened, and at the first time a Charge of High Treason and other high Crimes and Misdemeanors was read in behalf of the Kingdom of England, &c. which Charge being read unto him, as aforesaid, He the said Charles Stuart was required to give his Answer, but he refused so to do, and so expressed the several passages at his Tryal in refusing to Answer; for all which Treasons and Crimes, this Court doth adjudge, That he the said Charles Stuart as a Tyrant, Traytor, Murderer, and publick Enemy, shall be put to death, by severing of his Head from his Body.

After the sentence read, the President said, This Sentence now read and published, it is the Act, Sentence, Judgment and Resolution of the whole Court.

Here the whole Court stood up, as assenting to what the President said.

King. Will you hear me a word, Sir?

Bradshaw. Sir, You are not to be heard after the sentence.

King. No Sir?

1648 Bradshaw. No Sir, by your favour, Sir. Guard, withdraw your Prisoner.

King. I am not suffered to speak, expect what Justice other people will have.

The King not being admitted to reply, was taken by his Guards to Sir Robert Cotton's house, and the Court rose; as he passed down the stairs the Souldiers scoffed at him, and cast the smoak of their Tobacco (a thing very distastful to him) in his face, and threwed the Pipes in his way, and one more insolent than the rest, spit in his face, which he in great patience took no further notice of, than to wipe the spittle away; and as he passed further, hearing some of them by the instigation of their Officers cry out Justice, Justice and Execution, he said, Alas poor Souls! for a piece of Money they would do so for their Commanders.

The Court after the Judgment given, went into the Painted-Chamber, and appointed Sir Hardress Waller, Ireton, Harrison, Dean and Okey to be a Committee to consider of the time and place for the Execution: the King hearing thereof, requested an Officer of the Army to go to them, to desire that he might see his Children before his death, and that Doctor Juxon the Bishop of London might be admitted to assist him in his private devotion, and receiving the Sacrament; both which were granted to him upon a motion to the Parliament.

The King at his Tryal (as you have read) pressed earnestly to have his Reasons heard against the Jurisdiction of the Court, but was often denied, but that the weight of them may not be suppressed for a further manifestation of the impiety of his unjust Judges, we shall here insert them faithfully transcribed out of the Original Copy under the Kings own hand.

Having already made my Protestations not only against the illegality of this pretended Court, but also that no earthly Power can justly call me (who am your King) in Question as a Delinquent, I would not any more open my mouth upon this occasion more than to refer my self to what I have spoken, were I alone in this case concerned: but the Duty I owe to God, in the preservation of the true Liberty of my people, will not suffer me at this time to be silent: for how can any free-born Subject of England call life, or any thing he possesseth, his own, if Power without right daily maketh new, and abrogate the old Fundamental Law of the Land, which is now to be the present case; wherefore when I came hither, I expected that you would have endeavoured to have satisfied me concerning these grounds, which hinder me to answer to your pretended Impeachment; but since I see that nothing I can say will move you to it (though Negatives are not so naturally proved as Affirmatives) yet I will shew you the reason why I am confident you cannot judge me, nor indeed the meanest man in England, for I will not (like you) without shewing a reason seek to impose a belief upon my Subjects.

There is no proceeding just against any man but what is warranted either by God's Laws, or the Municipal Laws of the Countrey where he lives. Now I am most confident, that this days proceeding cannot be warranted by God's Law; for

A Committee is appointed to consider the time and place for the King's Execution.

The Reasons the King intended to have given at his Tryal against the proceedings of the Court.

1648 for on the contrary, the Authority of Obedience unto Kings, is clearly warranted, and strictly commanded both in the Old and New Testament, which if denied, I am ready instantly to prove, and for the Question now in hand, there it is said, That where the word of a King is, there is power, and who can say unto him, what dost thou, Eccles. 8.4. Then for the Laws of the Land, I am no less confident, that no learned Lawyer will affirm that an Impeachment can lie against the King, they all going in his Name: and one of their Maxims is, That the King can do no wrong. Besides the Law, upon which you ground your proceedings, must either be old or new, if old, shew it; if new, tell what Authority warranted by the Fundamental Laws of the Land hath made it, and when; but how the House of Commons can erect a Court of Judicature, which was never one it self, (as is well known to all Lawyers) I leave to God and the World to judge: And it were full as strange that they should pretend to make Laws without King or Lords House, to any that have heard speak of the Laws of England.

And admitting, but not granting, that the People of Englands Commission could grant your pretended power, I see nothing you can shew for that; for certainly you never asked the question of the tenth man of the Kingdom, and in this way you manifestly wrong even the poorest Plowman, if you demand not his free consent, nor can you pretend any colour for this your pretended Commission without the consent at least of the major part of every man in England, of whatsoever quality or condition, which I am sure you never went about to seek, so far are you from having it. Thus you see, that I speak not for my own right alone, as I am your King, but also for the true liberty of all my Subjects, which consists, not in sharing the power of Government, but living under such Laws, and such Government as may give themselves the best assurance of their Lives and propriety of their Goods. Nor in this must, or do I forget the Priviledges of both Houses of Parliament, which this days proceeding doth not only violate, but likewise occasion the greatest breach of their publick Faith (I believe) that ever was heard of, with which I am far from charging the two Houses, for all the pretended Crimes laid against Me, bear date long before this late Treaty at Newport, in which I having concluded as much as in Me lay, and hopefully expecting the two Houses agreement thereunto, I was suddainly surpris'd, and hurried from thence as a Prisoner, upon which account I am against my will brought hither, where since I am come, I cannot but to my power defend the ancient Laws and Liberties of this Kingdom, together with my own just Right; But for any thing I can see, the Higher House is totally excluded.

And for the House of Commons, it is too well known, that the major part of them are detained or deterred from sitting, so as if I had no other, this were sufficient for me to protest against the lawfulness of your pretended Court.

Besides all this, the peace of the Kingdom is not the least in my thoughts; and what hopes of settlement is there so long as Power reigns without rule of Law, changing the whole frame of that Government under which this Kingdom hath 1648 flourished for many hundred years (nor will I say what will fall out in case this lawless, unjust proceeding against Me do good on) and believe it, the Commons of England will not thank you for this Change; for they will remember how happy they have been of late years under the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, the King my Father and my Self, untill the beginning of these unhappy troubles, and will have cause to doubt, that they shall never be so happy under any new. And by this time it will be too sensibly evident, that the Arms I took up, were only to defend the fundamental Laws of this Kingdom, against those who have supposed my power hath totally changed the ancient Government.

Thus having shewed you briefly the Reasons why I cannot submit to your pretended Authority without violating the trust which I have from God, for the welfare and liberty of my people; I expect from you either clear reasons to convince my Judgment, shewing me that I am in an error, (and then truly I will readily answer) or that you will withdraw your proceedings.

The Report from the persons before named to consider of the time and place of the executing the Sentence against the King, was on Monday the 29th of January delivered in the Painted Chamber to the Commissioners then present, in these words, That it is the opinion of the Committee, That the open Street before White-Hall is a fit place, and that the King be there executed to morrow.

The Court approved of this Report, and ordered a Warrant to be drawn for that purpose, which was presently Ingrossed, and Sign'd, and Seal'd by all the Commissioners present; in these words, (viz.)

At the High Court of Justice for Trying and Judging Charles Stuart King of England, January the 29th 1648.

Whereas Charles Stuart King of England is, and standeth Convicted, Attainted and Condemned of High Treason; and other high Crimes, and Sentence upon Saturday last was pronounced against him by this Court to be put to death by severing his Head from his Body; of which Sentence, Execution yet remains to be done. These are therefore to will and require you, to see the said Sentence executed in the open Street before White-hall, upon the morrow being the 30th day of this instant moneth of January, between the hours of ten in the morning, and five of the afternoon of the same day, with full effect, and for your so doing, this shall be your sufficient Warrant. And these are to require all Officers and Souldiers, and other the good people of this Nation of England to be assisting unto you in this service: Given under our Hands and Seals, &c.

The title of the Warrant for executing the King.

To Colonel Francis Hacker,
Col. Huncks, and Lieutenant Col. Phayer.
John Bradshaw, &c.

This was signed and sealed by all the Commissioners whose names are before expressed; except such of them who are marked with this note, (*)

But of those that signed and sealed the Warrant, it must be remembered, that Colonel Richard Ingoldsby's Hand and Seal was against his consent put to it by Oliver Cromwell; but his early disclaiming claiming of the Fact, and his active and successful endeavours for the restoration of King Charles the Second to his Crown and Kingdoms, not only obtained his Pardon, but the Kings Favour with it, and the Dignity of Knight of the Bath, which was conferred on him at the ensuing Coronation.

Colonel John Hutchinson also for his conjunction with General Monk to reduce this Kingdom to its ancient Government, and his hearty repentance for what he had done in consenting to and acting in this impious Sentence, obtained his pardon for it.

The same day that the Warrant was signed and sealed, the Duke of Gloucester and the Lady Elizabeth were brought to the King, whom he most joyfully received, and giving his blessing to the Princess, He bid her remember to tell her Brother James, when ever she should see him, that he should look no more upon Charles as his Elder Brother only, but be obedient to him as his Sovereign: And that they should love one another, and forgive their Fathers Enemies: And then said unto her, Sweet Heart, you will forget this; No, said She, I shall never forget it while I live: and pouring forth abundance of Tears, promised him to write down the particulars.

Then the King taking the Duke of Gloucester upon his Knee, said, Sweet Heart, now they will cut off thy Fathers Head, (upon which words the Child looked very wishfully on him) Mark Child what I say, They will cut off my Head, and perhaps, make thee a King: But, mark what I say, you must not be a King, so long as your Brothers Charles and James does live; for they will cut off your Brothers Heads (when they can catch them) and cut thy Head off too at last; and therefore, I charge you do not be made a King by them. At which the Child, sighing said, I will be torn in pieces first—which falling so unexpectedly from one so young, it made the King rejoyce exceedingly.

Another Relation from the Lady Elizabeths own Hand.

What the King said to me the 29th of January last, being the last time I had the happiness to see him, 'He told me he was glad I was come, and 'although he had not time to say much, yet 'somewhat he had to say to me, which he had 'not to another, or leave in writing; because he 'feared their Cruelty was such, as that they would 'not have permitted him to write to me. He wished me not to grieve and torment my self for him, 'for that would be a glorious Death that he should 'die, it being for the Laws and Liberties of the 'Land. He bid me read Bishop Andrews's Sermons, 'Hookers Ecclesiastical Polity, and Bishop Laud's 'Book against Fisher, which would ground me against Popery. He told me, he had forgiven all 'his Enemies, and hoped God would forgive them 'also, and commanded us, &c. to forgive them. 'He bade me tell my Mother, that his thoughts 'had never strayed from her, and that his Love 'would be the same to his last: withall, He commanded me and my Brother to be obedient to 'her: and bade me send his Blessing to the rest of 'of my Brothers and Sisters, with commendation 'to all his Friends. So, after he had given me his Blessing, I took my leave.

'Further, He commanded us all to forgive those 'people, but never to trust them; for they had 'been most false too him, and to those that gave 'them power, and he feared also, to their own 'Souls. And desired me not to grieve for him, for 'he should die a Martyr, and that he doubted not 'but that the Lord would settle his Throne upon 'his Son, and that we should all be happier than 'we could have expected to have been, if he had 'lived. With many other things which at present I cannot remember.

On Tuesday the 30th of January, which was the fatal day on which the King was put to Death, The Bishop of London did in the Morning read Divine Service in his presence; to which Duty the xxvii. Chapter of St. Matthew, being the History of our Saviours Passion, was appointed by the Church-Calendar for the Second Lesson: but, he supposing it to have been selected on purpose, thanked him afterwards for his seasonable choice. But the Bishop modestly declining those undue thanks, told him that it came by course to be read on that day, which very much comforted His Majesty, who proceeded to the remaining Duties of receiving from the Bishop the Holy Sacrament, and the other preparations for his approaching Passion.

His Devotions being ended, about ten a clock he was brought from St. James's to White-hall by a Regiment of Foot, with Colours flying, and Drums beating (through the Park) part marching before, and part behind, with a private Guard of Partisans about him, the Bishop on the one hand, and Colonel Tomlinson (who had the charge of him) on the other bare-headed. The Guards marching a slow pace, as on a solemn and sad occasion to their ill-tuned Drums, He bid them go faster, (as his usual manner of walking was) saying, That he now went before them to strive for an Heavenly Crown, with less sollicitude than he had often encouraged his Souldiers to fight for an Earthly Diadem.

Being come to the end of the Park, he went up the Stairs leading to the Long Gallery in White-Hall, where he used formerly to Lodge. There finding an unexpected delay in being brought upon the Scaffold, which they had begun but that Morning, He past the most of that time (having received a Letter from the Prince in the interim by Mr. Seymour) in Prayer.

About twelve a Clock, His Majesty (refusing to Dine) eat onely a bit of Bread, and drank a glass of Claret; and about an hour after, Colonel Hacker, with other Officers and Souldiers, brought him with the Bishop and Colonel Tomlinson through the Banqueting-House to the Scaffold, whereto the passage was made through a Window. A strong Guard of several Regiments of Horse and Foot were placed on all sides, which hindred the near approach of his miserable and distracted Subjects, (who for manifesting their sorrow, were most barbarously used) and the King from speaking what he had designed for their Ears: Whereupon finding himself disappointed, he omitted much of his intended Matter, but having viewed the Scaffold (which had Irons driven in it to force him 1648 him down to the Block by Ropes, if that he should have resisted) and the Ax (of whose edge he was very careful) having minded one present, of touching it with his Cloak.

Being upon the Scaffold, he looked very earnestly upon the Block, and asked Colonel Hacker if it could be no higher: and then spoke thus, (directing his Speech chiefly to the Bishop and Colonel Tomlinson.)

The Kings Speech upon the Scaffold.

I shall be very little heard of any body else, I shall therefore speak a word to you here. Indeed I could have held my peace very well, if I did not think that holding my peace would make some men think, that I did submit to the Guilt, as well as to the punishment. But I think it is my duty to God first, and then to my Countrey, to clear my self both as an honest man, a good King, and a good Christian. I shall begin first with my Innocency, and in troth, I think it not very needful for me to insist long upon this; For all the World knows that I did never begin a War with the Two Houses of Parliament, and I call God to witness, unto whom I must shortly make an account, that I did never intend to inroach upon their Priviledges: They began upon me, it is the Militia they began upon: they confessed the Militia was mine, but they thought it fit to have it from me. And to be short, if any body will look to the Dates of Commissions, of their Commissions and mine, and likewise to the Declaration, he will see clearly that they began these unhappy Troubles, not I. So as for the guilt of these enormous Crimes that are laid against me, I hope that God will clear me. I will not (for I am in charity) and God forbid that I should lay it upon the Two Houses of Parliament, there is no necessity of either, I hope they are free of this Guilt; but I believe that ill Instruments between them and me, have been the cause of all this Blood-shed: so that as I find my self clear of this, I hope (and pray God) that they may too; yet for all this, God forbid I should be so ill a Christian, as not to say Gods Judgements are just upon me: Many times he doth pay Justice by an unjust Sentence, that is ordinary: I will say this, That unjust Sentence that I suffered to take effect, is punished by an unjust Sentence upon me: so far I have said, to shew you that I am an Innocent man. Now to shew you that I am a good Christian, I hope there is † a good man that will bear me witness that I have forgiven all the World, and even those in particular that have been the chief causers of my Death, who they are God knows, I do not desire to know, I pray God forgive them. But this is not all, my Charity must go further, I wish that they may repent, for indeed they have committed a great sin in that particular, I pray God, with St. Stephen, that this be not laid to their charge; and withall, that they may take the way to the Peace of the Kingdom, for my Charity commands me, not only to forgive particular men, but to endeavour to the last gasp, the Peace of the Kingdom. So, Sirs, I do wish with all my Soul, († I see there are some here that will carry it further) that they endeavour the Peace of the Kingdom. Sirs, I must shew you, both how you are out of the way, and put you in the way. First, you are out of the way, for certainly all the ways you ever had yet, as far as I could find by any thing, if in the way of Conquest, certainly this is an ill way; for Conquest, in my opinion, is never just, except there be a good and just cause, either for matter of wrong, or a just Title, and then if you go beyond the first Quarrel, that makes that unjust at the end, 1648 that was just at first: for if there be only Matter of Conquest, then it is a great Robbery, as a Pirate said to Alexander, That he was a great Robber, himself was but a Petty Robber. An so, Sirs, I think, for the way that you are in, you are much out of the way. Now, Sirs, to put you in the way, believe it, you shall never go right, nor God will never prosper you, until you give God his due, the King his due, (that is, my Successor) and the people their due; I am as much for them any of you. You must give God his due, by regulating rightly his Church, according to Scripture (which is now out of order.) And to set you in a way particularly, now I cannot, but only this, a National Synod freely called, freely debating among themselves, must settle this, when every opinion is freely heard. For the King, indeed I will not, the Laws of the Land will clearly instruct you for that; therefore, because it concerns my own particular, I only give you a touch of it. For the People, truly I desire their Liberty and Freedom as much as any body whomsoever: But I must tell you, that their Liberty and Freedom consists in having Government under those Laws, by which their lives and theirs may be most their own; it is not in having a share in the Government, that is nothing pertaining to them: A Subject and a Sovereign are clear different things; and therefore until you do that, I mean, that you put the People into that Liberty, as I say, they will never enjoy themselves.

† Pointing to the Bishop.

† Observing one to write.

Sirs, It was for this that now I am come hither, for if I would have given way to an Arbitrary way, for to have all Laws changed according to the power of the Sword, I need not to have come here; and therefore I tell you (and I pray to God it be not laid to your charge) that I am the Martyr of the People. In troth Sirs, I shall not hold you any longer, I will only say this to you, that I could have desired some little time longer, because I would have a little better digested this that I have said, and therefore I hope you will excuse me; I have delivered my Conscience, I pray God you take those courses, that are the best for the good of the Kingdom, and your Salvation.

Bishop. (Though your Majesties affections may be very well known to Religion) yet it may be expected that you should say somewhat thereof for the Worlds satisfaction.

King. I thank you very heartily, my Lord, for that I had almost forgotten it; In troth, Sirs, My Conscience in Religion I think is very well known to all the World, and therefore I declare before you all that I die a Christian, according to the Profession of the Church of England, as I found it left me by my Father, and this honest Man I think will witness it.

Then speaking to the Executioner, he said, I shall say but very short Prayers, and when I thrust out my hands——let that be your sign:

Then he called to the Bishop for his Night-Cap, and having put it on, he said to the Executioner, Does my Hair trouble you? who desired him to put it all under his Cap, which the King did accordingly by the help of the Executioner and the Bishop: Then the King turning to the Bishop, said, I have a good Cause and a gracious God on my side.

Bishop. There is but one Stage more, this Stage is turbulent and troublesome, it is a short one: But you may consider it will soon carry you a very great way: it will carry you from Earth to Heaven; and 1648 and there you will find a great deal of cordial joy and comfort.

King. I go from a corruptible to an incorruptible Crown, where no disturbance can be, no disturbance in the World.

Bish. You are exchanged from a Temporary, to an Eternal Crown, a good exchange.

The King then said to the Executioner, Is my Hair well, and took off his Cloak and his George, giving his George to the Bishop, saying, Remember.

Then he put off his Doublet, and being in his Waist-coat, he put his Cloak on again; then looking upon the Block, he said to the Executioner, You must set it fast.

Executioner. It is fast, Sir,

King. When I put my hands out this way, stretching them out ——— Then do your Work.

After that, having said two or three words (as he stood) to himself, with hands and eyes lift up, immediately stooping down, he laid his neck upon the Block: and then the Executioner again putting his Hair under his Cap, the King (thinking he had been going to strike) said, Stay for the sign.

Executioner. Yes, I will, and it please your Majesty.

And after a very little pause, the King stretching forth his hands, the Executioner at one blow severed his Head from his Body; the Head being off, the Executioner held it up, and shewed it to the people, which done, it was with the Body put in a Coffin covered with black Velvet for that purpose, and conveyed into his Lodgings at White-Hall; and from thence it was carried to his House at Saint James's, where his Body was embalmed and put in a Coffin of Lead, and laid there a fortnight to be seen by the people: and on Wednesday seven-night after, his Corps embalmed and coffin'd in Lead, was delivered chiefly to the Care of four of his Servants, viz. Mr. Herbert, Capt. Anthony Mildmay, his Sewers, Captain Preston, and John Joyner; (formerly Cook to his Majesty,) who with others in Mourning, accompanied the Herse that night to Windsor, and placed it in that which was formerly the Kings Bed-chamber: whence it was next day removed into the Deans Hall, and from thence by the Duke of Richmond, the Marquess of Hertford, the Marquess of Dorchester, and the Earl of Lindsey, conveyed to St. George his Chappel, and the Corps there interred in the Vault, (as is supposed) of King Henry the VIII. and Queen Jane, with this Inscription upon the Coffin,

CHARLES KING OF ENGLAND.
M. DC. XL. VIII.

Of his Personage and Disposition.

THIS unfortunate Prince was of a comely Person, a firm and vigorous Health, a Body indefatigable. He was a great Lover, and as great a Master of all Manly Exercises; and yet withall no less skill'd in the Graces and Entertainments of a Court. So Temperate in his Pleasures, that he was never known guilty of any Excess. In his Devotions constant, regular, and intent. His Love to the Order, and to the Religion of the Church of England, was so eminent, that he seal'd and confirm'd 1648 it with his Blood; and at the same time, what he could not support with his Arms, he asserted with his Pen, beyond all Contradiction. His presence of Mind, in all extremes, was seen both in the Field, and upon the Scaffold. He was the best of Husbands, and (perchance) the best of Men. His general Insight in Arts and Sciences, both Liberal and Mechanical, was wonderful; nor was any Prince better instructed in the Principles of Government. His unhappiness was, that some times he trusted to other mens Counsels, rather than his own; and put so much power into his enemies hands, in hope of gaining them, that he was no longer in condition to defend himself. In Effect, He was too Good a Man to be a Happy Prince; and rather betrayed by his own Tenderness, than subdu'd by the force of his Adversaries; as appear'd by the ill use was made of it in several Treaties, Counsels and Battels. The Rebellion was in it self Barbarous; but the Formalities of proceeding against him, by Arraignment, Tryal, Sentence and Execution, fill'd all Christendom with Indignation and Horrour; and his Blood cries yet aloud for vengeance upon the Promoters, as well as the Instruments of that Execrable Murder.

Of Persons of Note in his Time.

FOR the first fifteen years of this Kings Reign, there was little Employment for Military men at home; but there were great numbers of his Majesties Subjects in the service of Foreign Princes and States: as Sir Charles Morgan, Sir John Burroughs; Rutben, Lestly, Fleetwood; Douglas, Hamilton, and many other Commanders of great Renown. In the following Troubles, among several thousands of the Nobility and Gentry, that Eminently served the Crown, there were the Marquisses of Newcastle and Montrose; the Earls of Lindsey, Rocheſter, Northampton, Bristol, Caernarvan, Lichfield: the Lords Francis Villiers, Ashley, Capell, Goring, Hopton, Bellasis, Gerrard, Langdale: Sir Henry Gage, Sir Richard and Sir Bevil Greenvil, Sir Charles Lucas, Sir George Liffle; Col. Charles Cavendish, Major General Hurrye &c. whose Names and Actions are already honourably recorded in the Memorials of those times. There was also Thomas Earl of Strafford, who (though untimely and most invidiously cut off) was not yet inferiour unto any man of his time, either for his Faith to his Prince, or Abilities both Military and Civil. He left the Inheritance of his Vertues, as well as of his Honour and Fortune, unto his Son William; who doubled his Paternal Glories and his own, by Marrying (the worthy Daughter of two incomparable Parents) Henrietta Maria, the Daughter of James Earl of Derby, and Charlotte the Daughter of Claude Duc de la Tremoille, and Charlotte of Nassau, Daughter to William of Nassau, Prince of Aurange; an Illustrious Couple; and of whom we shall speak the more in this place, because the Story hath said little of them elsewhere.

James Earl of Derby, was one of the first with his Majesty at York, after the London-Tumults; from whence he was order'd back again into Lancashire, to prepare for the Kings Reception; upon a Resolution taken for the setting up of the Standard.

1648 Standard Royal at Warrington. Immediately upon his return he muster'd the County, on the three Heaths, by Berry, Ormskirk and Preston; where he had an appearance of at least 20000. men on each Field; intending the same course likewise in Cheshire and North-Wales, (by virtue of his Commission of Lieutenancy.) But in this interim, the place was changed from Warrington to Nottingham, to the great disappointment of the Kings Friends in those parts; and the no less encouragement of his Enemies, (to say nothing of several Indignities put (more particularly) upon the Earl himself, by the contrivance and ill Will of some Great Ones deeply interess'd in this Affair.) The Standard being now set up at Nottingham, and the Countreys not coming in so frankly as was expected, the King by an Express desired his Lordship forthwith to raise what men he could, and to come up to him: whose Answer was, That he would do his best, but that the Case was much altered of late, a great part of the Countrey being resolved now to stand Neuter, and others joyning with the Rebels, had already seized upon Manchester. This notwithstanding, his Lordship, among his own Tenants, Dependents, and private Friends, raised three Regiments of Foot, and three Troops of Horse, clothed and armed them at his own charge; and then posted to the King at Sherburny, for His Majesties Orders how to dispose of them. The King commanded him to return, and presently make tryal of one smart Assault upon Manchester, and whether he master'd the Town or not, to march up then to the Camp. Hereupon the Earl repaired to his Troops, drew up before the Town, and summoned it; and upon their refusal to treat, directed an Assault at Four next Morning, not doubting to carry it. But that very Night he was commanded away, and in two days brought up his three Regiments, and three Troops to his Majesty; which being disposed off to other Officers, his Lordship was desired to hasten back, and take the best care he could of the Countrey. Upon his Return, the Parliament did (now a second time) offer his Lordship the largest terms imaginable, if he would either joyn with them, or quit the Kings Service; but his Answer was to this effect, When I turn Traytor, I may hearken to these Propositions, but till then, let me have no more of these Papers, at the peril of him that brings them. By this time the Enemy had Garrison'd Lancaster and Preston, and in a manner commanded the whole Countrey; when his Lordship bethought himself of defending his own house at Latham: and, although divested of his Arms and Magazine, did yet make a shift (with the assistance of his Friends) to cut off three Companies at Houghton-Common, and after that to take in Lancaster and Preston by storm: in the former, leading on his men himself, with a half Pike in his hand (after one Repulse) to the second Assault, that did the Butinefs: and Manchester had in probability followed, if both his Auxiliaries and his own Forces too, had not been call'd away in the very nick of time when he was ready for the Attempt. Soon after this, upon information that the Enemy had a design upon the Isle of Man, he was ordered thither for the security of that place. And thither he went, having first made some necessary provisions of Men, Moneys and Ammunition, for the protection and defence of his incomparable Lady, to whose charge he committed his Children, and his other English Concerns: and most particularly, the care of his Honour, in defending the House till his Majesty might send Relief, which he hoped would not be long first.

The Countess of Derby being left alone in the House, not as yet fortified, the Enemy look'd upon it now as their own already, little expecting from a Woman, a Stranger, and a place so unprovided (as they supposed that to be) any considerable resistance. So that a Commission was presently obtained for the reducing of it: which being made known to the Lady, she furnished her self with Men, Arms and Ammunition, with all the diligence and secrecy possible. The men being generally raw, and unexperienced, she caused them to be Lifted, and Trained under six Captains; viz. Cap. Farrington, Charnock, Chisenball, Rawsthorne, Ogles, and Molineux Radcliffe, who were to receive orders from Capt. Farmer, (as Major of the Garrison) and he from her Ladyship. Matters were carried so private, that the Enemy was advanced within two miles of the House, not so much as dreaming of any other opposition than from her own Servants. Febr. 28. 1644. there came to the Lady from Sir Thomas Fairfax a Trumpet, and with him a person of Quality, to desire a conference. To which the Countess agreed; and immediately Sir Tho Fairfax, and some Gentlemen with him were admitted; the Souldiers being first disposed of in such manner as might best advance the appearance and opinion of their number and discipline. Their Commission was to demand the delivery of the House; upon which condition they offered her an honourable and safe remove, with her Children, Servants and Goods, (Arms and Cannon only excepted) to her own House at Knomsley, and a Protection there, from any further molestation; and the one Moiety of her Lords Estate in England, for the support of her self and Children. To which the Countess answered, that she was under a double Trust; of Faith to her Husband, and Allegiance to her Sovereign; that without their leave she could not give it up, and therefore desired a Moneths time for her Answer; which being denyed, her Ladyship told them, that she hoped, they would excuse her, if she preserved her Honour and Obedience, though in her own Ruine. Hereupon Sir Thomas Fairfax departed; and upon the Question whether they should proceed by Storm or Siege, he gave his opinion for the latter: Which Advice was much promoted by an Artifice of one of the Earl of Derby's Chaplains, (the Reverend and Ingenious Dr. Brideokers, now Dean of Salisbury,) whose Integrity and Prudence was of singular Service to that Heroical Lady in all her Extremities. Some fourteen days after the former Conference, there came a peremptory Summons for a present surrender, and the Trumpet was dispatch'd away with this short Answer; That the Countess had not as yet forgotten what she ow'd to the Church of England, to her Prince, and to her Lord; and that till she had lost either her Honour, or her Life, she would defend the place. Upon this, Sir Tho. Fairfax gave order for 1648 for a formal Siege, and being himself commanded away to other service, left the management of it to Colonel Peter Egerton, and Major Morgan: the Countess on the other side, giving express Order not to fire a Gun upon the Enemy, nor to do any other act of Hostility, until they should have made four or five shot at the House.

The House stands upon a Flat, being a boggy, spumous Ground. It was encompassed with a Wall of two yards thick; without the Wall, a Mote eight yards wide, and two yards deep. Upon the Wall were nine Towers, flanking one another; on each Tower six pieces of Ordnance, that play'd three one way, and three the other. Besides these, there was in the middle of the House a high Tower, called the Eagle Tower; and the Gate-house was also a strong and lofty Building, in the entrance to the first Court. Upon the tops of these Towers were placed the choicest Marks-men, as Dear-men, Keepers, Fowlers, and the like, who shrewdly gall'd the Enemy, and cut off several of their Officers in the Trenches.

Upon Fairfax his departure, the Enemy fell presently to work upon a Line of Circumvallation: but to disturb them in their Approaches, the Lady order'd a Sally of 200 men, commanded by Major Farmer, who, March 12. 1644. beat the Enemy from their Trenches, up to their Main-guard, kill'd about 60 of them, and took some prisoners, with the loss only of two men. Upon this they doubled their Guards, and drew their Line at a great distance, but they were so plyed with Sallies, that it was fourteen weeks time before they could finish it. After this, they ran a deep Trench near the Mote, where they rais'd a strong Battery, and planted upon it a Mortar-piece, that cast Stones and Granadoes of sixteen Inches Diameter. The first Granado fell close to the Table where the Lady, her Children, and the Officers were all at Dinner; shiver'd the Room, but nobody hurt. The apprehension of these terrible Fire-balls, made them resolve upon a Sally, to attempt the taking of the Mortar-piece. Molineux Radcliffe had the Forlorn, Chisfenball the Body, and Farmer commanded the Reserve; who, after half an hours sharp dispute, possess'd themselves of all their Works, nail'd and overturn'd all their Cannon, or roul'd them into the Mote, and carried off the Mortar-piece into the House, continuing Masters of their Works and Trenches that whole day; which, with their utmost pains and diligence, they laboured to fill up and destroy. During this Combat, the Countess was at her Devotions, (no less eminent for her Piety than for her Resolution) it being her constant practise to begin all these Actions with publick Prayers, and to close them with Thanksgivings. This was April 26. the very day appointed for an Assault, and with Orders to put every Creature to the sword. It took the Enemy five or six days time to repair their Works; in which space they were thrice dislodged, and scattered by vigorous Sallies. These disasters gave Colonel Rigby (a malicious Enemy of the Earl of Derbey's) a pretence of laying the fault upon Colonel Peter Egerton, by which means he got a Commission himself to command in Chief; and for a proof of his Generosity, he would not suffer so much as a Midwife to pass into the House to a Gentlewoman in travail. For a matter of a Fortnight he carried on his Works without much trouble, for want of Powder in the Garrison; but that defect being supplied by a Sally, the Countess propos'd a fresh Assault of all their Trenches, which was accordingly agreed upon; and Ramstborn had the Forlorn, Farmer the Battel, and Chisfenball the Reserve; who, behaving themselves with their wonted bravery, beat the Enemy from their Works, cleared their Trenches, nailed their great Guns, and kill'd 120 men, with the loss only of three Souldiers, and five or six wounded. After a four Months Siege, and the loss of above 2000 men (by their own confession) Rigby sent the Countess a huffing Summons, to which she returned an Answer becoming her Dignity and Virtue.

The Earl of Derbey being in the Isle of Man, and alarmed with his Ladies distress in Latham, hasteth forthwith to his Majesty, to beg Relief; who gave way, that Prince Rupert should take Lancashire in his way to York, whither he was then designed. His Highness entred Lancashire at Stopford-bridge, and Rigby hearing that he had forced the Pass, rais'd the Siege from Latham. May 27. 1644. and march'd to Bolton, a strong Garrison of the Enemies; where, with the addition of other Forces to 2000 of his own, he made up a Body of 2500 Foot and 500 Horse. The Prince understanding that Rigby had quitted Latham, and was fortified in Bolton, marched directly thither, and gave Order for an Assault, which his people very gallantly attempted, but were yet forced to give it off the first bout, with the loss of 200 men, the Enemy killing the Souldiers they took upon the Walls, in cold blood, before the Princes eyes. Upon a second Assault, the Earl of Derbey desired of his Highness the Command of two Companies of his own old Foot, and the honour of the Forlorn; which, upon his importunity, was granted him. All things being ready for a general Assault, the Town was, in less than half an hour, entred upon each Quarter; the Earl of Derbey himself being the first man that entred it. This was May 28. 1644. Rigby made his escape, but left 2000 of his men behind him, and was himself laid aside. There was one Boote a Captain in the Town, and formerly a Porter in Latham, who upon leaving the House, swore voluntarily, That he would never bear Arms against the King. This fellow being in the heat of the Storm encompassed with Souldiers, and seeing his Lord, begg'd Quarter of him; who gave him this Answer, I will not kill thee my self, and I cannot save thee from others. This mans death was afterwards falsely and villainously charged upon the Earl of Derbey, by Bradshaw (Brother to the President) and Rigby at his Tryal. The Colours that were taken, the Prince sent to the Countess of Derbey, by Sir Richard Crane, who received them as a singular Honour, and caused them to be hung up, as happy Remembrances of Gods Mercy, and his Highness's Generosity towards her.

The Princes next work was the reducing of Liverpool; and from thence he went to Latham, where he refreshed himself and his men for three or four days, and was entertained by the Lord and Lady of the place, answerably to his Illustrious Quality and Merit. The Prince, before his departure, gave directions for the repairing and fortifying tifying of the House, and at the request of the Countess of Derby, gave the Government of it to Captain Ramsthorpe, whom he made Colonel of a Foot Regiment, and two Troops of Horse, for its defence, by whom the Place was bravely defended full two years in a second Siege; and, at length, by the Kings Order delivered up; having cost the Enemy at least 6000 men, and the Garrison about 400, being one of the last places that held out for his Majesty in England.

After all these great things done and suffer'd by the Noble Earl, and his admirable Lady, who were at this time in the Isle of Man, the Saddest, and most glorious part of their Story is yet behind. When their Children were perfidiously seized, and made close Prisoners, and the Earl tempted with the promise of a peaceable enjoyment of his Family, and Freedom at his own House, and the one Moiety of his whole Estate, if he would deliver up the Isle of Man; what could be more Honourable than his magnanimous Refusal (even when the Cause it self was given for lost,) saying, That he would never redeem his Children by his Disloyalty. When he came afterwards from the Isle of Man, into Lancashire, by command to attend the King, (Charles the Second,) then on his march from Scotland to Worcester, upon Assurance that the Presbyterians would joyn with the Royallists, in order to his Majesties Restauration; and when he found their Ministers obstinately to oppose any Conjunction, unless he would take the Covenant; what could be more brave or pertinent, than his final determination, which he delivered to them in these Terms, If I perish, I perish; But if my Master perish, the Blood of another Prince, and all the ensuing Miseries of this Nation will lie at your doors.

This perfidious disappointment of theirs, was it that put him upon his next Misfortune, his Engagement in Wigan-Lane, where with 600 Horse he maintained a Fight for two hours against 3000 Horse and Foot, in a place of much disadvantage, in which Encounter he received seven Shot on his Breast-Plate, thirteen Cuts upon his Bever over a Steel-Cap, five or six wounds upon his Arms and Shoulders, and had two Horses killed under him. And yet through all these Difficulties he made out his way to the King at Worcester, and took his part too of that unhappy Battail. Upon the Rout he was taken prisoner by Major Edge, upon Condition of Quarter; and afterwards murdered by a pretended Court of Justice, contrary to the Laws of Arms and Nations. All these Outrages and Wrongs, he suffer'd with a most Religious Constancy of Mind, and his deportment still the same; even upon the very Scaffold, and at the Block it self. Die I must (sayes he) and I thank God I am ready for it. Death would now be my Choice, had I the whole World in competition with it. I leave nothing behind me, which I care much for, but my King, my Wife, Children, and Friends, whom (I trust) the Never-failing Mercies of my God will provide for. I beseech God shew mercy to those who neither had Mercy nor Justice for me.

(This upon the Scaffold; and then a while after, just before he made his Address to the Block; rising from his Prayers) My Soul (sayes he) is now at rest, and so shall my Body be immediately. The Lord bless my King, and Restore him to his Rights in this Kingdom; and the Lord bless this Kingdom, and restore them to their Rights in their King—I die for the King, the Laws of the Land, and the Protestant Religion, &c. In fine, never any man had a more Generous mixture in him of the Courage of a Roman, with the Faith and Resignation of a Christian.

These Calamities joyned with the Infinite Affection of his surviving Lady, would have broken any other Heart than hers, that was supported by a matchless, and in Truth, by a miraculous Virtue. But she (it seems) was still reserved for further Tryals, both of her Honour and Patience. Upon the Parliaments demand of the Isle of Man, she refused to deliver it without License from his Majesty: and that very night, a Wretch that had eaten of her Lords Bread from a Child, and been employed as a servant in places of great Trust and Advantage, having corrupted and prepared the Islanders for the Design, seizes his Lady and her Children, (together with the Island) and she was kept a Prisoner without any other Relief, than what came from the Charity of her impoverished Friends. And yet against these Sufferings too, she still held out, until she saw the happy and much desired Restauration of His Sacred Majesty Charles the Second; and afterwards died March 22. 1664. in her Joynture-House at Knowsley in Lancashire.

The most famous men of the Clergy for Learning in his time, were Davenport Bishop of Salisbury, Andrews Bishop of Winchester, Morton Bishop of Durham, Laud Archbishop of Canterbury, Hall Bishop of Norwich, Prideaux Bishop of Worcester, Usher Archbishop of Armagh, and his Successor Bramhall, Sanderson Bishop of Lincoln, Mr. Chillingworth of Trinity Colledge in Oxford, and Dr. Hammond one of the Canons of Christ-Church in the same University; and Mr. Mead of Christs Colledge in Cambridge, and Mr. Hales of Eaton. But others there were of great Eminence; as Lucius Lord Faulkland Secretary of State, a great Master of all sorts of Learning; Sir Henry Spelman, Sir Edward Coke likewise, that famous Common Lawyer, and Mr. John Selden of the same Profession, a most renowned Antiquary, and Thomas Hobbs of Malmsbury, that excellent Mathematician and Philosopher, all flourished in his Reign.

Nor may we omit the Poets then famous, which excell'd or equall'd all that went before, and shall come after; such as were Mr. Benjamin Johnson, Mr. Edmund Waller, Mr. Thomas Carew, Sir John Suckling, Mr. Thomas Randolph, Mr. Thomas Cartwright, Mr. Abraham Cowley, and Sir William Davenant. The first whereof by his profound Learning and Judgement, shewed a Poet was to be as well made as born: And the later, though he wanted Learning, made as high and noble Flights as Fancy could advance without it.

King Charles the II.

1648

KING Charles the First being deprived of Life on the Thirtieth of January, One thousand six hundred forty and eight, in the manner before-mentioned; his Eldest Son Prince CHARLES, by unquestionable Right succeeded to the Crowns of England, Scotland and Ireland, in the Eighteenth year of his Age. Proclamation and Coronation the usual Ceremonies attending Royal Succession could not now have their due course, nor are they in this Kingdom necessary Circumstances of our Monarchy; for by our Law (which admits of no Interregnum,) the Successor to the Crown has all the Rights thereof from the first moment after the death of his Predecessor. The Ruling part of the House of Commons who usurped the Government with violence on the person of the late King (as hath been related) knew they could not be secure if they rested there; so that immediately thereupon they published an Act even against Kingly Government it self, expressing therein;

An Act against proclaiming the King.

That whereas several pretences might be made to this Crown, and Title to the Kingly Office set on foot, to the apparent hazard of the Publick Peace. Be it Enacted and Ordained by this present Parliament, and by the Authority of the same, that no person whatsoever do presume to Proclaim, Declare, Publish, or any wayes to promote Charles Stuart (Son of the late King CHARLES) commonly called the Prince of WALES, or any other Person to be King, or Chief Magistrate of England or Ireland, or of any Dominions belonging to them, by colour of Inheritance, Succession, Election, or any other claim whatsoever, without the free consent of the People in Parliament, first had and signified by a particular Act or Ordinance for that purpose, any Law, Statute, Usage, or Custom to the contrary notwithstanding: and whosoever shall contrary to this Act Proclaim, &c. the said Charles Stuart shall be deemed and adjudged a Traytor, and suffer accordingly.

Yet this Inhibition did not deter many Loyal Subjects from doing their Duty; and on the second of February this year, the following Proclamation was Printed and scattered about the Streets of London.

We the Noblemen, Judges, Knights, Lawyers, Gentlemen, Free-holders, Merchants, Citizens, Yeomen, Seamen, and other Freemen of England, do according to our Allegiance and Covenant by these presents, heartily, joyfully, and unanimously acknowledge and Proclaim the Illustrious CHARLES Prince of WALES, next Heir of the Blood Royal to his Father King CHARLES (whose late wicked and trayterous Murder we do from our Souls abominate, and all Parties and Consenters thereunto) to be by Hereditary Birth-right, and lawful Succession, right-ful, and undoubted King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, and the Dominions thereunto belonging, and that we will faithfully, constantly, and sincerely in our several Places and Callings defend and maintain his Royal Person, Crown and Dignity with our Estates, Lives, and last drop of our Bloods, against all Opposers thereof, whom we do hereby declare to be Traytors and Enemies to his Majesty and his Kingdoms. In testimony whereof we have caused these to be published and proclaimed throughout all Counties and Corporations of this Realm, the first day of February, in the first year of His Majesties Reign.

A Proclamation proclaiming Prince Charles to be King of England.

God save King Charles the Second.

Coronation which is the next Solemnity, the exclusion of the King by the malice of his Enemies made impossible at this time to be celebrated. The Army had been before modelled suitable

K k k k 2

1648 W suitable to these Designs of changing the Monarchy of England and Ireland to a Commonwealth (for neither this alteration, nor the death of the late King could have been effected without a Military assistance) which was first discovered when Colonel Pride secluded or terrified from sitting near two hundred of the Members of the Commons House of Parliament, being those who had on the fifth of December before by Vote approved of the late Kings Concessions for a Peace at the Isle of Wight, and those that remained after this violation complied so far with the Army herein, that after a first seeming dislike of their proceedings, they resolved and decreed, never to readmit them, and such others who had given their Negatives to the said Concessions, were likewise Ordered not to sit in Parliament, till they had entred their dissent to them.

Monarchy and the House of Lords declared useless by the Commons. The House of Peers continued yet sitting, and in regard the Commissions of the Judges were determined by the Kings Death, they sent to the Commons for a Conference about that and other matters relating to the settling of the Government, but they without returning an answer, declared the Kingly Office to be unnecessary and burthensome, and that the Lords House was dangerous and useless, and therefore to be laid aside; but that they might not be totally excluded from Government, they declared that they might be capable of Elections into the House of Commons, of which afterward three of them only accepted, namely the Earls of Pembroke and Salisbury, and the Lord Howard of Estrich, but the Peers in general very much resented these indignities put upon them by a small part of the House of Commons, and in a Protestation by them published in the name of all the Peers and Barons of the Realm.

The Protestation of the House of Lords against the proceedings of the Commons. "They asserted their own Priviledges, and the Fundamental Laws of the Nation, and disclaimed and protested against all Acts, Votes, Orders or Ordinances of the said Members of the Commons-House, for erecting of new Courts of Justice, to Try or Execute the King, or any Peer or Subject of this Realm, for altering the Government, Laws, Great Seal, Ancient forms of Writs, or legal Process, raising new Forces, and imposing new Taxes, or Oaths, granting Commissions, or making Officers; as likewise against the traitorous Murdering of the late King, and the dis-inheriting of his Son the Prince of Wales, and particularly against that Insolent and Frantick Vote (as they call'd it) of February the sixth, concerning their abolishing the House of Peers as useless and dangerous, all which Acts, Votes, and Orders they declared to be not only illegal, and therefore void, but likewise detestable and destructive to the Rights and Beings of Parliaments, the Fundamental Laws of the Realm, and the Lives, Liberties, and Properties of the People.

This made little Impression upon the Commons, and to prevent the assembling of the Lords, the Army by their appointment or connivance set a Guard upon the Doors of their House; and in further prosecution of their former Votes against Monarchy, they formed and passed An Act for the Exheredation of the Royal Line, the Abolishment of Monarchy in this Kingdom, and the setting up of a Commonwealth; which they ordered to be Published and Proclaimed in all parts of the Kingdom.

Alderman Reynolds the then Lord Mayor of London, a person of great Integrity and Loyalty, refused to publish this Act in London, and was therefore discharged from his Office, and with three of the Aldermen that were of his Judgment committed Prisoners to the Tower of London, and one Andrews was by a Common-Hall chosen in his place, who with Pennington, Atkins, Wollaston, Fowk, Edmonds, and Pack, then Aldermen of London, and some others, Proclaimed this exorbitant Act in several places of the City. But this great Alteration so much amused the generality of the People, that the Parliament thought fit to give them some satisfaction, which was endeavoured by a Declaration, to shew the Reasons of their Proceedings; wherein many plausible Pretences were exhibited, the chiefest whereof imported, A Promise of deliverance from the Bondage introduced by the Norman Conquests, and of maintaining the Ancient Laws (which they extolled for their Excellency and equality) adding, That they might well consist with the present Government of a Republique upon some easie alterations of Form only, leaving the substance entire, and reforming the abuses thereof. They promised likewise, The establishment of a firm and safe Peace, the advancement of the true Protestant Religion, and the liberal maintenance of a Godly Ministry; the settling of Treaties and Alliances with foreign Princes and States, the encouragement of Manufactures for the increase and flourishing of Trade, and the maintenance of the Poor in all places of the Land.

About the time of publishing this Declaration to compleat the Model of their Government, they abolished all the Ancient Forms of Sovereignty, in the Style and Teste of Writs, Commissions, and other publique Instruments, and ordered for the future, all of them to be issued, In the names of the Keepers of the Liberties of England by Authority of Parliament; and likewise they caused the Old Great Seal to be broken, and a New one to be made, having on one side a Red Cross and Harp, as the Arms of England and Ireland, with this Inscription, THE GREAT SEAL OF ENGLAND, and on the other the Picture of the House of Commons, with these words, viz. IN THE FIRST YEAR OF FREEDOM BY GODS BLESSING RESTORED, 1648. And as another Ensign of their Dominion, they appointed that all the Money which from that time was to be coined, should, instead of the Kings Impression, bear the Cross and Harp, with this Motto, GOD WITH US. Those Clauses in the first of Queen Elizabeth, and the third of King James, which enjoyned the taking the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance to the Kings and their Successors, were repealed by them, and a new Oath was framed to be tendered to all that were to be put into place of publick Trust, or made Freemen of Corporations; the Ancient Judicial, and Legislative Power of the King, and both Houses of Parliament, they assumed 1648 W An Act for the abolishing of Kingly Government. Alderman Reynolds the then Lord Mayor committed to the Tower. Andrews chosen in his place.

A Declaration for justifying their proceedings.

The Style of publick writings, the Great Seal and the Stamp of Coyn altered.

1648 to themselves; but the Executive part of Government, they committed to a Council of State erected by Act of Parliament, which consisted of forty persons of the Chiefs of the Army, and others of desperate Fortunes of the most active in these Alterations.

A Council of State erected.

The Parliament of Scotland did by their Commissioners protest against these Actings in England, and particularly they disclaimed the proceedings against the late King, but the New English States resolutely answer'd,

That they of Scotland were at liberty to act in their own affairs, but were not to limit or impose upon others, with many extravagant expressions to justify their actings; but in the close they invited them to a resemblance with themselves, saying, That if Scotland thought fit to vindicate their own Freedom and Liberty, they should be ready to afford them all neighbourly assistance.

Before this Answer could arrive in Scotland, the Scots had taken other Resolutions; for on the third of February in this year, the King was proclaimed at the Cross at Edinburgh; The Chancellour of Scotland dictating to Lyon King at Arms, the Words of the Proclamation as followeth:

The Proclamation for proclaiming the King in Scotland.

The Estates of Parliament presently convened in this Second Session of this Second Triennial Parliament, by virtue of an Act of the Committee of Estates, who had Power and Authority from the last Parliament, for convening the Parliament; Considering, that forasmuch as the Kings Majesty, who lately Reigned, is contrary to the Dissent and Protestation of this Kingdom, removed by a violent Death; and that by the Lords Blessing, there is left unto us a Righteous Heir and lawful Successour, Charles Prince of Scotland and Wales, now King of Great Britain, France and Ireland; We the Estates of the Parliament of the Kingdom of Scotland, do therefore most unanimously and cheerfully in recognition and acknowledgment of his just Right, Title and Succession to the Crown of these Kingdoms, hereby proclaim and declare to all the World, That the said Lord and Prince Charles, is by the Providence of God, and by the lawful Right of undoubted Succession, King of Great Britain, France and Ireland, whom all the Subjects of this Kingdom are bound humbly and faithfully to obey, maintain and defend, according to the National Covenant, and the solemn League and Covenant betwixt the two Kingdoms, with their Lives and Goods, against all deadly Enemies, as their only Righteous Sovereign Lord and King. And because His Majesty is bound by the Law of God, and Fundamental Laws of this Kingdom, to rule in Righteousness and Equity; to the Honour of God, the Good of Religion, and the Wealth of his People: It is hereby declared, That before he be admitted to the Exercise of his Royal Power, he shall give satisfaction to the Kingdom in those things that concern the Security of Religion, the Unity betwixt the Kingdoms, and the Good and Peace of this Kingdom, according to the National Covenant, and the solemn League and Covenant; for which end we are resolved with all possible expedition, to make our humble and earnest addresser to his Majesty; for the Testification of all which, We the Parliament of the Kingdom of Scotland, publish this our Acknowledgement of his just Right, Title and Succession to the Crown of these Kingdoms, at the Market-Cross at Edinburgh, with all usual solemnities in like cases, and ordain his Royal Name, Portrait and Seal to be used in the publick Writings and Judicatories of this Kingdom, and in the Mint-house, as was usually done to his Royal Predecessors; and command this Act to be proclaimed at all the Market-Crosses of the Royal Burghs, and to be Printed that none may pretend Ignorance.

The Scotch Commissioners here, were about this time call'd home, but just at their departure, they sent an Expostulatory Declaration to the sitting Members of our Parliament, wherein they put them in mind of all their Vows, Oaths, and Protestations for the maintenance of the Kings Person and just Rights; and upbraided to them their shameful abjuration and infringement of them by what they had lately acted.

This was so ill received by the Parliament, that they imprisoned the Messenger that brought it, and voted the Paper scandalous and seditious, and all such Persons Traytors as should joyn with or adhere to the Subscribers; they also sent after the Commissioners, and secured them till a Copy of the Paper was sent into Scotland, to know if the Parliament and Estates there would own the same, upon which a Messenger was sent from Scotland to our States to justify what their Commissioners had done, and to complain of the Imprisonment of them, as a thing contrary to the Law of Nations, and thereupon the Commissioners were released and returned home: but these proceedings on either side increased the distrust and jealousies of each other.

In the Sumtner of this year, several Loyal Persons unsuccessfully in many places attempted by Arms to free the late King from great oppression and imminent danger, under which he then lay, as was shewed in the History of that time; of which number the Duke of Hamilton, the Earls of Holland and Norwich, the Lord Capel, and Sir John Owen were about the latter end of February, or the beginning of March following, tried and condemned by a high Court of Justice erected for that purpose, (a Copy of that fatal Original made for the destruction of the late King) of which the Duke of Hamilton, and the Earl of Holland, and the Lord Capel were executed the 9th of March; but the Earl of Norwich and Sir John Owen were pardoned: The Earl of Norwich upon an equal division of the House of Parliament in a Vote for his life, was saved by the casting Voice of Lenthall the Speaker; but Sir John Owen had on his behalf the suffrage of many more voices than those against him, which was reported to be done at that time in a kind of popular generosity; for that the Noblemen had all great intercession made for them by those of their Allies (in favour with some Grandees in power;) but Sir John Owen a Commoner coming from a remote part had none that interceded on his behalf.

The substance of
Duke Hamilton's Speech before his Execution.

Duke Hamilton who first came upon the Scaffold, in his Speech declared his Affection to this Kingdom, and the Reason of his coming into England with an Army, that is to say, his being commanded thereunto, by the peremptory Command of the Parliament of his own Countrey, which if he had disobeyed, he had suffered the same penalty he was to suffer here for obeying. He said many things in vindication of himself from the imputation of having been inconstant in his Religion, or false and unfaithful in his Actions towards the King his Master; he seemed also to intimate a readiness to serve them in what they so much desired of him; namely, the discovery of those who were the Inviters of him in, so that his Life might have been spared; with other things which concerned his condition as a dying man.

Of the Earl of Holland.

The next that came after him was the Earl of Holland, who touch'd upon the Honour of his Family, and the Nobleness of his Education, profess'd his sincere and constant adherence to the true Protestant Religion, justified himself as to the matter for which he was condemned, alledging his defection from the Parliament, not to have been out of any ill design against the State or Kingdom, or any abjuration from his first Principles, which led him faithfully to serve the Parliament, whose service he should not have deserted, had not the changes and alterations among them carried them beyond what was reasonable, or what perhaps they themselves at first intended. He prayed God to bless this Kingdom, and to settle it in the ancient way of Government by the King, Lords, and Commons, and wish'd the present change might not bring confusion upon it, he wish'd that the Kings Posterity might be look't upon, and owned by the People, and re-establish'd in their Native Rights without Blood-shed, that his Blood might be the last that might be spilt, and concluded, as he was Chancellour of Cambridge, with his Prayers to God for a blessing upon that Univerlity.

The substance of the Lord
Capels
Speech.

The last of the three that suffered, was the Lord Capel, who having made a very able and substantial defence for himself, both from the ancient Laws and Priviledges of the Nation, and from their own Acts and Consults, (though all in vain) behaved himself at his death, like what he had shewed himself all along to be, in his resolute acting for the Kings service, a person of a high Spirit, and Heroick fortitude, and delivered what he had to say with a fearless and undaunted Deportment, wherein after an ample Account of his Religion, professing his hearty zeal and devotion to the true Protestant Religion, as it was established in the Church of England, he took the liberty to urge the unjustness of his Execution, as contrary to the Law of Arms, to Honour, and the word given him at his rendring of himself, against the Justice of the known Laws of the Land, and for no other cause, than his maintaining the fifth Commandment: he exprest much trouble and repentance, for having been one of those that gave their Vote to the Bill of Attainder against the Earl of Strafford, and manifested to the world the high opinion, and venerable Remembrance he had of the late Kings transcendent Virtue, Nobleness of Mind, and ability of Parts: Next he prayed heartily for the King that now is, for his happy Restauration, long life, and continued prosperity, recommending to the People the hopes they were to entertain in him of a most accomplished person, and most excellent Prince, from the several years experience he had of the greatness of his Apprehension and Understanding, the Honour of his Nature, and the Generosity of his Inclinations. And so shut up all with what they all three generally consented in, viz. a chearful readiness to forgive his Enemies, and those that had been the occasion of bringing him to that place.

The Blood of these Noblemen did not satiate those that caused the effusion of it; for some others were cut off about the same time for the like offences, though not by the same manner of Tryal, as Lieutenant Colonel Morrice, and Colonel Blackbourn, who was hanged and quartered at York by a Commission of Oyer and Terminer for the surprizing of Pontfract; one Beaumont a Minister was hanged at Pontfract, by Sentence of a Court Marshal; and Major Monday was shot to death at Lancaster by the like Sentence; Colonel Laughorn, Poyer, and Powel, three worthy endeavourers in the Kings service in Wales, were also by a Court Marshal sentenced to cast Lots for their Lives, and the fatal chance falling on Poyer, he was shot to death in Covent-Garden.

Sir John Stowel, and Mr. David Jenkins (a Judge formerly in Wales) had better fortune; for being both arraigned at the Kings Bench Barr as Traytors against the Government, for their Loyalty to the King, though they never owned the Jurisdiction of the Court, the Judges would not give Sentence against them, nevertheless their Estates were seized, and the later of the two was long imprisoned.

The Parliament of Scotland had sent two Gentlemen to acquaint the King, being then at the Hague in Holland, with their proceedings on his behalf, who, after being long at Sea, were beaten back by contrary winds, so that he had no publick notification of what was done there, though he wanted not private advertisement of it: they resolved to invite him to that Kingdom, and were in preparation of Propositions to be sent to him in order thereunto, but they were so much diverted by several disorders in the Countrey, that the progress in them was very slow.

Middleton and Monroe, two Major Generals, together with the Lord Rea, the Gordons, and those of the Clan of Makenzey, being jealous that the Covenanters (for so they called the Scotch Parliament) would impose so much upon the King, that he could not with honour and safety yield to them, drew many Forces together in the North of Scotland, and seized on the Town of Inverness in the Kings name, expecting many others to come in to them, intending so to moderate the Counsels of the Estates at Edinburgh, that the King might be admitted to his Government without any previous conditions. This rising in the North was not so privately managed, but the Scotch Parliament had advice of it some time before it was put in Execution, and they thereupon made Levies of about 6000 Horse and Foot upon other pretences, so that upon the first alarm, they dispatch'd a good party towards Judge Jenkins and Sir J. Stowel tried at the Kings Bench Bar.

The Messengers sent from the Scots to the King at the Hague, are driven back by Storm.

A rising for the King in the North of Scotland.

1648 wards them under the Colonels Ker and Straughan, who marched with so much expedition, that they prevented any considerable conjunction of Forces, and dispersed those that they had got together.

This breach in Scotland, and the suppression of it, made the Governours at Westminster believe it not unseasonable to make some overtures to the Estates at Edinburgh, to tempt them to a breach with the King, with an offer of their utmost assistance against him and all his adherents, but they could not prevail.

The King being now at the Hague, had Intelligence from time to time of the Counsels of Scotland, and resolved to go into France; that from thence he might more easily pass to some part of his own Dominions, to receive their Commissioners: in prosecution of which intentions he left Holland, and came to St. Germans near Paris, where the Queen his Mother then was, and all the way as he passed both through the Cities of the United-Provinces, and the Spanish Netherlands, he was very splendidly entertained. The Duke of Lorain met him on the Frontiers of France, and at Campeigne the King of France received him and accompanied him to Paris, and from thence to St. Germanes, where he staid a few months together with the Duke of York, who repaired to him out of Holland.

In the midst of this prosperous fortune of the established new Commonwealth, there was so great a disturbance made by a Party in the Army, called Levellers, that if it had not been suppressed, all their Buildings had been tumbled down. For the better understanding whereof we shall shew how this name came to be applied to them, and then briefly set down the disorders that hapned.

They were formed out of those Agitators mentioned in the Reign of the late King, and were termed Levellers upon a pretended Principle which they espoused, to endeavour to obtain such an equal righteous distribution of Justice in Government to all degrees of people, that it should not be in the Power of the highest to oppress their inferiours; nor should the meanest of the people be out of capacity to arrive at the greatest Office and Dignity in the State. This was very pleasing to the Inferiour Officers of the Army and Souldiers, but those that influenced them were a more considerable sort of Persons, who to gain Power and Authority to themselves, found out means by heightning this distemper, to arraign and disgrace the Administration of others, and to be pleased with nothing that was done by the Parliament or the Chiefs of the Army, and now the infection was spread among some of the Superior Rank of Officers, who in a jealousy of the aspiring greatness of Cromwell and Ireton (though they appeared not openly themselves) spirited the private Souldiers to begin a defection in the Army upon these Levelling principles.

These to countenance their proceedings insinuated, that there appeared a general self-seeking in the Magistrates, and chief Officers of the Army, whereby that Reformation for which they contended, was not thoroughly pursued as it ought, either in Spirituall or Civils. Cromwell endeavoured to suppress this in the beginning, and caused Orders to be issued to forbid their private Meetings; but not succeeding herein, several of the Souldiers were seized on, and tried and condemn'd at a Court Martial, and one Lockier a busie Actor in the business was shot to death, and 11 Regiments were immediately by Lot drawn out to be sent into Ireland. But this did rather incense than allay the heat; for many of the Souldiers were so practised with, as to be much discontented with their being allotted to the Irish Service; alledging, It was a contrivance to divide them, That they were not Mercenaries, but persons that took Arms upon righteous Principles of Reformation of Government, and that till they saw such a settlement established as might answer the ends of their first Engagements, they would not divide. And hereupon many Regiments revolted from their Officers and if some Great Ones that seemed to approve their actions, had not betrayed them, the Parliaments Authority then, and the following Greatness of Cromwell had been subverted and prevented.

At Burford five thousand Horse and Foot of these Dissenters were drawn together, and staid there as they pretended, in order to a Treaty under the Faith of Cromwell's word, that no part of the Army should draw nearer to them than the distance of ten miles, whereby they were less vigilant; and in this their security, Colonel Reynolds (one accused by them to have discovered their Counsels) fell in upon them with a greater Body than they had, and quickly routed them, taking nine hundred Horse, and four hundred Foot Prisoners, whereof one Thompson, and two or three principal Leaders were immediately shot to death, and the rest by Cromwell's freeness or mediation pardoned; And after this great preparations were made to be sent into Ireland.

But these Commotions gave the Marquess of The Marquis of Ormond, and those that acted for the King under his Lieutenantcy in that Kingdom, a fair opportunity of reducing it to the obedience of the Crown, wherein he was so prosperous, that the King had some thoughts of going thither, and a peace was made with the most considerable of the confederate Irish; but contrary to their Faith and Promise, the Popes Nuntio by the interpositions of some of the Popish Clergy prevailed with the Ulster-Irish under Owen Roe O'neal to refuse to come under the Kings Authority.

Nevertheless, the Lord Lieutenant with the conjunction of the several Forces under the Marquis of Glanrickard President of Connaught, the Earl of Castlehaven, the Lord Inchequin President of Munster, the Lord Moor, Colonel Mark Trevor, Sir Thomas Armstrong, the Lord Taaf and General Preston had made up a very powerful Army, and had reduced to the Kings Authority all the Cities and Towns in the Kingdom, except Dublin and London-derry; and London-derry was besieged by Sir Robert Steward, and Colonel Audly Mervin with a good Brigade, and Owen Roe likewise was by Colonel Trevor with his Army a little before defeated. The Lord Lieutenant being thus strengthened, determined with the whole or the greatest part of his Army to march before Dublin, and came before the middle of June, to a Village called Finglas, about two 1649 two Miles distant from it on the North-side of the River.

Dublin besieged by the Marquis of Ormond.

Colonel Michael Jones was Governour of this City of Dublin, a man of Courage, but bred to the Laws; and as he was a person of great Capacity, (by the experience he had gained in the active Wars of Ireland) he acquired a very good knowledge and Conduct in matters of War. The Lord Lieutenant attempted by all fair means he could to gain him to a compliance with the Kings affairs, but could not effect it. After a day or two, skirmishes were very frequent between the Dublin Horse, and those of the Army; in which those of the City alwayes prevailed, whereby they were much encouraged, and in one of those skirmishes Sir Walter Dungar a valiant Commander of the Army was taken prisoner, whilst they lay at Finglas: but the Lord Lieutenant perceiving the station of the Army, as it then lay, inconvenient for a close siege, drew it over the River (which was every where fordable above the Bridge) to a place called Ramines, and whilst he lay there, it was resolved at a Council of War to raise some Fortifications at a place called Baggetrath, near the Colledge of Dublin (where there was an old Castle moted) thereby to prevent any relief to the besieged by Sea. This design much alarm'd those in the City, and the Governour was resolved to do what he could to hinder the Fortification, and for that purpose he resolved to give Orders for some Companies to sally out to beat them from the place. The Garrison had been reinforced a little before with a Regiment of Horse under Colonel Reynolds, and two Regiments of Foot under the Colonels Venables and Hunks, and many other parties of Horse and Foot from the Garrisons that surrendered in several parts of the Realm, which additional Forces were to the number in all of Three thousand or thereabouts; besides that, with those from England, good store of provisions of all sorts were put into the City, so that the Souldiers were in good heart; the Governour was very private in his design of the sally, which was in this manner perform'd.

The night before he appointed all the Horse and Foot, except such as were employed on the necessary Guards, (which were to the number of 5000.) to be drawn together very early in the morning in the Colledge-Green and Grounds adjacent, within the Works, without sound of Trumpet, or beat of Drum, and with their Colours and Arms trailed; and the Ports were not to be opened till the Forces were all at their Rendezvous, and Centinels were set all along the Line to prevent the going over of any to give intelligence. After all things were thus set in order, about eight in the Morning, the Forlorn-Hope march'd out to Baggetrath, consisting of an Hundred Fire-locks, and after these a party of Horse followed, commanded by Colonel Theophilus Jones (the Governours Brother) and Major Meredeth, and all the rest of the Troops and Companies went after as fast as they could march with Order and convenience. There was a Ditch made cross the High-way betwixt the Town and the Castle to interrupt the passage to it, which was guarded by a party of Souldiers, but these were presently disperfed by the Forlorn-Hope of Fire-locks, who march'd immediately up to the Castle, and took it by Storm, putting all that were in it to the sword. Encouraged by this success, and some more force being come up, they advanced towards the main Camp, betwixt which and the Castle at Baggetrath, they were met with by Sir William Vaughan with a party of Horse, who made some considerable resistance (and indeed all that was made;) but he was slain, and all his party routed; and from thence they followed on to the main Camp, which was by this time in so much confusion, that they made no resistance, but were discomfited, notwithstanding that the Forces from Dublin march'd only in single Troops and Companies, having not time to draw together in Battalia. My Lord Lieutenant endeavoured to make a stand, but being not able to prevail, he with most of the Horse retreated, and march'd off; some of the Foot that were got within the Walls of Ramines, made Conditions for their lives, and had Quarter.

This easie Victory was much admired, but the occasion thereof was said to proceed from the great animosities amongst the English and Irish in the Lieutenants Army, whereby ensued a manifest carelessness and indifferency amongst many of them; and partly by a consternation amongst the Common Souldiers. Moreover, Inchiquin march'd from them, a Fortnight after they came before the place with a great Body of the English to secure the Province of Munster, where Cromwell (lately made Lieutenant of Ireland by the Parliament) was designed to land with his Army consisting of seven Regiments of Foot, and four of Horse, and one of Dragoons.

About the time that this happened, or shortly after, in the like manner Sir Robert Steward and Colonel Mervin were beaten from the siege of London-Derry, by a resolute sally out of the Town made by Sir Charles Coot the Governour thereof for the Parliament. Upon the News of this good Fortune in Ireland, Cromwell with his Son-in-law Ireton, (next to him in Chief Command of the Irish Army) altered their purpose of landing in Munster, and with all imaginable haste transported their Forces to Dublin, near to which City in a short time after the Victory they landed; and after a little stay to refresh the Souldiers, Cromwell marched the Army to the Town of Drogedah, which a little after the defeat near Dublin, had been strengthened with an addition of Five and twenty hundred Foot, and Three hundred Horse, with many stout and resolute Officers, Sir Arthur Ashton, heretofore Governour of Reading and Oxford for the late King, was Governour of the place, a person in whose Courage and Conduct great confidence was plac'd. As soon as Cromwell came in sight of the Town, he sent a Summons, which being refused, he immediately began his approaches, and was very active at the Siege, making many furious onsets on the Town, with great loss to his Army; but at last he carried it by storm, and to strike a terror in the other Towns, and the rest of the Forces that held for the King, all that were found in Arms were put to the sword; amongst which the Governour himself 1649 and Sir Edmund Varney, and the Colonels Warren, Tempest, and Finglass, with many other Commanders of note were slain, and though the Orders of Cromwell were limited to such as were in Arms, yet the rage of the Souldiers was so great, that many of the Inhabitants were slain in the heat of the Fight, without respect to either Age, Sex, or Condition.

Ireland subdued to the Parliament.

After the taking of Drogheda, in less than a year, most of the Cities and Towns in Ireland were taken, and that whole Kingdom in a manner subdued to the power of the Commonwealth of England, and the Marquess of Ormond, and all those that opposed their Authority were withdrawn.

The King removes from France to the Isle of Jersey.

The King with the Duke of York about the beginning of September repaired to the Isle of Jersey, where in a few days they safely landed with about three hundred persons in their Retinue. Upon his first arrival he was very solemnly proclaimed King, and after he had settled the Affairs of that Island, he had an eye upon the reducing the Island of Guernsey, which was then under the Parliaments power; but Castle Cornet the chiefest Fort thereof, was under his Authority.

Sir John Berkley & Colonel Slingsbey apprehended in Cornwall.

A very gracious Declaration after several insinuations was sent into the Island, but it proved ineffectual, for Russel the Governour for the English Commonwealth, had got five hundred fresh men into it; and with as bad success Sir John Berkley, Colonel Slingsbey, and some others attempted to raise Forces for the King in the Western parts, from whence Intelligence came to Jersey, that Dartmouth and several other places would be put into their hands, and a part of the Army joyn with them; but the watchfulness of their Adversaries prevented all these designs, and Sir John and the Colonel as they lay privately in Sir Charles Trevannions House in Cornwall, were by a Country Fellow discovered to the Committees of that County, and by their Command apprehended, and sent Prisoners to Truro.

Mr. Windram sent with a Message to the King at Jersey from the Estates of Scotland.

During these transactions, the Committee of Estates of Scotland had been convened at St. Johnstons, and fate some time, where they resolved upon a Message to be sent to Jersey to the King, in preparation to a Treaty to be had at Breda; for they were unwilling (in regard of the distance and hazard of the way) to Treat in that Island; Mr. George Windram of Liberton was on the twenty fifth day of September dispatched with an Express to him on this Errand; but so long was he on his Journey, and the King not advised of his coming, that he became very doubtful of their Counsels in Scotland, and had given the Marquess of Montross a Commission to make some Levies of men to land in that Kingdom, with Orders to draw together his Friends, hoping thereby the Committee of Estates would be induced the sooner, and with more moderation to a Treaty with him.

Mr. Windram landed not at Jersey in many weeks after his departure from Scotland, but when he came thither, the King received him very well. The substance of his Message was:

That the King would be pleased to acknowledge for lawful their Parliament, and particularly the two last Sessions of that Assembly, which being obtained, they offered to Treat of the means to re-establish Peace and Obedience to his Authority in that Kingdom.

This Overture admitted of great Debate in the Kings Council, for as yet the desperate condition of his Affairs in Ireland, and other Parts was not known to him; some that had no good opinion of the Scots, from their experience of their Dealing with the late King, expected very small fruits of a Treaty with them, and rather advised to rely upon the endeavours of Montross, and the other Confederates; but others reasoned, That these in Scotland now in Power being the most prevalent Party of that Kingdom, and having with them the conjunction of the Kirk (by which the people of Scotland are alwayes much influenced) were more likely to assist him in the obtaining the Crown of England (if he agreed with them) than any others, whose Designs were full of hazard and uncertainty.

The result was, that Mr. Windram should return into Scotland with a Letter to the Committee of Estates, in the words following:

CHARLES R.
